Rev. John Smith,
PRESIDENT OF THE CONFERENCE.

THE position of President of the Conference is each year becoming a more representative one—a position of increasing honour, influence, and responsibility. As the Connexion is growing in resources and power, as its prominent laymen are in increasing numbers taking public positions, and as its work as a section of the great Church of Christ is being more distinctly recognised, the occupant of the chair at the Conference is coming to fill in the public mind a much larger space than formerly. Legally, when the journal of the Conference is closed, the duties of the President are practically over; as a matter of fact they are only just begun. The official act of presiding over the deliberations of the Conference, and signing the record of its proceedings, is but the commencement of a year of public duties, the performance of which will tax the resources and endurance of the strongest amongst us.

As this appointment is made by the free and independent election of the members of the Conference itself—its first official act after it has been duly constituted—the successful candidate is usually a man of Connexional note, who has not only done well and faithfully the ordinary work of the Methodist itinerancy, but has exhibited special gifts and success in some specific department of the Church's work. Sometimes scholarship and literary aptitude determine the choice; sometimes eloquence, or more than ordinary attainments in theology; occasionally a capable and effective administrator is elected; and not infrequently a circuit preacher, plodding and successful, has his work and character recognised by this signal mark of the church's esteem and approval. This year a distinguished missionary occupies the chair. Whatever else Mr. Smith is, and he is cultured, eloquent, devout, public-spirited, courageous, he is before everything else, a missionary. His thought, reading, sympathy, and not a little of his active ministerial service have all run in the channel of missionary work among the heathen peoples of the earth; and his Presidency will confer no small boon on the Church he serves if it should contribute towards lifting the missionary cause to its right place in the affections, prayers, and support of the Connexion.

Mr. Smith owes little to the social status, temporal wealth, or educational advantages of his early life. His parents were honest, upright, and God-fearing, but in such humble circumstances that he was sent to work on the farm at the tender age of seven. He is thus, in the strictest sense, a self-made man. What he has acquired has been obtained by resolute, determined work. It has been said that the greatest thing that can be said of a man is "that he had no ancestry, that he made himself, that he was born mud and died marble." And "to have risen from very humble circumstances to the highest position in a great Church like our own, and in spite of the serious disadvantages, is an achievement of which any man may be proud."

He was born at Holme, a village in Huntingdon-shire, in 1840, and hence is now fifty-eight years of age. When fourteen, he removed to a place called the New World, in the Downham Circuit. "It verily introduced the boy into a new world, for here he came into contact with the Primitive Methodists, and was soundly converted to God. He had been baptised and confirmed in the Episcopal Church, and had been taught to recite the catechism and reverence his betters. But when he found real experimental religion, his entire world was revolutionised. He began to think for himself, and to shape his course according to his own convictions."

In the very able and effective address which he delivered to the Conference on being inducted to the Presidency, Mr. Smith referred to some of the struggles of his early religious life. He soon found that "the world is no friend to grace, to help us on to God," and that if he would "reign" he must "fight," nay, if he would avoid defeat, he must heroically endure. He was subjected to the bitterest persecution and hardship because he would pray and attend the Methodist services. For four Sunday nights he was locked out and compelled to sleep on a heap of chaff in the stable. But with characteristic tenacity he held on his way, and he won a most signal triumph. In the end he secured the respect of his persecutors. His master asked him to conduct prayers in the house, and some members of the family became truly religious.

This early struggle for freedom of conscience was prophetic of much. It showed the character of the man that was to be. Mr. Smith is no trimmer. He sees the object he wants to reach and goes straight for it; and if obstacles are in the way they must be removed or surmounted. His dogged tenacity has carried him on to success where less resolute men would have utterly failed. As soon as he was converted he threw all the energy of his strong nature into mental and spiritual culture. He began to buy books, and the love of books—strong, healthy books—remains with him still.

In those days of our Church-life the harvest was plenteous and the labourers few, and men of aptitude to preach had not long to wait for the call and opportunity. Mr. Smith was converted at fifteen, began to preach at sixteen, and was called into the regular ministry at eighteen. His home circuits, with the exception of a term at Luton, have been exclusively in East Anglia, and few men are more widely known, or more greatly esteemed in the Norwich, and Lynn and Cambridge Districts. His first circuit was Aylsham. Then followed Ely, Yarmouth, Colchester, Briston, East Dereham, and again Yarmouth, where he has travelled four times, and Lynn, where he had signal success. In 1874 he definitely turned his steps to Africa, and since then, whether his sphere of labour has been at home or in the Dark Continent, there has been no question as to where his sympathies and his heart have been. The Yarmouth Circuit contributed £200 to defray the cost of conveying himself and his family to their South African home. In Foreign Missionary work Mr. Smith spent in all ten years, in two periods of five years each. Most excellent work was done by him during these years. Aliwal North, in South Africa, the scene of his services, is to-day one of the largest and most prosperous stations in the Connexion. It has had the benefit of the ministry of some of our most capable ministers; and yet few will question that the remarkable prosperity of recent years is largely to be attributed to the splendid work done there by Mr. Smith in the earlier years of its history.

Four years ago Mr. Smith succeeded to the Secretaryship of the Missionary Society, and hence, is nearing the end of his term. During his period of official life he has had the gratification of seeing a marked increase in the interest shown by our people in African mission work, and a like increase in the support accorded to it; and it was a great gratification to him to know that the last year's income to that fund was the highest it has yet reached. Another extremely interesting incident of his term of office, is the entrance of his son, Rev. E. W. Smith, into our ministry, and his appointment to a station in connection with our Central African Mission. Born in Africa, during one of his father's terms of service there, he has imbibed in a remarkable degree, the intensely missionary spirit of his father, and is giving his life in enthusiastic devotion to the enlightenment of the benighted tribes of Africa.

Mr. Smith is a man of great force of character. He thinks for himself, knows his own mind, and shows no lack of either ability or will to defend any position he has calmly and intelligently taken; and he is one of the most generous of men. He thoroughly respects any man that acts according to his convictions, though they may be directly opposed to his own; and with no niggardly hand he will help struggling causes, and give all possible support to any work for Christ that is earnestly and worthily done.

But undoubtedly it is as a preacher and missionary advocate that he wins his greatest triumphs. In the pulpit or on the platform, he has few equals. "The pulpit is his throne. Nature has endowed him with splendid gifts specially fitting him for this work. To preach is his vocation above everything else. You cannot hear him preach, or hear him speak of the vocation of the preacher without realising that high above everything else he places the work of the preacher. He has a passion for preaching, and all who hear him are glad to confess that he is a true preacher, and an orator of unquestionable power. His speech is silvery. Gifted with a mellifluous voice, which is especially rich in its lower tones, he has the gift of emphasis in a remarkable degree. He has a fine terminology, and ever and anon you are struck with the beauty of his diction.

Warmth, fervour, passion, enter into his preaching, and suffuse the whole with a rich glow of life and reality." As a platform speaker, he has ease, grace, and eloquence; and he has not many superiors as a missionary advocate among the ministers of any church. His wide reading on all African questions, especially those relating to Africa's evangelisation, coupled with his personal knowledge of that land and its needs, give him a supply of missionary information that never fails; whilst his intense sympathy with the subject, and his forcible and beautiful diction, always charm his hearers, and generally win their approval and co-operation.

During his occupancy of the chair of the Conference, his presidency was an unqualified success; and it is certain that his visits to the churches during the course of the year must be productive of much good. May his year of office witness a great increase in the spiritual life of the Church, and, what he himself would most desire, a great development of missionary enthusiasm for the conversion of the heathen world to Christ.

A STORY FOR THE TIMES.*

By JOSEPH HOCKING,

AUTHOR OF "THE BIRTHRIGHT," "MISTRESS NANCY MOLESWORTH," "ALL MEN ARE LIARS,"
"THE STORY OF ANDREW FAIRFAX," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

WHY ALIZON NEVILLE WENT TO TUDOR CHAPEL.

THE Story of the Garden of Eden is not only said to explain one of the greatest mysteries of the world; it also reveals one of the most striking traits in human nature. No sooner did Eve know that certain fruit was forbidden than she longed for it. All of us long for forbidden fruit, no matter what our nationality or education may be. "Stolen grapes are sweet," says the old adage, and most of the old adages are true.

This may explain why Alizon Neville, of Neville Priory, desired to enter a Nonconformist Church. Had she been free to do as she liked about the matter, the possibilities are that she would not have had the faintest inclination in this direction; but being trained a Roman Catholic, as her forefathers had been for many generations, she had been led to regard worship within unconsecrated walls as a species of blasphemy. Hence the desire to take part in a Protestant service. Of course, this feeling only sprung from curiosity, for she was in no way dissatisfied with her own Church; indeed, she regarded it as the only Church, and had a proper feeling of pity for those who did not belong to her communion. Nevertheless, the fact that she had been led to regard the worship of Protestants as utterly wrong, and, for a Catholic, sinful, prompted her to look with curious eyes towards Tudor Chapel, which was situated in the centre of Lynford, a large manufacturing Lancashire town.

In the carriage opposite her sat an elderly man, who, by his attire, was evidently a Roman Catholic priest. He was a mild, kind-looking man, one who evidently took life easily, and troubled little about the problems of the world. He prided himself upon being a good orthodox Catholic, who did the work of a parish priest faithfully, and accepted without question what the councils of the Church had decided upon. In this way he saved himself a great deal of trouble.

"Mother is a long time, Father Sheen," said Alizon presently; "if I had known I should have gone with her."

"Her ladyship is a keen lawyer herself," replied the priest with a slight Irish accent, "thus, when she gets talking with a lawyer, the time passes quickly with her."

Alizon laughed gaily. She was a pleasant-looking girl, with frank, open countenance, and dark, mischievous-looking eyes. She was tall, and well-developed too, and the dress she wore set off her fine figure admirably.

"These Protestants build costly chapels," she said, looking towards a huge building over the doors of which, and carved deeply into the stones, were the words—

TUDOR CHAPEL.

Father Sheen nodded his head gravely.

"Have you ever been inside one?" asked the girl.

"Yes. Never to their services, of course."

"What are they like?"

"Oh, very much like an ordinary hall."

"But you know nothing about—about, what they do there."

"No."

"I should like to go," said the girl.

"My child!" said the old man reprovingly.

"Oh, only to see, of course. I have never been inside one of their buildings. What sect does Tudor Chapel belong to?"

"I don't know," replied Father Sheen. "They are much the same, all these Protestant sects. They multiply like insects. Some one quarrels with some one else, about some point of doctrine of which they know nothing, a split follows, and then a new Bethel springs up. They are a mere rope of sand—these Protestants."

"WHAT SECT DOES THAT TUDOR CHAPEL BELONG TO?"

"Do you know the minister?"

"No. I have heard that a new one is just coming. Look, there is a placard announcing something about it."

The girl looked in the direction towards which the priest pointed, and read a bill, which announced that the Rev. Duncan Rutland, M.A., would commence his ministry at Tudor Chapel on the following Sunday, and that a meeting welcoming him as minister of the church would be held on Monday evening.

When the girl had finished reading, she turned to a lady who was just entering the carriage.

"You have been a long time, mother," she said.

"If you had stayed much longer, Father Sheen and I would have engaged in a theological argument."

The old priest laughed good-humouredly. He was Alison's confessor, and had known her all her life. Moreover, he often acted as chaplain at the Priory, and had been a friend of the Neville family for many years.

A few seconds later the carriage rolled through the smoky streets of Lynford. The operatives were just leaving the cotton factories, for it was half-past five in the afternoon. The time, however, was early September, and the day being fine, the hood of the carriage was thrown back so that they might enjoy the little sunshine which filtered its way through the clouds of soot and smoke.

Lady Mary Neville and Alizon sat side by side, while Father Sheen sat opposite to them. The Neville family occupied a high position in the neighbourhood, indeed, it was famous long before the town began to be. Like many another Lancashire industrial centre, Lynford was of recent growth, dating, indeed, only from the introduction of machinery in the district; but the Neville family was several hundred years old. At the time of the dissolution of Monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII., the Nevilles had secured the old Priory in which to live. They had secreted priests there in the time of Elizabeth, they fought against the Roundheads in the days of Charles I. Later still, when James II. tried to bring back the Romanist faith, the family defended him against William of Orange, and when the Young Pretender marched from Scotland towards Derby in 1745, a young Colonel Neville joined his ranks, and was afterwards distinguished by being beheaded, the head being placed on a pike and lifted on high at Temple Bar. Indeed, this branch of the Neville family had remained true to the ancient faith for many centuries, and at the time of which I write, Lady Mary Neville was the representative of one of the very few important families in Lancashire which yielded allegiance to Rome. She was, moreover, a widow with only one child, Alizon, who sat by her side. In spite of her wealth and position, however, no homage was paid to her. The Lancashire operatives pay homage to no one. Mostly they regard the politeness which characterises the Southern peasant as servility, and the Lancashire man, in the ordinary sense of the word, is never servile. Still, the men and women who filled the streets as they passed, nudged each other and said:

"Yon's a gradely lass."

"Yi, Alizon's noan so bad," would be the reply.

Neville Priory was a fine old pile standing some distance from the town of Lynford, and Alizon loved her home. Throughout her life she had been surrounded by pure influences, and except in matters of religion, she had been allowed to act and think pretty much as she pleased. She was trustful and loving, quick of temper, and somewhat wilful, but a true, wholesome girl nevertheless. She had read a good deal on certain prescribed lines, was a fair musician, and spoke several modern languages fluently.

"You will stay and dine with us, Father Sheen," said Lady Neville, as the carriage drew up to the Priory door.

The priest murmured his acceptance, and entered the house with a satisfied air.

"I wish it weren't Friday," thought Alizon, "I do hate Fridays' dinners. What's the good of it, I wonder?"

Presently the dinner-bell sounded, and the three sat down to the dinner-table.

"Father Sheen," asked Alizon, "why is it a sin to pray in a Protestant Chapel?"

"Because by so doing you encourage heresy, my child, because, in a way, you deepen the wound made at the so-called Reformation, and you recognise in a fashion the position of a Protestant minister."

The girl nodded her head, and was silent for a few minutes, then she went on:—

"But it would not be a sin to go to one of their meetings if you did not pray, nor in any way join in what they do?"

"No, not sin, but I think it would be unwise."

"Why, Father Sheen?"

"Because, unless you are careful, the seeds of doubt may be sown."

"I see; but if one went loving the Church, and determined to resist Protestant influences, it would not be sin?"

"No, in that case it would not be sin," and the priest emphasised the word.

Alizon asked no more questions, but sat quietly throughout the dinner. Presently, when alone in her room, however, she thought over what the priest had said.

"Yes," she said to herself, "I'll go. No one need know anything about it. I'll wear a thick veil, and slip in at the back part of the chapel."

She found it impossible to go on the Sunday, but on the Monday evening she left the Priory alone. It was half-past eight o'clock when she reached Tudor Chapel, and daylight being gone, she was able to get into the vestibule without attracting any attention. Here her heart almost failed her, for, strange as it may seem to Protestant ears, this young Catholic girl felt, in spite of the priest's words, that the step she was taking would be counted to her as sinful. She was about to turn back when a grey-haired old weaver came towards her. Evidently he did not recognise her through her thick veil. "Want a seat, lass?" he asked in a friendly way.

"Yes," she answered.

"Come along, then."

"I shall have to come out soon. I want a seat as near the door as possible."

"Yi," said the old man. "Coom in to Mester Ashton's pew, there's nobody there."

He accordingly opened the door, and showed her into a richly furnished pew, at the extreme back of the building.

"You'll be just in time to hear Mester Rutland," he whispered confidentially. "Th' owd Matthy Bray is just a windin' up; after he's finished ther'll be th' Alleluia chorus, and then Mester Rutland."

Alizon found herself comfortably seated where she could see the entire building, and yet be unnoticed herself. She saw that the chapel was handsomely decorated, and that several hundred people had gathered together.

"I wonder why all these people stay outside the Church," she asked herself. "From what one can see, the folk who come here are intelligent, thrifty, respectable people. Most of the Catholics of the town are Irish, and they are poor and thriftless."

She did not hear much of what the old man who stood on the rostrum was saying. She had a vague impression that there was a certain free and easy atmosphere in the meeting, and the fact that the people clapped their hands and laughed, confirmed her in her belief that the people were not religious as she understood the word.

Presently the Hallelujah Chorus was sung. It was heartily and correctly rendered, but the singing in her own church was far more to her taste. So far there was little to interest her. When the singing ceased, however, she saw that the congregation settled itself to listen attentively, and that to many the real interest of the meeting had commenced.

The chairman, a strong, tall, typical Lancashire man, in a few words introduced the new minister. "We sampled him pretty well yesterday" he said, "and most on us thought that he preached two rare sermons. Some of the lads and lasses said, 'he wur champion;' well, to-night we are here to welcome him, and now I hope you'll give a hearty cheer for the Rev. Duncan Rutland."

Alizon looked eagerly towards the rostrum, and saw a young man rise. He wore no clerical attire, and might as readily have been taken for a lawyer or a doctor, as a minister. He appeared to be about twenty-six years of age, was rather pale, but otherwise gave evidence of being strong and vigorous.

The moment he rose to his feet Alizon felt that he was no ordinary man; before he had been speaking three minutes he had riveted her attention. Perhaps it was because the address was so entirely different from what she had been accustomed to hear. It was really an appeal to young men and maidens to be true to their great heritage. He came there, he said, as an ambassador of God, to preach a great gospel. Our fathers had struggled to give us freedom, freedom of thought, freedom of conscience, and that now, in the closing years of the nineteenth century, there was a danger of our young men and women losing their hold upon those principles which had made the nation great and mighty.

Doubtless, a critical mind would have discovered much to find fault with in the speech. It was the utterance of a young man, and not weighted by the experience of years, or the wisdom which is supposed to come with grey hairs. Nevertheless, it was a thoughtful, stirring address, and to Alizon it came with singular force. It enforced as a duty that which she had been taught to regard as sinful. It taught that it was her duty to think for herself, to shape her own creed, to read the Bible for herself, and to find out its teaching. It warned her against accepting what any council or Church might teach, simply because that council or Church had taught it. It exhorted her to test her creed at the bar of reason, of revelation, of history, of experience, and of her soul's deepest needs.

To Protestant ears this was, of course, commonplace; to Alizon it was a plausible kind of infidelity. And yet she was impressed. The surroundings were strange, the atmosphere was new to her, while the man who spoke possessed a kind of magnetism. To her, moreover, he was a dangerous man; his evident sincerity and earnestness were dangerous, while the fact that in every sentence he revealed that he was a student and a scholar fascinated her. She had been brought up with the idea that all Nonconformist Protestants were ignorant, Bible-worshipping fanatics. Of course, this young minister was utterly wrong, and doubtless Father Sheen could prove how lamentably false and dangerous all these, to her, startling statements were; but at that moment she felt carried away by his fervour, and in spite of herself, he made her mental sky higher, and her horizon broader.

As soon as the young minister had concluded his address, she rushed out. "I'll never go into one of those places again," she said, "no wonder Father Sheen says that Protestant Chapels are dangerous."

When she neared her home she slackened her pace. "I'll have to tell him, I suppose," she said, "perhaps I shall be able to persuade him to answer this dangerous address. I am afraid I've done very wrong."

What I have written in this chapter may seem of but little importance; nevertheless, this incident commenced anew the history of two people, a history that became almost tragic.

CHAPTER II.

HOW DUNCAN RUTLAND MET ALIZON NEVILLE.

DUNCAN RUTLAND was sitting alone in his lodgings. He had just finished his breakfast, when his landlady entered, bringing two newspapers. One was the Manchester Guardian, one of the most important papers in the North of England, the other was the Lynford Observer.

"Th' Observer's bin a givin' it yo' hot," remarked the woman.

"Oh!"

"Yi. Ther's a leadin' article abaath the speech yo made on Monday neet."

"I thought that was done with on Wednesday. The editor had a paragraph about it then, besides giving a full report."

"Well, ther's a leadin' article, and a letter from some Catholic or other."

Duncan did not reply, but taking the paper from his landlady, began to scan its pages. The leading article was supposed to be a judicial summing up of the statements made in his speech, and did not interest him much, but the letter which Mrs. Nutter had mentioned was a vigorous attack on the position he had assumed. Duncan paid but little heed to it, however, and quietly went on with his work.

"Thou mus'n get cross with th' Catholics," remarked Mrs. Nutter as she left the room, "thou'lt mak it warm for theesen if tha dost."

Duncan laughed.

"I've never said a word about them as yet," he said.

"But they tak it thet tha hast," replied Mrs. Nutter. "What they didn't like was baath th' Reformation."

"Were you at the meeting?"

"No, but I read the report in th' Observer. It wur fair and strong."

Duncan Rutland was the youngest minister who had ever taken charge of Tudor Chapel. From the Nonconformist standpoint, it was the principal church in the town, and the "leading men" of the place had been very anxious to secure "the right man." For some years the "Cause" had been somewhat languishing. The building was situated in the heart of the town, and as family after family removed further and further into the suburbs, the difficulty of keeping up the congregations became increasingly great. Several ministers had been "heard," but none seemed to suit, until one day a young student from a neighbouring college was invited to preach. He was not regarded as a candidate, for the simple reason that very little was known about him; besides the thought of inviting a lad of twenty-six to take charge of "Tudor," was out of the question. Accordingly he came to Lynford as an ordinary supply, and a very small congregation gathered to hear him. When the day's service was over, however, a unanimous desire was expressed to hear him again. A few weeks later he had accepted a call to the church, to commence his ministry when his College course had ended.

He had taken his degree in Arts before leaving College, and had come to Lynford full of natural pride because of his success, and full of hope concerning his work at Tudor.

His first Sunday's sermons and his address on the Monday night had cost him a great deal of time and study, for he had determined to state in them the lines of his working and thinking during his ministry. I suppose all young ministers think they can mark out a course of action, and most of them have all sorts of hopes concerning the impression they will make, never dreaming that events may in a few weeks entirely revolutionise their plans. Duncan Rutland's course of reading during the past few months had led him to believe most strongly that priestcraft was an evil thing—that no man should in any way stand between a man's soul and his Maker, and that before anyone could realise the Christianity of Christ he must himself fight out his faith on the solitary battlefield of his own soul. This fact had led him to make the statements which had somewhat startled Alizon Neville, and which had also caused a devoted Catholic to write to the Lynford Observer.

"It seems I am unintentionally stirring people up," thought Duncan, after he had been working for half-an-hour. "That Catholic asks me to substantiate my statements which were reported in the paper. Well, I will."

The next day Tudor Chapel was more than ordinarily well filled, and Duncan, with the impetuosity of a young man proclaimed his message. He did not notice any reporters present, and did not anticipate that any special notice would be taken of his words.

"If thou'lt tak warnin' from an owd man," said an old weaver to him at the close of the day's services, "thou'lt have nowt to do wi' newspaper discussions."

"I do not intend to," replied Duncan, "but what is your particular reason for saying this now?"

"For one reason thou'lt be makkin' thesen cheap," was Matthy Bray's, the weaver's, answer, "and for another, no good comes of it. Ya see ther's allus a lot o' chaps as wants to see ther names i' print."

"Why, do you think there will be a discussion in the papers?"

"I do 'n' all."

"Why?"

"Well, for one thing, although no names 'ave been mentioned, you've 'it the Cathlicks 'ard; and now-a-days they're longing to 'ave summat to say. They're ready for ony means to git noaticed."

"Are they strong in the town?"

"Nobbut middlin', and they're mainly Irish. All the same, Lady Neville's a Cathlick. So's her lass."

"Her lass?"

"I mean 'er daughter. They're big foaks here. Mind, I'm noan findin' fault. Thou'st praiched rare sermons to-day. But ther'll be a lot of talk, mind that. Thee keep from mentioning names, and keep from writin' to th' papers; that's my advice."

The Wednesday's edition of the Lynford Observer contained several letters concerning Duncan's statements, for and against, and the young man, being new to the life of the town, was much interested.

For the next few Sundays he said nothing in his sermons concerning the questions discussed in the newspapers, nevertheless, they were flooded with correspondence. In a country town editors are glad when some question of local interest arises, and there are always a number of people who fancy they can throw light upon it. In a few weeks the young man was tired of it. There was very little instruction in what was written, and there was much personal abuse.

On the whole, he was fairly happy at Lynford. From what he could see, the church would prosper under his ministry, and, although the town was by no means a pleasant place of residence, he took long journeys into the country, sometimes on his bicycle, and sometimes, when the roads were wet, on foot. There were very fine moors near him, and he enjoyed tramping across them. Before the winter had set in he knew the countryside thoroughly, and had learnt to appreciate the wild bleak scenery of the district.

One day,—it was early in November, he started for a long walk across the moors. It so happened that he was free from engagements for the day, and as he had spent much time in visiting and hard reading for a few days past, he determined to go farther afield than had been his wont. The morning opened beautifully. This was an unusual occurrence at this time of the year, for as a rule, between October and May there are but few fine days in that part of Lancashire which is devoted to manufacture. As a rule weavers hate bright, frosty days, the threads are constantly snapping, and as a consequence, there is a great deal of extra work, for less pay. Usually, the less work a weaver has to do in minding looms the better is the stuff manufactured, and the more money can he draw at the end of the week. Thus it is that he enjoys most those days when the air is humid, and when, as a consequence, the sky is dark and dreary.

On this morning, however, the sun shone brightly, the air was keen and frosty, and as he trudged along a well-worn footpath towards the wide moors, Duncan felt his nerves tingle with a delightful sense of enjoyment. He had been walking perhaps half an hour when he came to one of the lodge-gates of Neville Priory, where he saw a young girl on horseback. It was evident that those who lived at the lodge were neglecting their duty, for no one was there to open the gate, and the girl was on the point of dismounting as Duncan came up.

"Excuse me," said the young man, "but will you allow me to assist you?" He opened the gate as he spoke, giving a side glance to the girl, who sat on a restive young horse.

She passed through, and then with a heightened colour, but with a bright smile, thanked him for his courtesy.

"What a bonnie girl!" thought Duncan, as she galloped away. He had hit upon the right adjective. She was bonnie. There in the bright winter sunshine, with the great leafless trees standing around, she looked a perfect picture of youth and health and beauty. He saw that her hair was dark brown, her eyes were of the same colour, while her clear, dark skin, flushed with health and exercise, were the accompaniments of a face of rare beauty. Her movements on the horse were perfectly graceful too, and the young man had no doubt but that she was some one of distinction in the neighbourhood.

Up to the time of his coming to Lynford, Duncan had had no love affairs. It is true that while he was preparing for college he had fond fancies concerning a girl who lived in his native village; but he had never spoken to her concerning them, and on entering college at twenty years of age his mind had been too full of his studies for these fancies to ripen into love. During the six years of his college life, he had worked hard; indeed when, shortly after his arrival there, his Principal had told him that if he set his mind upon it, he could take his degree in Arts, in addition to passing his theological examinations, he resisted all temptations of social intercourse, and directed the whole of his energies towards study.

Thus, when he came to Lynford he was heart-whole. Not that he was averse to female society. No healthy-minded young man ever is, and although he had seen no one in Tudor Church who attracted him in the slightest degree, he hoped that at some time he should have a home of his own, and that some pure, good girl would become his wife.

The memory of this dark-eyed, brown-haired maid remained with him through the day, and the memory was pleasant. And if the truth must be told, he thought more about her than of the sermon he had intended to prepare for the coming Sunday.

About one o'clock, he had called at a farmhouse where the farmer's wife had given him a cup of tea, and had, moreover, insisted that he should have some of the dinner she had prepared for her own family.

"Yo mus'n say noa, Mester Rutland," she insisted, "we're noan gran foak, but hot leg of mutton is better nor dry bread and a bit of 'am."

"How do you know who I am?" asked Duncan.

"Oh, we've 'eerd on ye. We 'ear as 'aa you're stirrin' up th' Cathlicks. Go at 'em, Mester, they'll never do no good."

"I've nothing against the Catholics," said the young man, "I've never said a word against them either."

"No, but yo've bin 'ard on priestcraft, and it's th' same thing. But be careful, Mester, they've been sayin' some rare 'ard things about yo."

"Indeed."

"Yi. They see as 'ow you've noan been sa mony years at College for nowt, and I've yerd as 'ow Father Sheen is goin' to answer yo in th' Cathlick Church. I reckon he's welcome?"

"Oh, quite welcome."

"Yi, I thought soa. But I wouldn't go aat after dark over mich, and ye'll 'ave to be lookin' to yer words. Lady Neville 'ave got a rare lot o' books at th' Priory, and Father Sheen can 'ave as mony as he wants."

"That's all right."

"I know ye're noan afeard, and yo need'na be. Father Sheen's noan the gift of gab yo've got. I've yerd yo' boath."

"Oh!"

"Yi. I wur at Tudor on Sunday neet."

"Why, it's several miles from here."

"Yi, but we don't mind a few miles to hear summat good. There, aar James William is comin' in. 'Appen you smoak a bit."

"Sometimes."

"Well, aar James William 'll be glad to 'ave a pipe with yo'."

It was after three o'clock when Duncan left the hospitable farmer and his wife, and by this time the sunshine had gone, and heavy mist had settled upon the moors. Still, the young man knew his way, and, in spite of the gathering darkness, enjoyed his walk homewards.

Presently he came to a stile, at which he stopped. "I think I'll try the footpath," he said, "it's later than I thought, and I shall cut off a mile or two."

He accordingly tramped across some fields until he came to a farm-house. By this time it was dark, and the fact of the mist made the road difficult to find. Just as he came to the farm-gates, he heard women's voices. The one rather harsh and strident, the other sweet and girlish.

"I'm rare 'n sorry, Miss Alizon," he heard one say, "but th' trap's gone to Lynford and it'll noan be back for a long time."

"Oh, never mind, Mrs. Crossfield, I dare say I shall be able to find my way across the fields, and when I get into the main road I shall not mind. I never thought this fog would come on or I should never have ventured so far."

"Good night," said Duncan, as he came up.

"Good neet," said the farmer's wife, and she looked at him keenly.

"It's rather dark," ventured the young man. He had heard what had passed between them, and wondered how he could offer his services to Miss Alizon, whoever she might be, without intruding.

"It's rare and dark," replied the elder woman.

"'Appen yo're goin' to Lynford?"

"Yes, I am," replied Duncan.

"'Appen yo' know the rooad weel."

"Yes, I know it very well," and he passed on. He heard the two speaking in low tones together, and then before he had proceeded far, the woman called him back.

"I say, felly."

"Yes," and he went towards them again.

"'Appen yo'll tell me wot they call yo?"

"Certainly. My name is Duncan Rutland."

"Th' minister at Tudor?"

"Yes."

"Then 'appen yo'll walk wi' this young wooman as far as Boggart's Clough. Oo's a bit afeard i' th' dark."

"If the young lady will allow me, I shall be pleased to accompany her so far," replied Duncan politely.

"Thank you," said the girl, "I shall be very glad if you will. Good night, Mrs. Crossland."

"Good neet, Miss Alizon."

CHAPTER III.

WHY DUNCAN CHALLENGED FATHER SHEEN TO A PUBLIC DEBATE.

"It is very kind of you," said the girl after they had gone a few yards together.

"I am glad I happened to be coming this way," said Duncan. "I hesitated at first about crossing the fields, and almost repented that I did not keep to the road; now I shall regard my decision as exceedingly fortunate."

The girl made no answer, but walked quietly by his side. Presently her foot caught against a huge stone which stood in the path, and she stumbled.

"Pardon me," said Duncan, "but could I render a further service by offering my arm?"

"Thank you," said the girl, and she accepted his offer.

The young man realised a pleasant sensation as she placed her hand upon his arm. The night did not seem at all dreary now, nay, rather he was glad that the darkness made the girl dependent on him.

"You know the neighbourhood well?" she asked presently.

"Yes, I think so," said Duncan. "I have only just come to the district, but I have spent a good deal of time on these moors. They are very fine, and they help me to do my work."

"You are the minister of Tudor Chapel, I think you said?"

"Yes."

"Then can you work so far away from your church?"

"Yes, I work out my sermons on these moors. They inspire me to think, and—and somehow they make my world bigger, and life less sordid."

"But you cannot read on the moors?"

"I could when I first came, we had a fine September, you remember, but I do not care so much about reading for a month or two. I did nothing else for six years, and it is a relief to me now to rest my eyes."

"But you are fond of reading?"

"Oh, yes, naturally."

"Why naturally?"

"Oh, I suppose a minister is bound to be a bookish man. Besides, this is supposed to be a bookish age."

Duncan Rutland was not sure, but he had an idea that the girl who walked by his side was she for whom he had opened the lodge-gates at Neville Priory that morning. He had learnt, too, that she was called Alizon; this he fancied was her Christian name, for he knew that it was of Lancashire origin, and he had never heard of it as a surname.

"I suppose you are fond of reading, too," he said, in order to keep the conversation going. She had not told him who she was, and therefore he felt a difficulty in speaking freely.

"Yes, I suppose so; but you as a minister would doubtless regard my reading as light and frivolous," she said laughingly. "I suppose all your books are very serious?"

"Oh, no. I read anything, everything, from Descartes to Dumas, from Sir William Hamilton to Sir Walter Scott."

"Do you read Dumas in the original?"

"Yes."

The girl felt more at ease with him now. She had found a subject in which they were both interested.

"Do you read Dumas?" asked Duncan.

"Yes, no,—that is, I did, until——"

She stopped suddenly, and did not finish the sentence.

Naturally Duncan did not press his question, but he could not help wondering at her words. "Of course, some do not like French novelists," he went on, trying to make matters easy for her, "and Dumas described phases of life alien to our English ideas. Still he was a great master of Romance. Indeed, for pure romantic writing, he was in some respects superior to our own Sir Walter. It goes without saying that you have read The Monastery and The Abbot?"

"No."

"No! I pity you, or rather, I envy you. I would give something not to have read either of them. Let me recommend you——"

"No, I shall not read them." She spoke rather curtly.

"No!" said the young man curiously.

"No. The truth is—of course it is of no interest to you; but I am a Catholic."

"Oh, I understand."

"You may have heard my name, at least, my mother's name, Lady Neville; I am Alizon Neville."

"Oh, certainly. How foolish I am not to have thought of it."

The young man felt in a somewhat awkward position. He remembered that Lady Neville was the representative of Catholicism in the district, and that he had been spoken of as an enemy to the Catholic faith.

"I suppose," he continued, presently, "that we are at the opposite poles in thought."

"I suppose so," she replied somewhat curtly.

For a time there was an awkward silence. Her words had placed a barrier between them, and the young man did not know how to break it down.

"Your's is a splendid old house," he said presently. "I like old houses. In fact, I like old things generally. There is generally some mystery surrounding them, and romance."

"Yes, I like old things too," she replied, "even in the world of religion," she added somewhat awkwardly.

"So do I," said Duncan heartily. "I like old churches, and I like visiting old monasteries and convents."

He wanted to set her at her ease, and he had no desire, nay, he felt it would be unkind to discuss religious matters with her. She, however, was young and enthusiastic; moreover, she was excited. She was thankful for his company across this dreary part of the country on a dark night, but she could not help feeling somewhat strange at the thought of walking with a young man whom she regarded as an enemy to all she had been taught to hold most dear. Without weighing her words therefore, she began to argue with him.

"If you believe in an ancient religion," she said, "is it not strange that you should be the minister of a modern sect?"

"You do not wish me to answer you, Miss Neville, do you?" he asked with a laugh.

"It might be interesting if you did," she replied.

"Well, then," said Duncan, "if I went to live in an old house, I should most likely have the place newly drained, I should lighten the dark rooms, I should remove all possibility of disease. It would be the same house, only purified."

"You mean by that, that you believe in an ancient religion, but that it is freed from——"

"Excuse me," interrupted Duncan, "but had we not better change the subject? Believe me, I hold all religious convictions as sacred. If your religion meets your deepest needs——"

"It does," she replied hastily.

"Then, let us say no more about it."

"But you are an enemy to my faith. You have attacked it in your chapel. I heard you—that is, I have read—the—the papers. Father Sheen told me——" Again she stopped awkwardly, she had said more than she had intended.

"I have heard that Father Sheen is a very good man," said Duncan, again trying to help her.

"He is, indeed; the best man I know. I wish you knew him; I wish he could speak to you about—the things you condemn."

"It would give me great pleasure to meet Father Sheen," replied Duncan.

"You know nothing about the Catholic Church, I expect," she continued presently.

"No; that is, I know little of your ceremonials, and your services generally."

"Then why do you condemn them?"

She felt she was scarcely polite in continuing to press this subject, but the circumstances of their meeting caused her to act with less than her ordinary caution. Besides, she felt that she must defend her faith in the presence of its enemy.

"I don't think I ever have," replied Duncan. "As far as I know, I have never mentioned the Roman Catholic Church since I came to Lynford. I have simply dealt with what seems to me important principles."

"Yes, but they affect our faith."

"I cannot help that, can I?"

"But do you not think you should know something of the beliefs of our church before saying that which condemns them?"

"I really don't wish to speak about this," said Duncan, "but I suppose I must defend myself. I confess that I am ignorant concerning many of your ceremonials, but I know something of your beliefs, and the history of your Church. It may seem like boasting to say so, but I have read scores of books on the growth of Romanism. Indeed, for six years Church History has been a favourite study of mine."

"But your histories have been written by Protestants, I suppose?"

"Oh no. I have read both sides."

"You have read Catholic History by Catholic historians?"

"Oh, yes," and he named several authors.

"And yet you remain a Protestant?"

"It depends on the standpoint from which we look at things, doesn't it? Believe me, I have no wish to foist my beliefs on you."

"Oh, you could not."

"I daresay not; but look, yonder is Boggart's Clough."

"Yes; I shall be able to find my way easily from there."

"You will at least allow me to accompany you as far as your lodge-gates, Miss Neville. I shall have to pass them myself, and it is rather dark, although the mist has lifted somewhat."

She thanked him coldly, and walked by his side silently.

"I suppose your house was built in the fifteenth century," he went on presently.

"Yes, at least the old part of it was."

"It has a history, I suppose. It was the scene of some stormy deeds at the time of Henry VIII."

"Yes, I suppose so, but what is that light?"

"I think it must be the light at your lodge."

"Yes, it is. I am very glad. It is kind of you to walk with me, Mr. Rutland."

"And kinder of you to allow me," replied Duncan. "I am afraid you regard me as an unpleasant companion."

"You must confess that you are an enemy to my faith," she said impulsively.

"None the less, I hope I am capable of being ordinarily courteous," replied Duncan pleasantly. "I claim the liberty of thinking for myself, but then—surely there's some disturbance yonder. There are several lights, and I think I see a carriage."

"I hope mother has not been anxious about me," said the girl.

"I sincerely trust not. Let us hasten on."

"What's the matter?" asked Duncan as he came up to the gates.

He heard a lady's voice, but she did not speak in answer to him.

"I know she went to Mrs. Crossland's. I am afraid she must have been lost in coming across the fields. I'll go by the road in the carriage, and you must take the lantern through the fields."

There was a hubbub of voices, and Duncan had to speak aloud in order to make himself heard.

"Is that Lady Neville?" he said hurriedly.

"Yes," replied that lady.

"May I ask if you are looking for your daughter?"

"Yes, I am quite anxious. Have you seen her?"

"I am here, mother," said Alizon.

A few seconds later the necessary explanations were given, and Alizon sat in the carriage beside her mother.

"I am sure I am exceedingly obliged to you," said Lady Neville to Duncan graciously. "Will you not ride with us as far as the Priory? You will be nearly two miles nearer your home."

Duncan accepted the invitation, but little was said during the journey, and the young man was glad when he found himself alone again.

"At any rate," mused the young man, as he sat in his study chair that night, "I have been introduced to the principal Catholic family in the district."

The next morning, as he opened the Lynford Observer, he saw a prominent announcement to the effect that Father Sheen would give a series of Sunday Evening Lectures on the Catholic Religion, and would answer some of the allegations made against his Church.

"Whew!" exclaimed Duncan as he read. "I see an exciting time in the future."

For several Sunday nights the congregations at Tudor Chapel were much thinned, while the Catholic Church was crowded to excess. Duncan read the reports of Father Sheen's addresses with much interest, and noted the letters which challenged him, Duncan, to answer the statements which the priest had made.

Father Sheen's Lectures concluded amidst a flourish of trumpets, while Duncan made no sign whatever. The truth was, he was loath to enter into a wordy battle. In some ways he longed for the fight. He noted the weak points in the priest's armour, and saw how easily his arguments might be answered, and yet some power held him back.

Presently the towns-people began to laugh freely, and some spoke to him rather jeeringly on the subject.

"We thought yo 'ad more grit in you, Mester,"

"HE WENT TOWARDS HER WITH QUICKENED STEP."

said an old weaver. "If Luther 'ad bin like yo, we'd 'ad Popery wi' us naa. I tell yo, yo're noan Lancashire."

"No, I'm not," said Duncan, "but what would you have me do?"

"Answer him from Tudor. Ef what you said t' first Sunday neet is true, then your duty is plain."

"Do you think it would help Christianity?"

"Yi, I do 'n' all. An' soa do most foak. Besides, it's a bit like a coward's trick, and we at Tudor are noan pleased at aar passon showin' th' white feather."

"I suppose not."

"Weel, what art a baan to do?"

"I don't know yet."

"Weel, it's time tha sud, Th' other passons are sayin' thet if yo' do'ant they will ; but as yo' started th' job, yo' sud bear 't brunt. Hast a seen th' letter in Wednesday's Observer ? ”

“ No, I've read none of them.”

“ Weel, a chap theer suggests thet yo' shud challenge Sheen to a public debate in th' Industrial Hall.”

“ I see. Good morning.”

“ Good morning,” said the old weaver in a surly tone.

The young minister went into the public reading-room, and took up the Lynford Observer. He turned to the letter which the weaver had mentioned, and then pondered deeply for some minutes. He longed to prove to these Lancashire people that he was not a coward, longed to defend his beliefs, and yet he hesitated—he could not tell why.

He walked out of the town, and presently reached a footpath across some fields. His mind was very active, and before he realised what he was doing he had sketched a series of addresses which he knew would destroy the arguments of the priest.

“ But I'll not give them,” he said to himself, as he wandered on. “ I'll not give them ; ” but he could not tell why he had come to this decision.

Presently he looked up and saw Alizon Neville coming towards him. He had neither seen nor heard anything concerning her since the night he had accompanied her across the moors. He had often thought of her since then, and had wondered if they would ever meet again.

He went towards her with quickened step, and almost held out his hand. She, in her turn, nodded coldly, and passed on without a word.

He was disappointed, and yet he knew no reason why he should be. He had no right to expect, because he had rendered her a simple service, that she should treat him cordially in the future. Besides, she bore one of the oldest names in Lancashire ; she was a daughter of one of its most important houses ; it was natural, therefore, that she should treat him, the minister of Tudor Chapel, and an enemy to her faith, with coldness, if not disdain.

“ I must get back to my work,” he thought presently, and a little later sat before his desk. He took up his pen to write a sermon ; this, however, was the document which he produced :

To the Editor of the Lynford Observer.

SIR,

As I do not think it would best serve the interests of truth if I followed the example of Father

Sheen, and gave a series of addresses in my church, especially as many Roman Catholics would not, or dare not, enter the building, I shall be happy to fall in with the suggestion made by “ Truth-lover ” in Wednesday's issue of your paper. I therefore invite Father Sheen to a public debate of three nights' duration, to be held in the Industrial Hall, on any dates most suitable to him. I would suggest a committee of twelve gentlemen, of which half shall be Protestant and half Roman Catholic, (although the Roman Catholics do not number a tenth of the population) to arrange proceedings. I am perfectly willing, moreover, that Father Sheen shall select three such subjects as he regards to be essentially Roman Catholic, as the topics of debate, and thus we shall be able to publicly discuss on neutral grounds, those great issues which cleave the Church in twain. Although I have never uttered one word against the Roman Church, per se, (the correspondence in your paper, and Father Sheen's addresses having arisen out of broad general principles which I enunciated), I would submit the following topics for Father Sheen's consideration.

1. Was the Reformation, and the consequent growth of Protestantism, a Necessity ?

2. Is the doctrine of Papal Infallibility in accordance with the teaching of Scripture, or History, or reason ?

3. Is private judgment in matters of religion right or wrong ?

Yours faithfully,

DUNCAN RUTLAND.

On the following Saturday the editor printed Duncan's letter in large type, heading it with the words, “ A Challenge to Father Sheen.” A leading article was also given, supposed to be impartial, while many suggestions were offered. Before the day was over, the religious element in the town was in a state of great excitement.

“ Ah,” said the young Protestants to the Catholics, who had been calling Duncan a coward, “ we shall see who's th' coward now ; ” while all sorts of surmises were offered as to the probable result of the letter which had been written.

And thus Duncan was led by forces of which he had never dreamed, towards a path which changed the whole trend of his life.

“ Father Sheen 'll noan tak' thee up,” said a man to him as he passed down the street that night.

“ Yi, but he will,” said another.

The Divine Leadership:

A NEW YEAR'S MEDITATION.

BY THE PRESIDENT.

"Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene: one step enough for me.
Lead Thou me on!"—Newman.

"And He said, My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."—Ex. xxxiii, 14.

"Meditation is the eye wherewith we see God."—Ambrose.

THE Editor has desired me to send a message to his readers suitable for the New Year. It seems a most fitting thing, and it is a most pleasant one, that I should first of all, in the name of his readers, as well as my own, wish for him personally a glad New Year, and express the fervent hope, and I might even venture to make the urgent request, that his literary work this year may be rewarded by an increase in the circulation of our magazines equal to the manifold excellences which have won for them a place in the first class of periodical literature.

And now I am going to use the piece of Old Testament history referred to above as suggestive of the most appropriate thought to link on to the ever-recurring New Year. Moses stood on the edge of the wilderness. He was called by God to quit the old familiar ground, the land of his exile, the mountain regions of Horeb, and commit himself and his people to unknown wilds. Thus far their march had been a triumphal exodus from bondage. They stood there a redeemed people, a free nation, capable of free choice. Egypt, the cradle of art and science, with all her wanton beauty and lavish plenty, lay behind them, and wooed them to return. Powerful nations stood in front of them, ready armed to dispute with them every inch of the beautiful and wealthy inheritance which they were called to win. It was at this critical juncture of their pilgrimage that the command came with all the decisiveness of a military mandate, "Depart, and go up hence." Thus they were summoned to encounter the toils, the perils, and battles of the wilderness journey. To Moses, their liberator and prophet, it must have been a moment of supreme agony. Upon the counsel he gave, the steps he took, hung the destiny of all this people. No wonder that the sense of responsibility overwhelmed him. Out of his sense of utter loneliness and weakness, the question rose instinctively and unbidden to his lips, Who is to go with me as the friend, the companion, the comrade of my spirit. I cannot go alone. Will He go with me? And he pleads with the Lord in terms and tones which sound almost like a remonstrance. "And Moses said unto the Lord, See, Thou sayest, bring up this people, and Thou hast not let me know whom Thou wilt send with me." I cannot go without a leader. Who is to lead me? And the answer came in a voice of infinite tenderness and sweetness, "My presence shall go with thee." Thus, straight across the desert, beset with daring and experienced foes, the Divine Leader pointed their way. An Apostle has revealed to us in one short phrase the secret of Moses' strength and courage and triumphs, "he endured as seeing Him who is invisible."

This chapter of history was written for our counsel and comfort. We, too, stand at this moment on the margin of the unknown future. Life with us all must have, and will have, its dangerous passes, its dense jungles, its devious paths and crooked places. As we enter this New Year we cherish no delusions, we expect no paradise, we see not a step before us. We know not what shall be on the morrow. We have suffered much, done much, seen much, but we have never seen to-morrow. We purpose and plan and prepare for to-morrow, and then find our cleverest and most elaborate calculations overthrown by the touch of a hair! It is just this sense of uncertainty, insecurity, and obscurity that weighs us down as we enter another reach of time. And, yet, I am not inclined to describe the future as a dreary, dry wilderness, but rather as a glebe out of which we may rear a golden harvest of glorious fruit, or as a broad, free, marching ground where we may make cheerful progress in all that is true and good. The path may be perilous and winding, but it is our glorious calling to march to the music of a Divine promise, "Certainly, I will be with thee." Only let the step be clear, and firm, and straight, and then, though the way be rough and difficult, it will become radiant as we advance under the guidance of our immortal Leader. So with us, as with Moses, the vital, central question of life is, that which pertains to leadership. The question is as old as the world, and yet as new as the dayspring which rises ever. Much of the confusion, the crime, and the curse of the world springs from bad leadership. How divinely beautiful this world would soon become if the pupil always got the right teacher, the servant the right master, the soldier the right general, the subject the right ruler, the church the right pastor. Moses was a man to whom the Divine Leadership was an ever-present and living reality. More present and more real than the earthly things with which he had daily and hourly to do. He lived in the secret place of the Most High, heard His voice, felt the touch of His hand, and was gladdened by His smile.

It is just this vivid sense of the reality of the Divine Presence and action and work in our lives that we are in danger of losing in this keenly critical age. We believe but dimly in the living presence of our risen Lord. He seems to fade away in the distance. We have surrounded ourselves with a thick haze of doubt and unbelief through which the living Christ looks very vague indeed. Yet it is only as we see the living form, hear the living voice, and feel the living touch of the Man of glory that our doubt is dissipated and our life renewed. A clear sense of the perpetual presence of the risen Lord, the Saviour of the world, is the profoundest need of every human heart. The thing most precious to a Christian, the dearest delight of his spirit, is the power and the means of living fellowship with his glorified Lord.

"From Thee is all that soothes the life of man,
His high endeavour and his glad success,
His strength to suffer and his will to serve.
But, oh! Thou bounteous Giver of all good,
Thou art of all Thy gifts Thyself the crown!
Give what Thou canst, without Thee we are poor;
And with Thee rich, take what Thou wilt away."

Every Christian man shares most keenly "the strange, deep longings" of John Forester: "I feel myself so remote from Thee, Thou grand Centre, and so torpid. It is as if those qualities were extinct in my soul which could make it susceptible of Thy divine attraction. But, oh! Thine energy can reach me even here. Attract me, Thou Great Being, within the sphere of Thy glorious light; attract me within the view of Thy throne; attract me into the full emanation of Thy mercies; attract me within the sphere of Thy sacred Spirit's most potent influences. Oh! do Thou seize my existence at this point, and henceforth guide and model it to Thyself."

We hear a good deal in these days about the "Real Presence," and we shall hear a good deal more yet. We do not relish the term on account of its priestly origin and associations. The presence of Christ cannot be localised. Not in the gloomy chancel amid gorgeous ceremonies, but wherever the contrite spirit points to the heart and home of the eternal Father, there is the Real Presence. Yes, there in the flames of a furnace which are turned into the evening breeze; there in the den where ravenous beasts waited to devour, but whose mouths were sealed; there where innocent men are bleeding in a dungeon which is turned into a house of prayer and praise; there where the frail sufferer leans on the sure promise; there where the casements are darkened, and men tread softly and speak in whispers; there by the rough highway where the poor old man breaks stones for a crust, or a worn woman seeks shelter from the storm; there with the Pilgrim Fathers in their log-hut chapel; there with the Covenanters in their moorland temple; there where a soul is entering the valley and the shadow of death, there is the Real Presence as close as air, and as bright as light.

It would be foreign to my purpose to recite even the theories which have been set up in explanation of the Divine Presence, and the hidden and inscrutable operation of spirit upon spirit. The personal experience of a living man is of more value, in this matter, than a whole library of speculations. "I will be with thee," was to Moses like an armoury in a sentence, a river in a spring, a granary in a grain. It ought not to mean less, but immensely more, to us. The New Testament was not in his Bible; we have received a fuller revelation of God than that which he possessed and enjoyed. God has spoken unto us in His Son Jesus Christ, who belongs to our race, speaks our language, and knows us each by name. He is "God with us," and stands at our side day by day, to share our burdens and labours, our pains and griefs. He repeats the old promise made to Moses, with a new meaning and a new sign and a new gift. "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." He promised another Comforter, One who should bring to us a stronger strength, a braver courage, a keener insight, and a gladder hope. One whose indwelling should be a source of brighter assurance, a completer triumph over sin, a soul more purified, an eye more purged, a deeper and sweeter peace. The Comforter was not to take the place of Christ; there can be no substitute for Him. The Holy Ghost did not come to fill a vacancy. The Spirit must not be confounded with Christ, nor separated from Him. "I will come unto you," and He even went on to tell His disciples that it would be, not His presence, or the presence of the Holy Ghost only, but His Father's also. "We will come unto him and make Our abode with him." By a knowledge surer and more inward than sight, or touch, or hearing, they knew that He was close beside them, a more "Real Presence" than any of which the senses could bear witness. And thus to the meanest and faintest disciple, there is made absolutely sure the Divine Presence, making the heart quick and tender, so that it may answer to His slightest touch, renewing and training our whole nature, and guiding our life to the vision of His eternal glory.

Let us, then, as we stand upon the narrow causeway of the now, with the unknown stretching out so mist-bound before us, lift up our hearts and sing:

"He leadeth me! oh, blessed thought!
Oh, words with heavenly comfort fraught!
Whate'er I do, where'er I be,
Still 'tis God's hand that leadeth me."

The character of the way need not distress us, it may not be pleasant, nor popular, nor seem expedient, but Leadership is the vital question. "He knoweth the way we take." Tell me who is Leader, and though I may not know a step of the way, I can predict with absolute certainty that the direction will be right, and that the shining gates of the Celestial City will appear in due time. "He that followeth Me shall not abide in the darkness, but shall have the light of life." Then let us follow our Leader, follow Him fully, follow hard after Him. "Delight thyself also in the Lord; and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart." "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him and He shall bring it to pass." "And He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday." "His loving kindness faileth not." All else—flocks, herds, houses, children, friends, health, may perish. The new year may be one of extremities, broken health, broken resources, and broken hopes as to this world. If all is lost on earth, then heaven remains. There the broken pilgrims of the wilderness will greet "those angel faces, which they had lost awhile," and start again, strong as giants and glad as bridegrooms, on a new career. Yes, they will have a new start, a new youth, a new marching ground, but the same Leader. "For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters." "These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." I cannot, therefore, cherish or express for my dearest friends, a better wish than this, May He be with you. When life's burdens press sorely upon you, and life's path is mysterious, may you be able to lean with calm confidence on the arm of the Almighty Leader. May He, indeed, be with you, alike in your pilgrimage through this world, and when the journey draws to a close. Then, sustained by the presence and aid of a gracious Saviour, may you pass through "the shadow feared of man" and find all the yearnings of faith and hope more than satisfied by the vision of the Divine King in His Beauty.

John Smith

The Garden of Yorkshire.

"We live by admiration, hope and love."—WORDSWORTH.

THE varied and contrasting scenery of Cleveland pleased an old writer so much that he gave it this pretty name—"The Garden of Yorkshire." Of fruit-growing in Cleveland there is nothing worth speaking about, though we think it could be profitably cultivated upon a large scale, especially the hardier fruits, as the district has teeming populations within and on its borders. So we are not to understand the name in a horticultural, but a poetic, sense. The ironstone mines, with their accompaniments, have, it is true, disfigured it sufficiently to make John Ruskin and his disciples rage with æsthetic wrath. Still, it has a beauty and interest all its own; and are not these modern warts upon its face but the tokens of the secret and inner wealth of its individuality? The loveliness that remains is made more lovely still by reason of its contrast with the ugly eruptions of man; and when the miner and all his works have ceased, busy nature will come gently and softly cover up and make beautiful with tree, fern, flower, and grass, the very scars and blotches he has left upon her face. She wastes no time, for even to-day her kindly hand is busy smoothing out the wrinkles of human anxiety, and sowing the seeds of tranquillity and grace.

There is nothing here tame, nothing monotonous, either in hill, vale, town, or hamlet. Nature and man have brought together things which forcibly differ. Fat cornfields and rich pastures touch the feet of the bleakest and ruggedest of hills; and the silent remains of the Parisii, the Brigantes, the Roman, the Saxon, Dane and Norman, lie cheek-by-jowl with the feverish industries of to-day. The iron age hews its metal from these hills, which are still covered with the works of the men of the stone and the bronze age.

"In monuments of antiquity, in abbeys, priories, hermitages, and cells; in castles, fortifications, and encampments; in remains of former grandeur, and relics of great and illustrious families, the vale of Cleveland abounds more than any similar locality in England; and in the magnificence, variety, and extent of its natural scenery; in the healthfulness and salubrity of its climate; in the energy and skill of its agriculturists; in the enterprise and perseverance of its general population, it may compare with any portion of the kingdom."*

This warm and enthusiastic description of the locality and its numerous fragments of the past is not overdone by one jot or tittle, but we do not possess sufficient personal knowledge to make the same affirmation of its "agriculturists" and "general population." Possibly in Ord's day they were all he says, now they are probably much the same as folk in other places. Human nature under similar conditions is wonderfully uniform. If, however, there be a doubt in the case, none will begrudge them the benefit of it. In these racing days they need all the "energy," "skill," "enterprise," and "perseverance" they can command to keep to the front.

But our thoughts are not to be so much directed to contemporaneous farming, as to other matters. An antiquarian, upwards of three hundred years ago, spoke of the drive from Stockton to Guisbro' as the finest in England. I fancy he would make an exception of part of it now, if he happened to be on the south side of the wind in passing Middlesbro'. If I recollect aright, he drove through Ayton,— "Canny Yatton," as the old Yorkshire folk call it.

Cleveland means, "the cleaved-land," or "cliff-land,"—the land of bold hills and cliffs, and consequently of valleys. We have a grand view of this cloven land here from Highcliffe Nab, and perhaps a better one still from Roseberry Topping. Round the corner yonder of Park Wood is hidden Skelton Castle, whose barons for centuries gave the law to this wide domain. The territory was given for military service rendered, by the Norman William, to a De Brus, one of whose descendants immortalised himself by building and endowing a magnificent priory at Guisbro', and another, Robert Bruce, by heroically winning a kingdom. Some of the Guisbro' monks founded Finchale Abbey, near Durham. The Reverend Lawrence Sterne was a familiar visitor at Skelton Castle in the last century. He, and its owner, Hall Stevenson, Esq., who possessed some considerable ability in the rhyming line, were hail-fellow-well-met; their orgies were a scandal to the country-side. Poor Sterne! with all his gifts he lacked two very essential to a minister—grace and sense. Opposite the Castle on the other side of Holbeck, stands the little, dumpy, very, very old Upleatham Church. The body of the building was apparently in existence in the stone-coffin period, which in England may mean any time from the seventh to the sixteenth century.

Guisbro', like Shakespeare, can be spelled in almost as many different ways as you like. For the amusement of the reader, and to prove its capability in this respect, we give a few variations that have been actually used:—Ghigesburgh (Domesday), Guisburne, Giseburn, Giseburne, Gisborne, Gisbourne, Gyseburne, Gisburgh, Guisbrough, Guisborough, Gisborough, and finally, modern impatience has clipped and extracted it until, instead of the rolling and sonorous Guisborough, we have only a poor, little, scrubby Guisbro' left, and sometimes even the "u" is begrudged, and it is then reduced to its lowest term—Gisbro'. In calmer times it may enlarge again, however, for learned men tell us that before talking was thought about, someone hit upon the happy idea of inventing a grunt to tell his wife what was in his mind, and that every existing word known among men is but a variation and expansion of that fecund original grunt. So may Guisbro' hope in juster days to get its due measure of the alphabet again.

Cleveland consists mainly of two considerable plains and a large number of long moorland hills between which are the Yorkshire dales. The Tees and the Esk are its northern and southern boundaries, and perhaps it has an average breadth inland of twelve to fifteen miles. The Vale of Guisbro' stretches out from the Belmont hill to Redcar; Middlesbro', Stokesley, Ayton, Marton, etc., are on the other plain. A natural gateway or pass between the Eton and Hutton Moors connects the two plains. The hills are not even Cumbrian in their size, but quite high and steep enough for a stiff climb. Should you attempt Roseberry from the Newton side you will sigh for a rest ere you reach the top; it is 1,448 feet above the sea. Let us hear what Ord has to say with respect to the view to be had from it:—"It may be doubted whether any scene in Europe presents equal diversity and range of prospect. The views from the Malvern Hills, from Middle Hill in Worcestershire, from Snowdon in Wales, from Skiddaw in Westmoreland, as well as those from Vesuvius, Fort St. Elmo, and the Carthusian Monastery of Naples, have secured the enthusiastic admiration of tourists; but for variety, extent, and broad outline, we make bold to award the palm to Roseberry, at least over its British competitors." Have you been there? If not, take a holiday at Ayton or Guisbro', and lounge it away on the hills and in the woods, and you will be able to say in after years—

"Though absent long,
These forms of beauty have not been to me
As is a landscape to a blind man's eye:
But oft in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din
Of towns and cities, I have owed to them,
In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart;
And passing even into my purer mind,
With tranquil restoration."

ROSEBERRY TOPPING FROM NEWTON VILLAGE.

But the old Topping has other claims upon our appreciation. Before lighthouses, lightships, or buoys, with their tinkling bells, were invented, it was the great land-mark for sailors out at sea yonder. By it the ancient Briton guided his coracle into the Tees and felt at home again, for Roseberry and his lesser neighbours were the fenced cities of these old inhabitants. A jingling couplet attributes the power of a weather-prophet to it:—

"When Roseberrye Toppinge wears a cappe, Let Cleavelande then beware of a clappe."

In the days of the Napoleonic terror, a huge pile of wood was stacked on the top, and a man was always on the look-out for his coming, when he would at once have fired the mass.

Roseberry has its tragic legend, too. At the birth of a Saxon prince, called Oswy, his mother dreamed that upon the night before a certain birthday he would be drowned. To prevent this, as the dread time drew near, he and his nurse were sent to the top of Roseberry for the night, as it did not appear possible that anyone could be drowned up there. But we know fate is mightier than all our little plans, and it is the fixed belief of not a few people still, that what has to be will be. Of course, it will be if it has to be, that is certain. Well, when the nurse awoke in the morning, she found to her dismay and grief, that a little spring had bubbled up just where Oswy lay; his face was in the water and he was quite dead. It killed his mother, and they were buried together, some few miles away at a place called, to-day, Osmotherly; the name being derived, as I have been gravely told, from Os(wy)by-mother-lay. Intrinsically, there are many etymologies of words much worse than this. The higher critics in history will probably pooh-pooh the whole story; but the believer's reply is,—there is a place called Osmotherly, and its name, if not eternal, must have been got sometime and somehow, and why not this way as well as another? And, as to Roseberry and the spring, why, they are still there, conspicuous and curious enough. Surely no more evidence ought to be required to keep the story on its legs; it will still be repeated in spite of the unbelieving, and I am glad of it, as something of the kind seems to be a necessary association of the grand old hill.

The Pentecostal League.

AN INTERVIEW WITH MR. READER HARRIS, Q.C.

By S. HORTON.

ON Jubilee Day, after hours of crushing in the streets of London, deafened by the continuous roar around me, and weary with sight-seeing, while passing down the Strand, I observed a large placard announcing a meeting in Exeter Hall in connection with the Pentecostal League, the speakers being Mrs. and Mr. Reader Harris, Dr. Pierson, and others. The very boldness of the idea impressed me. There was one man in London, evidently, who believed that a distinctly religious meeting could be held, even on Jubilee Day, in spite of all the attractions of decoration, fireworks, etc., and who was determined that patriotism and loyalty to our Sovereign Lady the Queen should have an opportunity of expressing itself in higher forms than in shouting "Hurrah" in the streets, or the throwing of confetti from shop and office windows. There is a great lack in all the churches of daring and enterprise, a marked scarcity of men who can rise above the mere conventional and commonplace, and who will, in the words of Carey, "attempt great things for God, and expect great things from God." And so I determined to go to the meeting and see what success would attend this bold venture. When I went in the great Hall was nearly full, and the audience was singing a hymn with a full-throated zest and spirit which reminded one of the singing of early Primitive Methodists. The gathering was a magnificent success in every sense. The addresses were short, practical, and interesting, and there was power and unction in all the exercises. Dr. Pierson spoke like—well, like Dr. Pierson at his best; Mr. Reader Harris with a naturalness and eloquence which one could not but envy; the other addresses I have no distinct recollection of, except that I felt better for listening to them, which is, after all, perhaps the highest kind of compliment.

That was my first introduction to Mr. Harris, although I had frequently met members of the Pentecostal League, of which he is the founder. Recently, Mr. Harris has been conducting a mission in Hull at the request of the Nonconformist Ministers' Union, and I determined to seek him out, and get him to tell me something more about himself and his movement. He received me very cordially, and notwithstanding that he is a very busy man, cheerfully gave the time necessary to answer my questions.

Mr. Harris is a very interesting personality. His face indicates intensity, force of character, readiness of resource, quickness of apprehension, and considerable oratorical power. He reminds me most, strangely enough, of John Burns. There are, of course, striking differences between the leader of the Battersea democracy and the founder of the Pentecostal League. But there are some resemblances. Both commenced life in lowly circumstances, both had to begin work at an early age, and have been compelled to make up for the deficiencies of their early education by downright hard work, both became Engineers and travellers, and passed through many strange and exciting experiences. Both have succeeded by patient, persistent plodding; have risen to positions of importance and great responsibility as leaders of men, and both have settled down in the same district in London, the one to try to regenerate it by a gospel of baths, public parks, and better dwellings, the other by a gospel of faith in Jesus Christ and sanctification by the Holy Spirit. In his own way each is toiling for the bringing about of the kingdom of heaven upon earth. The one says you must improve the environment and then the individual will become better, the other declares you must regenerate the individual, and he will soon improve the environment.

There are other similarities, as for example, both are men of strong—I had almost written iron will—born to dominate and direct, both are brainy men, with unusual powers of initiative, both have had their doubts about God and religion, and both are born orators. I do not hesitate to say that, for simple, direct speech; for power to stir the mobocracy, the member for Battersea stands unrivalled, while for naturalness, ease, and graceful oratory, Reader Harris would be very difficult to beat.

"How came you to commence the Pentecostal League?" was my first question to Mr. Harris.

"Well, first of all, let me say," was his reply, "that I was brought up in the Church of England. At eighteen I came under deep conviction of sin, and went to a clergyman, who advised me to be confirmed. To this I consented. Unfortunately, in preparing me for confirmation, he sowed the seeds of scepticism in my mind, which ultimately resulted in my going on to the Agnostic platform. I found he did not believe himself, in its fulness, the Gospel he preached. Christ's teaching was to be taken as the ideal of the Christian life, but he had no faith that the ideal could be ever reached. I was confirmed, but gradually I drifted farther and farther away from the beliefs of the Church, and at length found myself an enthusiastic disciple of Mr. Bradlaugh. I went abroad a confirmed Agnostic. On one of my journeys home I missed a steamer which was wrecked and the passengers drowned. This greatly impressed me, and shortly after I was again brought under conviction of sin. I found peace at length in a railway carriage while reading a little book by Dr. Moule, of Ridley Hall, Cambridge, entitled, 'Union with Christ.' I came across the verse—'One died for all; therefore all died,' and I saw the great fact that the soul of the sinner was identified with the Saviour in His death and life, and I claimed the blessing purchased for me. Ten minutes afterwards, when giving my testimony, I received the witness of the Spirit that I was born of God. After seeking and receiving the fulness of blessing, which it is the privilege of every believer to receive, I was impressed with the deadness and coldness of the Church. When praying about it I lighted upon Ezekiel xxxvi. 23, and became convinced that God's method of saving the world was through the sanctification of believers. I requested some friends to pray about it, and at the end of a month the Pentecostal League was formed."

"Then the League is an Inter-denominational movement?" I said.

"Yes," replied Mr. Harris. "Perhaps I had better tell you what the League is not, for there are many misconceptions abroad concerning it. It is not a Faith Healing movement. It is not a Second Coming movement. It is not another sect, denomination, or church. But it is a Prayer Union of all believers in all denominations for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the churches. We strictly guard against the formation of any separate organisation, but seek to work through existing organisations. Another thing, we refuse to be a party to any splits or divisions, or to receive the malcontents of any of the churches. Our mission is to the spiritual classes. We want to arouse and stimulate the churches to realise to the full the possibilities of the Christian life.

"Our official headquarters," Mr. Harris went on to say, "are at Speke Hall, Battersea. It was an old music hall, and we have transformed what was one of the devil's palaces into a palace for God. Tongues of Fire is our official organ, and is sold for a penny."

"Published every week?" I inquired.

"No," said Mr. Harris, "I have no faith in weeklies—people do not read them. They glance over them, skim them, and throw them aside; whereas a monthly is welcomed and read. When I commenced it I knew nothing about journalism; I had never written an article; and so I got the editor of a newspaper to come down and give me some suggestions. I put down all his suggestions on a piece of paper, thanked him, and then went and did directly contrary to his advice in every particular. The result was that I produced a paper which is bought and read right through."

"And how many members have you now in connection with your League?" I inquired.

"In this country about 17,000; but we have never laid much stress upon mere numbers. The movement has spread to other lands. In America it has been very successful, and has its own headquarters and an organ of its own. In Australia, Japan, and many other countries, League centres are being formed, and it is very interesting to me to receive letters from nearly all over the world from men and women I have never seen, who are either members of the League, or who desire to become members. The churches were waiting some such movement as this."

"Then you have every reason to be satisfied with the growth of the movement?"

"Yes; at first it was necessarily slow. It received its first impetus from a series of articles in the 'Christian,' in which I was bitterly attacked. We have had reason to thank God most for our opponents. Following this attack came the well-known 'Sin Controversy,' with Prebendary Webb Peploe. He had maintained at Keswick that the believer is not delivered from sin until death. I immediately offered the sum of £100 for a single text to support such a contention. That money has never yet been claimed. The controversy lasted nine months, with the result that my position was established, and one of our workers was invited to speak at Keswick the next year. Following that came the terrible Armenian atrocities, and I requested the League to pray, first, that the atrocities might be stopped, and second, for the conviction of the Sultan of his sin. The Christian world generally opposed the idea; many were indifferent, and many were afraid thus to put prayer to the test. The fact is that the Church has ceased to believe in prayer. There is no doubt about it, hard as the saying may seem. How many ever expect their prayers to be answered? Well, thousands of our folks prayed, and what happened? There have been no atrocities since. On the 15th November, 1896, we held a special prayer meeting in London for the Sultan, in which we especially asked that we might have some sign from God that our prayers were heard and accepted. On the very next day the Westminster Gazette, and other London papers, announced that the Sultan had sent a cheque of £1,500 for the relief of the Armenians. All these incidents have greatly helped our movement. Men in all the churches are feeling the necessity of getting back to Apostolic conditions of success. What is needed is another Pentecost amongst believers. Men filled with the Spirit fear nothing."

"And are the churches themselves taking kindly to the movement?"

"Yes; of course, some are opposed to it, especially those who do not understand the League and its objects. Many are dreadfully afraid that it means a rival church, which can never happen unless the churches all combine to keep our workers and members out. We always emphasise the Inter-denominational aspect. We have, perhaps, more members amongst the Primitive Methodists than any other denomination. Such well-known ministers as Dr. Ferguson, the Revs. Robert Harrison, B. Fell, A. Ward, and many others are identified with us. Strange to say, of late the movement is taking hold most of the Church of England. The Bishop of Liverpool, Canon Fleming, and other leaders in the Established Church sympathise with us. But what will perhaps surprise you most is that it is the High Church party which seem to be drawn in largest numbers to the League. A very high Ritualistic clergyman in London is a member of it. Next week I go to Leeds to conduct services at the invitation of the clergy and Nonconformist ministers of the city. This is a hopeful sign, and shows how the League is tending to forward the union of the churches in a practical manner."

"And about finances," I said. "How do you support the League?"

"Oh, we have no financial difficulty," he replied with a smile. "The money we need always comes. All our workers give their services gratuitously. No one makes a single penny out of the missions we conduct, or the sale of our literature. Our members pay one shilling per year, and this, with the profits accruing from the sale of Tongues of Fire, etc., suffices for our expenses. We publish a balance sheet every year, and our accounts are audited and signed by a chartered accountant. If we want money for any particular purpose, we pray about it, and it comes. I have one case in my mind just now. I needed £1,000 sometime ago to complete a sum required for a special purpose. I set our friends praying. One of our poorer workers had a legacy left her, which she at once proceeded to give away, sending me a cheque for £1,000. So the Lord always provides. If the Church would only realise this she need not resort to the very doubtful methods she sometimes employs in order to raise money. But, again we come to the same point, she has lost faith in God and prayer."

"You have spoken several times," I said, "of League Centres; what are they?"

"Where we have members connected with various churches in one town we arrange them into one or more convenient centres, and they hold a united meeting in order to help and cheer one another. This is a League centre, and thus the members of the League get to know one another."

"And have you any Conference, or Committee, to which these centres are amenable?"

"No," replied Mr. Harris, "that would be to create what we are anxious to avoid, a separate and distinct organisation. I am the founder of the movement, and in cases of difficulty, of course, appeal is made to me. But I get nothing out of it, nor does any one of my helpers. I get my living, as you know, at the Bar."

"Rather a difficult matter to live this higher Christian life and be a lawyer, is it not?" I venture to ask.

"Not so difficult as the milk or the fish trade, I should say," he retorted with a laugh. "It must be most trying to grace to be engaged either in selling milk or fish. But it strikes me that perhaps the most difficult profession of all in which to be truly saintly," he went on with a twinkle in his eye, "is that of a minister. As a matter of fact, lawyers are peculiarly susceptible to religious influences, at least I have found them so, and it is proved by the fact that the Lord Chancellors for the last forty years have been Christian men. But I do not believe there is any honest profession or business in which it is not possible to serve God. My work is entirely at the Parliamentary Bar, pleading for or against private bills. I have been repeatedly warned by friends that my pronounced religious views would stand in the way of my advancement. But it has not been so. On taking silk, when I went to Court, I took some of our Pentecostal literature with me and distributed amongst those who, like myself, were waiting to be presented to the Queen. One clergyman was very angry at this tract distribution in the Royal Palace. All the others received the booklets courteously, though some of them seemed very much surprised. Thus God gave me grace to witness for Him. The clergyman who was so wrathful, afterwards came to one of our meetings and confessed the booklet had been made a means of blessing to him. Some of my professional friends entreated me to take down the big boards in the Strand announcing our meetings in Exeter Hall, as they were quite sure the display of those posters would ruin any hopes I might entertain of ever being made a Q.C. I so far yielded to their entreaties as to take them down, but put others larger and more striking in their places. The devil likes to play on the cowardice of Christians. A man who gives all to God will lose nothing. 'He that will lose his life shall save it.'"

After a further chat about the meetings he had attended and was about to attend, I expressed surprise that he was able to get through so much work and yet retain his freshness and vigour. "Oh," he replied, "it's not the work that kills, it's worry. Our correspondence is a serious thing, and ministers are the worst of correspondents. They write four or five letters over a matter where one would do. There are exceptions, of course, some ministers are very prompt and business-like, others—" and an expressive shrug of the shoulders completed the sentence.

I was very pleased with my chat with Mr. Harris. He impressed me as a man of deep and genuine piety, sincere convictions, with a profound belief in his mission. I heard several of his addresses, and was struck especially with their directness, felicity of diction and naturalness of delivery. Mr. Harris knows his Bible as he would his brief in an important case. His aptness in replying to questions, and his adroitness in quoting Scripture, were again and again brought out during the meetings. "You preachers," he said, while speaking to a gathering of ministers, "labour your points too much. You spend too much time in proving what nobody doubts. When I am addressing a jury I seem to know intuitively who is for me and who against. I then summon up all my resources, and go for the men who are against me. The others I can afford to leave. If I must win my case I must convert to my view those who are doubtful and antagonistic." This exactly illustrates his method of public address. He is always arguing with some doubtful souls, or smashing an opponent.

Mentally, he is very nimble, and never seems at a loss. I heard him cross-questioned by a number of ministers for the space of nearly an hour on all sorts of intricate theological questions, but the question was hardly asked ere the answer was ready. He claims that he has been delivered from nervousness and stammering, which were both natural to him, by prayer and faith. Now, he declares, he never feels nervous, and it must be confessed that he seldom is at fault. He presses into service the events of daily life, and like the greatest of all teachers, seizes on familiar things to expound great spiritual truths. He is dogmatic, and much oftener says, "I know," than "I think." He deals not in theories, but in certainties, backing every argument with an illustration. Altogether he is a very remarkable personality. Along with great versatility of gifts, he possesses considerable charm of manner. His life has been an eventful one. He commenced life in the Great Western Railway shop. At twenty-three he went out as chief Engineer to the Bolivian Government; on returning to this country he began to study for the Bar, and was made a Q.C. in 1894. He said, "I am the only Q.C. who is a member of the Institution of Civil Engineers."

It remains but to be said that his wife is a valuable helpmeet to him in his work. She is an accomplished lady, a good speaker, and can take the pulpit as well as the platform. She is to the Pentecostal League what Catherine Booth was to the Salvation Army. What more need be said?

The movement itself seems fraught with mighty possibilities to the Church of God. The doctrine of the Holy Ghost's presence and power needed reviving. There was a great need for emphasis to be laid on the fact that believers can be filled with the Spirit, and that it is only as they are filled that they can render effective service. The Pentecostal League unites all who love Christ in one great praying, expecting, and realising brotherhood. As such may it abundantly fulfil its mission.

GRASMERE CHURCH.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

I.—ON THE BLESSEDNESS OF LIMITATION.

HE sanities of Wordsworth have been well sung by Matthew Arnold :

"Time may restore us in its course,
Goethe's sage mind and Byron's force ;
But where will Europe's latter hour
Again find Wordsworth's healing power ?"

And here is the secret of it all :

"He found us when the age had bound
Our souls in its benumbing round.
He spoke and loosed our heart in tears.

Our youth returned ; for there was shed
On spirits that had long been dead,
Spirits dried up and closely furl'd,
The freshness of the early world."

In a few papers we propose to test and illustrate this appreciation, and hope, before we have done, to show that we have in Wordsworth, not only a great high priest of Nature, but a most impressive lay preacher on themes "secular" and common ; on the minor, but no less momentous, moralities of daily life.

By general consent Wordsworth has put a great body of his very best work into his sonnets, and to the sonnets we will, therefore, first turn. He has achieved the unique distinction of writing a remarkably fine sonnet on "The Sonnet," and it shall furnish us with our opening text. But first let us get a clear idea of what kind of poetic form the sonnet is, for there lies the very point of this paper. In the sonnet, perhaps, the poet consents to accept the maximum of restriction. He is severely self-limited. The sonnet must have fourteen lines of ten syllables each ; these must be divided into two parts, consisting of eight and six lines respectively, an octave or major and a sestet or minor system ; there must be a prescribed arrangement in the rhyme-sounds ; there must be a natural pause at or near the end of the first eight lines, and then, again, an onflow ; the poem must have no slovenliness, vagueness or obscurity ; it must have unity and continuity throughout ; and it must risk no anti-climax, but have an end more impressive than its beginning. Artificial it seems—and yet the art of it, to great and true poets, has become second nature. And now we are ready for our sonnet-sermon.

"Nuns fret not at their convent's narrow room,
And hermits are contented with their cells,

And students with their pensive citadels ;
 Maids at the wheel, the weaver at his loom,
 Sit blithe and happy ; bees that soar for bloom
 High as the highest peak of Furness-fells,
 Will murmur by the hour in foxglove bells :
 In truth the prison, unto which we doom
 Ourselves, no prison is : and hence for me,
 In sundry moods, 'twas pastime to be bound
 Within the Sonnet's scanty plot of ground :
 Pleased if some souls (for such there needs must be)
 Who have felt the weight of too much liberty
 Should find brief solace there, as I have found "

It is one of Wordsworth's favourite preachments—this of the blessedness of limitation. The "Ode to Duty" has this for its dominant key-note—

"I loving freedom and untried,
 And being to myself a guide,
 Too blindly have reposed my trust.
 Me this unchartered freedom tires,
 I feel the weight of chance-desires."

You catch more than the echo of it in the poem on "The Pass of Kirkstone":—

"Aspiring Road ! that lov'st to hide
 Thy daring in a vapoury bourn,
 Not seldom may the hour return
 When thou shalt be my guide ;
 And I (as all men may find cause,
 When life is at a weary pause,
 And they have panted up the hill Of duty with reluctant will)
 Be thankful, even though tired and faint,
 For the rich bounties of constraint,
 Whence oft invigorating transports flow
 That choice lacked courage to bestow."

No provincial note that, but one to which all history and all experience are responsive. Here is the drop that mirrors the world. "The sonnet's scanty plot of ground"—was it not that in which Israel was trained for its world-wide mission? God shut in "His people" in the smallest of all lands, that by isolation and circumscription and concentration they might develop an intensity of religious conviction mighty enough to overspread continents. As the fine arts were prepared in tiny Attica, so the universal religion was nurtured for transplantation in the petty seed-plot of Palestine. God's ring-fence, first of geographic locality, and then of the "law," protected the infant sapling till it was ready to shed acorns for boundless diffusion. And so the very narrowness of Judaism had its necessity and its meaning.

Contrast Russia and England in their several developments, and in their relative influence on the history of humanity. Russia has sprawled, so to speak, over too loose and large a space, and her vital energies have shown at once expansiveness and shallowness ; they have lost in intension what they have gained in extension. But Englishmen, in their "tight little island," have had to submit to restriction ; the generations were prepared in isolation—the isolation of the "unplumbed, salt, estranging sea"—and we see the result now in the Briton's fitness, nay genius, for colonisation, and in his growing cosmopolitanism. He succeeds and spreads in America, in Africa, and in Australia, because he received so stern a training for centuries in the seclusion of his own homeland. The shell-process was a long one, but once he was ready to burst the limiting environment, the good of it was speedily seen.

Socially, as well as nationally, limitation has oft shown itself a boon. A story of Rolf Boldrewood's, almost his latest, furnishes a typical example. What though it be a formal fiction—truth is more, very often, than fact. An Australian squatter has suffered from bad seasons, and ruin is just at the door. He goes to Sydney to see his bankers and arrange accommodations to tide him over the crisis, and, while there, visits a friend whose wealth is practically limitless. He contrasts the free and easy and pleasant life which the son and daughter of that friend lead with the "plain living," and hard, monotonous toil to which his own children are condemned, and is chafed by the comparison. Before he returns, having effected his object, he is startled to receive news from England that he has fallen heir to a fortune. A distant relative, from whom he had no expectations, has died and left him suddenly rich. What shall he do? Shall he change the régime at home? Shall he give up his toil and moil at the station, migrate to Sydney, and introduce his family to those civilised delights which his position would now enable him so amply to pay for? But he has had an object-lesson of the moral results of "too much liberty." He decides to hide his change of fortune from his wife and children. He will ameliorate their lot, as opportunity offers (and a splendid rain timely occurs to favour his plans), but they shall still feel that the future depends on "plain living" and continuous attention to the trivial round and the common daily task. He has to practise all kinds of innocent little deceptions to carry through his self-denying ordinance, but he perseveres, and the sequel shows the wisdom of his plan. Unspoiled by an unchartered freedom, his son and his daughter grow up to gladden his loving heart, while the children of his friend bring their parents' grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. A commonplace story, you say. Yes, truly—but in those very sneered-at commonplaces lie the real significances of life. They are humble windows through which may be discerned a wide and rich moral landscape. It is more than "pastime to be bound within the sonnet's scanty plot of ground." It tends to the production of the purest poetry—whether it be only in art, or in the world of real, breathing, tempted, struggling, human life.

Dare we take the Highest Life to witness to the truth of Wordsworth's principle? It seems to me we may. Is not the Incarnation God's self-limitation? He "emptied Himself," says Paul. He took the form of a slave, was found in fashion as a man, and humbled Himself, becoming obedient even unto death. And the sequel? "The name which is above every name, so that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow." Dare we go further and say that the self-limitation of God was necessary to give even God Himself real knowledge of, and sympathy with, human sins and human sorrows? The stoop to the scanty plot of earth, and to man's finite limitations—was it not necessary in some sort—I speak reverently, to the education of the Divine in saving? I can but touch the mystery, as a swallow's wing the surface of the wave, and then, startled, skim away again. I aspire not to build a new theology on some Hegelian conceit of God's coming to consciousness in human history; but I seem to think that the writer to the "Hebrews" had some such idea dimly in his mind too. "For it became Him, for whom are all things, and through whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory to make the author of their salvation perfect through sufferings. . . . Wherefore it behoved Him in all things to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God. . . . For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted. . . . Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered." Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren, (Thou shalt renounce, thou shalt renounce)—sings even the self-contained Goethe, and in some dim way, but yet indubitably, God sets His seal on the principle of limitation as blessedness by the very fact of His descent into the cabining and confining of the time-and-space conditions of the life of man. And who shall doubt that to the eighteen silent years of the early life of Jesus much of the fruited wisdom of the great ministry may be traced? In silence, in solitude, in poverty and toil, in the narrow village life, the spirit of the Master trained itself for high ends of teaching and of service. The words of the evangelist are very simple and very touching—they reach profoundest depths at the same time—"And He went down with them and came to Nazareth; and He was subject unto them. . . . And Jesus advanced in wisdom, and in age, and in favour with God and men." And may it not be said that the wonders of the apostolic age were wrought because, as Paul felt, "the time was shortened"? Energy was compressed; concentration on the present age, so quickly to pass, was the condition of moral force; the stream was not spread in ineffectual shallows, but, contracted within the mill-race of the days so soon to cease, gathered a momentum and an impact of which, in sympathetic comprehension at any rate, we feel the shock to-day.

But to return to commoner, and, as my readers may deem, securer ground. Our great artists in fiction and in poetry are strong because, or when, self-limited. Sir Walter Scott is firmest when his foot is on his native heath; Wordsworth is most characteristic, and has the clearest message, when he is interpreting to us the moral and spiritual beauty of his own region of the Lakes; Jane Austen is a classic because she keeps to the life she knew so well, that of the quiet remote country and of the upper middle class; Hardy has made us his debtors because he has made Wessex so exclusively his own, and (though here is a paradox) therefore ours as well; George Eliot is the moral tonic she is because of her faithfulness to the sturdy and racy Midland types she saw to the core of, and could limn so well.

And how oft from the prisons of the world have come forth its most refreshing spiritual rivulets! Witness the letters of Paul. Take the Bible of Luther which issued from the Wartburg, more fertile of good to his country's language, and to the world's religion, than all his theses nailed to the church door at Wittenberg, or his dramatic burning of the Pope's Bull. And it is but commonplace to recall the "Dream" of the divine tinker—a second Bible in simplicity and directness, in vividness of spiritual touch, to thousands on thousands. We owe that to the "constraint" of Bedford Jail. Preachers know in their preparations that they always work best under pressure. Let not a one-eyed Protestantism too hastily conclude that monasteries have always been but homes of idleness and sin. In no small measure the truth lies elsewhere.

What is a sermon without an application and an exhortation? And so, in conclusion, I say to each and all: Chafe not at the narrow lot, it is meant to give thee a chance to be and to do something. It is a call to concentration. "What are my geraniums doing?" asked an impatient amateur. And the florist answered with a smile, "They are doing the best thing they can—making roots." Roots are for anchorage in a given spot, so that thou mayest not be a thriftless peripatetic, but mayest rather patiently and contentedly assimilate all the profit of thine environment. Submission to law is the condition of true freedom. By the discipline of resignation we learn to rule. "A life of self-renouncing love is one of liberty." The secret of making honey is to "murmur by the hour in fox-glove bells." As George Eliot has said somewhere: "The growing good of the world is only partly dependent on historic acts, and that things are no worse with you and me than they are is owing largely to the number of those who lived faithfully a hidden life, and rest in unvisited tombs."

Not, mark you, that you may not, and do not need to, make excursion into the illimitable. Wordsworth's bees do not get all their honey from the fox-glove bells. They visit the peaks of the fells, too. Bee-keepers will tell you that it is the heather of the high moors and not simply the tamer sweets of the home-garden which give to the honey its finest flavour. Sir Walter Scott used to say that he thought he would die if he did not see and smell the heather of his native Caledonia once a year. And so we need to make our periodical excursions out of the dim and dusty streets of the secular, out of the prosaic place of duty, into the infinite heaven of God. Our "murmuring in the fox-glove bells" will be all the more gainful for our occasional soaring to the upper peaks. But we must descend again, as Jesus from the Mount of Vision, into the valley of service. And let us not, then, despise its narrowness, as may be our temptation after such uplifting. Intense and patient plot-culture is ever more profitable than lazy, or neglectful, or spasmodic farming of the more ambitious area.

"Stick to thy task,
Nor seek to leave thy tending of the vines
Till God's great curfew thee from work assoil,"

WORDSWORTH'S GRAVE.

Primitive Methodism and the Temperance Reformation in England.

I.—THE EVANGELICAL REVIVAL AND THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

TEMPERANCE Reform has become one of the most prominent and one of the most important questions of the age. Its relation to Church work, to domestic purity and happiness, and to national progress is such that all philanthropists, reformers and statesmen are compelled to acknowledge its greatness and to consider its claims. A public opinion has been created which is rapidly dividing the people into two hostile camps, one of which is pledged to defend, and the other to overthrow the liquor traffic as at present conducted. All responsible citizens are obliged, almost inevitably, to take one side or the other. The issues involved are so momentous that neutrality is cowardice, and indifference is sin.

We have been requested, in a series of brief papers, to point out the connection of Primitive Methodists with the origin and development of this mighty and far-reaching reform, and, in doing so, we shall freely use facts and incidents which we gathered from reliable sources, and published more than twenty years ago. What we have to say will be better understood and more appreciated if we first of all take what we may call a bird's-eye view of the general question. This will be our aim in the present paper.

Temperance Reform not a Novelty.

The sin of intemperance is not peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon race: it affects all races in one form or another. It is not the product of the civilisation of recent times: it goes back to the dawn of human history. It has cursed both civilised and savage in all ages; and in the earliest records of nations we have evidence that its evils were acknowledged, and that attempts were made to remedy them.

There were Temperance Societies in olden times; for example, the Therapeutæ amongst the Egyptians, the Nabatheans amongst the Arabians, and the Nazarites, the Rechabites, and the Essenes amongst the Jews. The original Romans were mostly abstainers. Many abstainers are mentioned in the sacred Scriptures, such as Samson, Samuel, Daniel and his three companions, John the Baptist, and Timothy. The law of Moses required every man who took a solemn vow of separation unto the Lord, to "separate himself from wine and strong drink" (Num. vii. 1-4). So that total abstinence from intoxicating liquors is a Scriptural and an historic principle which has been in operation from a remote antiquity. "In Oriental countries, where, from the peculiar genius of the people, the laws of religion and of the State have, to a great extent, been incorporated together, we find the principle of Prohibition has been enforced for thousands of years with complete success."

The late Dr. F. R. Lees, in Vol. II. of his works, has given proofs of this statement, but our limited space will not allow quotations. It is evident that temperance reform is not a modern creation, either in its voluntary or legislative teaching, but a revival and embodiment, in somewhat different forms, of principles which have been held and acted upon from far-off periods; and history testifies that whenever and wherever they have been faithfully applied they have never failed to promote sobriety. But while it is true that total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State are far too hoary to be the offspring, as some would have us believe, of the fanatical teetotalers of the nineteenth century, it is equally true that temperance reformers are more numerous, spread over a wider area, more perfectly organised, and more definite and persistent than in any previous age. This is a hopeful fact for human progress, especially for the progress of the Anglo-Saxon race.

The Evangelical Revival and Modern Temperance Reform.

We are of opinion that the Evangelical Revival which began with the origin of Methodism is, in an important sense, the parent of modern temperance awakening. There are other factors, but we regard the Evangelical Revival as the most potent.

That Revival was the most important movement in the history of the English-speaking people. It rescued "England in the last century from the peril of atheism, and has profoundly affected the religious life of the English race throughout the world." Mr. W. E. Gladstone, in the seventh volume of his "Gleanings of Past Years," says: "That preaching of the Gospel a hundred years ago had disappeared, not by denial, but by lapse is, I fear, in a large measure, an historic truth." The Evangelical Revival he describes as "A strong, systematic, outspoken, and determined re-action against the prevailing standards both of life and preaching. It aimed at bringing back, on a large scale, and by an aggressive movement, the Cross, and all that the Cross essentially implies, both into the teaching of the clergy, and into the lives as well of the clergy as the laity." He also traces the improved condition of the Anglican Church in the past generation to the same cause. Dr. R. W. Dale, in his sermon on "The Evangelical Revival," says: "Most of the Independents and the Baptists retained their evangelical creed, but a keen east wind of rationalism was chilling the very life of most ministers and people. Latitudinarianism and religious indifference were spreading through the English Church, and the Evangelical Nonconformists suffered from the infection. . . The fresh vitality of the Evangelical Nonconformists of England, and the fresh vitality of our kindred churches on the other side of the Atlantic, are largely the result of the Evangelical Revival." There were many individuals, both in the Established and in the then existing Nonconformist Churches, who did much to promote the Revival, but it is admitted, almost universally, that Methodism was the chief factor, as well as "the most conspicuous movement and memorial."

But the Evangelical Revival in which the Methodists played such an important part had an incalculable influence, not only upon the teaching, the worship, and general life of the churches, but also upon the social life of the nation. Mr. J. R. Green, in his "Short History of the English People," writes:—"In the nation at large appeared a new moral enthusiasm which, rigid and pedantic as it often seemed, was still healthy in its social tone, and whose power was seen in the disappearance of the profligacy which had distinguished the upper classes, and the foulness which had infested literature since the Restoration. But the noblest result of the religious revival was the steady attempt, which has never ceased from that day to this, to remedy the guilt, the ignorance, the physical suffering, the social degradation of the profligate and the poor. It was not until Methodism had done its work that the philanthropic movement began. *The Sunday Schools established by Mr. Raikes, of Gloucester, were the beginnings of popular education. By her writings and her own personal example, Hannah More drew the sympathy of England to the poverty and crime of the agricultural labourer. The passionate impulse of human sympathy with the wronged and afflicted, raised hospitals, endowed charities, built churches, sent missionaries to the heathen, supported Burke in his plea for the Hindoo, and Clarkson and Wilberforce in their crusade against the iniquity of the slave trade; and Howard says that John Wesley preached the sermon which made the first impression on his mind. It would not be difficult to show that the influence of Methodism was in the initiation of these and other movements which have done so much to brighten and purify and elevate social life.

But drink was the curse of Wesley's day as it is the national curse of our day, and Methodists warred against it. To quote Milner's "History of England," "Drunken orgies were far more prevalent than at present, making allowance for the difference of population. The intemperate habits of the people, with the consequent disease, vice, and crime, attracted the attention of the legislature in the early part of the reign (George II.); and the Gin Bill was passed, imposing a heavy tax upon the article, in order to check the enormous consumption. Hogarth's well-known picture, called 'Gin Lane,' may have some elements of exaggeration, but the reality must have been dreadful in the extreme to suggest the appalling scene. Smollett relates that retailers invited the public to degradation by gin-posts with the inscription, 'You may get drunk for a penny, dead drunk for twopence, and have clean straw for nothing.' Lords Carteret and Cholmondeley affirmed in Parliament, that on their way to the House they had seen persons lying insensible in the gutters." After referring to a fruitless attempt on the part of Parliament to deal with the evil, he adds, "Happily efficient instruments were raised up by God's providence, and were soon in energetic action, aiming to rescue the community from slavery to degrading habits, break the bonds of national iniquity, and direct attention to spiritual and eternal concerns. Wesley and Whitefield, the founders of Methodism, were the great moral and religious reformers, through the last half of the reign of George II." All who carefully read the history of the Wesley period must be convinced that the fathers of Methodism were not only evangelists seeking to save men from sin and its consequences, and fit them for heaven, but philanthropists and social reformers in the broadest sense. This is pre-eminently true of John Wesley. He mourned over the widespread degradation and misery produced by the fearful intemperance of his day, when almost every second house was a gin-shop, and in spite of fashion and scorn and persecution, lifted up his voice against the drinking customs which everywhere prevailed. No one, either before or since, has denounced the common use and sale of intoxicating liquors in more withing terms, or, considering the state of the public opinion which surrounded him, taken bolder action against it than he did. His sermon on "The Use of Money" contains this paragraph—"Neither may we gain by hurting our neighbour in his body. Therefore we may not sell anything which tends to impair health. Such is eminently all that liquid fire, commonly called drams, or spirituous liquors. It is true, they may have a place in medicine; they may be of use in some bodily disorder, although there would rarely be occasion for them were it not for the unskilfulness of the practitioners. Therefore, such as prepare and sell them only for this end may keep their conscience clear. But who are they? Who prepare them only for this end? Do you know ten distillers in England? Then excuse these. But all who sell them in the common way to any that will buy are poisoners general. They murder His Majesty's subjects by wholesale, neither do they ever pity or spare. They drive them to hell like sheep; and what is their gain? Is it not the blood of these men? Who, then, would envy their large estates and sumptuous palaces? A curse is in the midst of them: the curse of God cleaves to the stones, the timber, the furniture of them. The curse of God is in their gardens, their walks, their groves; a fire that burns to the nethermost hell. Blood, blood is there; the foundation, the floor, the walls, the roof are stained with blood! And canst thou hope, O thou man of blood, though thou art clothed in scarlet and fine linen, and farest sumptuously every day; canst thou hope to deliver down the fields of blood to the third generation? Not so; for there is a God in heaven; therefore thy name shall be rooted out. Like those whom thou hast destroyed body and soul, 'thy memorial shall perish with thee.'"

If we had sermons like this in all the pulpits of the land, people would not say much about the extravagance of Dr. Parker for declaring that if all the Christian Churches would unite to denounce the Liquor Traffic, in twelve months there would be no Liquor Traffic to denounce. Wesley desired all his followers to be free from any complicity in the drink trade. Hence in his "Rules of the Society called Methodists," which were issued May 1st, 1743, we read, "It is expected of all who continue therein that they shall continue to evidence their desire of salvation—first by doing no harm, by avoiding evil of every kind—especially that which is most generally practised, such as drunkenness, buying and selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." This was not simply a pious opinion, but a regulation which he expected to be observed. Hence he records in his "Journal," March 12th, 1743, that when he visited the Society at Newcastle-on-Tyne, he "excluded from the Society seventeen persons for drunkenness, and two for retailing spirituous liquors." We cannot conceive of a man with the conscience, the courage, and consistency of John Wesley denouncing spirituous liquors as "liquid fire," and the retailers of them as "poisoners general," and calling upon his followers to avoid buying and selling, or drinking them, except in cases of extreme necessity, unless he abstained himself. We think it is morally certain that he never drank "spirituous liquors" except as medicine. "Drams," or "spirituous liquors" were the popular and the great demoralising intoxicating beverages of his time, and it was against these that his thunderbolts were hurled. Whether he was a total abstainer from wines and malt liquors is another question which is not so easily answered. These were not so much in use in his day as in ours. If they had been, and had produced the same effect as we witness, there can be very little doubt that he would have condemned them and refrained from their use as he did from spirituous liquors. It is, however, certain that for hygienic reasons he did sometimes abstain from all intoxicants. He wrote to the Bishop of London, "By extraordinary strictnesses and severities, I presume your lordship means the abstaining from wine and animal food, which it is sure, Christianity does not require. . . . I began to do this about twelve years ago, but I resumed the use of them both about two years after, for the sake of some who thought I made it a point of conscience, telling them, 'I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, rather than make my brother to offend.' Dr. Cheyne advised me to leave them off again, and since I have taken his advice I have been free from all bodily disorders." So that for some periods of his life, he not only abstained from ardent spirits, but from all intoxicating liquors. He was the greatest Temperance Reformer of the eighteenth century, and if he were amongst us the convictions he held would bring him into the front rank of total abstainers and prohibitionists.

General religious declension is always followed by social wretchedness and degradation, and a general religious awakening always results in social reform and elevation. This was so in England in the last century. One result of the Evangelical Revival of which Methodism was the dominant factor, according to Green's History, as already quoted, "was the steady attempt, which has never ceased from that day to this, to remedy the guilt, the ignorance, the physical suffering, the social degradation of the profligate and the poor. It was not until Methodism had done its work that the philanthropic movement began." And the influence of Methodist work was as great in America as in England. It is also a significant fact that all the first attempts to deal with the evils of the Liquor Traffic both here and in America were based on the principle of Wesley's Society rule, viz.:—"Avoiding evil of every kind, especially that which is most generally practised, such as drunkenness, buying and selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." Therefore it is no mere assumption to say that Wesley's teaching and practice, and the Evangelical Revival which is largely identical with the work of Methodism, were the seeds from which the modern Temperance movement sprang. It does not invalidate this view to say that the churches, as such, did not immediately fall into line and incorporate this movement, and that even the successors of Wesley allowed his rule on drink to become, to a large extent, a dead letter, and forbade the use of their chapels for temperance meetings, and their ministers to go out of their circuits to advocate total abstinence. This was a sore grief to some of the ministers, and to many of the laity, who were in hearty sympathy with temperance work, and "the steady attempt to remedy" this and other social evils "has never ceased from that day to this." We have entered into the labours of the temperance reformers of early Methodism, and those who thought and acted with them. We advise our readers to study the circumstances of the times and the state of public opinion in the early days of the temperance movement before indulging in unconditional censure of the leaders of the Wesleyan and other churches. Happily, for many years, the Wesleyan Church has been regaining ground, and has now a powerful Temperance Society under the control of the Conference. The following statistics were presented to the Conference of 1898. Bands of Hope, 4,634, with 439,525 enrolled members; Temperance Societies, 1,553, with 87,389 enrolled members. It is a cheering fact that all denominations are now in sympathy with temperance work, and are endeavouring to promote it.

Men Worth Remembering.

I.—REV. W. CARTHY.

BY REV. J. WENN.

HO has raised Howe from the dead?" was the question put by one bookseller to another at the time when Robert Hall was the prince of preachers in England. For Hall was wont, in his vivacious and earnest manner, to ply every theological student or other intelligent and godly young man that he met with, with the query, "Have you read Howe, especially his 'Living Temple'?" "No." "No! then, if you have to sell the coat off your back in order to do it, go and buy him at once, and give yourself no rest till you have read and mastered him." Spurred on by Hall's eloquence and influence, these youths were seen darting in and out of book-shops in quest of Howe. It was in this way that the then all but forgotten Howe was induced, in a new edition, to "revisit the glimpses of the moon."

Howe is still remembered and read by a few persons; but the record of many as brave, though not as renowned, a spirit has well nigh "perished from the earth." Like the poor fellows who, from wounds and weakness, fall out from the ranks of a beaten and retreating army to die alone by the hedge-side or under a tree, so many a valorous soldier of the cross has fallen on the field or been "invalided home," who, in the onrush of the advancing (not beaten) army of the Living God, has been scarcely missed, and soon forgotten. Such has been the fate of the two brethren, some slight recollection of whom it is the object of this and a succeeding paper to revive.

The materials for this task are surprisingly scanty. I cannot discover that either of the brethren kept a regular diary, or any diary at all, that could be of use to me in these attempts. I have had, therefore, to depend upon scattered notices in minute books, chapel schedules, and communications kindly furnished by the following brethren—contemporaries with the subjects of these articles:—Revs. R. Robinson, W. R. Widdowson, W. Cutts, W. Clayton, and Messrs. G. Tucker, G. Edwards, and S. Keeling. Other and younger brethren, now labouring on stations once under the care of Messrs. Carthy and Jefferson, have been at pains to search in minute books and circuit documents for records of facts and incidents which might have added interest to these sketches. But the gleanings in those fields have not repaid the time and labour spent upon them. The following is a fair sample of the letters received. "I have searched high and low; looked up every old book and document for some data re Carthy and Jefferson; but in vain." My thanks are nevertheless due, and are hereby tendered to all the brethren who have aided, or sought to aid, me in this task.

I propose to devote this paper to the late Rev. Wm. Carthy, and the next to the late Rev. Wm. Jefferson.

It is of less import to know when and where a man came into the world than what he was and did after he arrived therein. Hence, I shall make no serious attempt to reconcile the discrepant accounts of Carthy's nationality and birth-place. There is a tradition that he was an Irishman; that his ancestors bore the name McCarthy, which, if true, would indicate a Scoto-Irish descent. In support of this tradition, it is said that the late Joseph Bailey, a great man at that time in our Ilkeston Israel, and a Deed Poll member, having occasion to go to Ireland on business, Carthy went with him, and found whilst there the church in which he was baptised, and that he took a copy of the register of his birth and baptism. If that were so—and the story is circumstantial enough to be true—it seems strange that Joseph Bailey, with whom I was intimate for a couple of years, never mentioned it to me. And stranger still it must appear, that the said "copy" was never officially used. It was my duty to draw up "a short account of Wm. Carthy, deceased," for the District Meeting and Conference of 1862. This account appears verbatim in the published minutes of that year. From that it appears that Mr. Carthy was born at Alrewas, Staffordshire, in the year 1805, that he was converted through the instrumentality of the late Rev. Sampson Turner, who missioned that part of the country in or about 1820" (1821, to be exact). This is all of the "short account" that I need to quote. The question is, Where did I get the facts from? They must have been furnished by Mr. Carthy's relatives or friends; and no exception was taken to them, either at the Ilkeston Quarterly or the Nottingham District Meeting. Anyhow, if Carthy was born in Ireland, he must have been brought to this country whilst quite a child. And it needs no brilliant imagination to figure the future "lawyer" and chapel-builder of the Nottingham District, growing up there in the heart of England as an irrepressible and mischievous lad, inhaling in his rambles and gambols the pure air of the glades and uplands of Needwood Forest, and developing and hardening by sports upon the "green,"—the green which afterwards was to be the scene of his conversion—the muscles of a frame capable of marvellous activity and endurance. Ah! if England only knew how much she owes to village-green preachers!

A good portrait of the outer is often an index, more or less reliable, to the inner man. Of Carthy, I possess only the steel engraving (here given) which appeared in the Magazine many years ago. This, I am told, is a good likeness of the man as he then was. It represents a person of middle height and size, and one who might pass through life without provoking note or comment. But, looking into it more intently, one seems to see in the well-proportioned head, crowned with dark, grow-as-you-please hair; in the spacious brow, puckered a little at the base, the irregular lines being most observable just above the nose; in the shrewd, wide-awake eyes, slightly crow-footed in the corners, indicating a capacity for humour, and perhaps laughter—not "loud, long-continued, uncontrollable, like the neighing of all Tattersall's," but rather a suppressed inward chuckling; in a sufficient nose, faintly suggestive of the Roman type; in the firm mouth and chin—in all these features, I say, one seems to see a striking corroboration of the descriptions and estimates of the man given by those who knew him. For, condensing what they say, I find that, physically, Carthy was of middle size, lithe, active, and capable of almost any amount of continuous toil; that he possessed a pleasing and expressive countenance; was a close observer of men and things; that he was a keen and clever controversialist, and a cheerful colleague and companion; that his native talent was above the average; by means of which he reached a fair position as a preacher, and would have risen higher in this respect had he in early life been instructed in the management of the voice. Some even give it as their opinion that he might have shone in the ranks of scholarship, but for the multifarious and pressing duties of a Primitive Methodist preacher's life. From this judgment, however, I am compelled to dissent. For nearly everything that characterises the scholar—if by this term "learned author" is meant—the sedentary habit, the pale cast of thought, the ignorance of "affairs," and so on, was conspicuous by its absence in him. Indeed, not to pursue the contrast further, Carthy was active and punctilious to a fault. "He would run from end to end of a circuit to prove or disprove a report which should have been utterly beneath his notice." Let us proceed to other and less qualified traits. True as steel to friends, he was terrible to causeless and impenitent enemies. Combined in him were the strength of a man and the pity of a woman. Hence, wrongdoers, whatever their station in life, feared, whilst their victims trusted and loved him. He not only never evaded any claim upon his time or purse, but "the cause which he knew not, he searched out. He delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had no helper." He would, as the phrase runs, go through fire and water to rescue and right oppressed innocence and worth; would walk miles and devote days and nights to the investigation of the case and the vindication of the character of man or woman whose only claim upon his efforts lay in their common human nature. This may sound like fulsome exaggeration. But, apart from the fact that I have no interest in writing thus except to tell the truth, there are a few persons still living who both could and would, if necessary, testify that what I have written above falls short of, instead of overstepping, the truth. Numerous illustrations might be given, but ex uno, disce omnes. A decent, industrious, and struggling tradesman, not a member of our Church, I think, if of any, through affliction and misfortune fell behind in his payments. One of his creditors pursued and threatened to ruin him if a ten pound claim were not met by a given date. Hearing of the case, Carthy inquired into it, and believing the debtor to be honest, went to his creditor, discharged the debt, and his own feeling at the conduct of the creditor at the same time.

Carthy's strength of will and determination of purpose were not to be balked by any amount of opposition. He had his share, more than his share, some think, of this, but whether the overplus might not have been avoided without any sacrifice of principle had the iron-hand been properly gloved, is, perhaps, open to question. Indeed, the sterling qualities of the man, his fearlessness, openness, hatred of meanness and tyranny, and sympathy with the wronged, or whom he supposed to be wronged, unwedded as they were to coolness of judgment and rigid impartiality, were sure to create him plenty of enemies as well as friends. His readiness, too, to espouse the cause of any client, connexional or other, and to fight it through thick and thin to victory, was productive of the same result. But in such contests as were fought out on the floors of church courts, or that arose out of official misunderstandings, Carthy's almost unrivalled knowledge of connexional rule and extensive acquaintance with civil law, gave him an immense advantage over most of his opponents. His legal attainments, which won for him the appellation of "district lawyer," were gained at the feet of one Mr. Enfield, a Nottingham solicitor of mark, who, for years, was the kind and gratuitous Nestor of our ministers of the Nottingham District. Carthy made such a good use of these opportunities that within a few years Mr. Enfield said to him, "Carthy, it is of no further use your coming to me; you know as much about law as I do myself." Thus, armed with an extensive acquaintance with both civil and ecclesiastical law, and with a courage which feared the face of no man, Carthy was a dreaded opponent in debate. "I never knew him foiled in argument," says one who often listened to his contentions. Besides, his legal acumen and stoutness of heart stood to win in cases which would have baffled and beaten men of other qualities. I knew, for example, a trustee of one of our chapels, who, by his overbearing and sulky temper, had wearied out both co-trustees and ministers, and was in consequence, "monarch of all he surveyed." This man found in Carthy a foeman worthy of his steel. The first time they met they instinctively fought; and the next time Carthy was planned there he found the chapel door locked against him. Learning that this was no accident, or piece of forgetfulness on the part of the chapel-keeper, but a deliberate device of the "monarch" to curb and annoy his "minister," the latter promptly fetched a blacksmith, forced the door, and conducted the service, the said trustee, a late-comer, forming one of the audience. This bearish man was informed by the resolute minister that worse would follow if he did not back down into his proper place. Believing that discretion was the better part of valour, he did so, and never remounted the high horse of autocracy whilst Carthy remained on the station. Another illustration of Carthy's power "to keep the de'il off him" may be given here. He was having some shops erected in connection with the Ilkeston Chapel, and had caused to be put up hoarding to protect the public from falling materials. This hoarding, a parish official, "dressed in a little brief authority," ordered to be pulled down. That done, he sent the bill for the workman's wages to Carthy, by whose orders the encroachment, or fancied encroachment, on the street had been made. Carthy refused to pay and was sued in the Derby County Court for the amount. The intrepid man appeared, conducted his own case and won it. Similar legal victories were gained by him, e.g., at Donington, where he attacked the mismanagement of the Grammar School, and brought the mal-administrators to book; at Thoroton, in the Bottesford Circuit, where he, by legal means, wrested our chapel out of the hands of the "Squire," or prevented it from falling into them, I am not quite clear which. And in a score of other matters, small, perhaps, in themselves, but involving serious consequences, Carthy opposed right to might, and by accurate information and dogged determination, succeeded in most.

As a proof of Carthy's invincible resolution to see a thing through that he once undertook, there is the Cause célèbre in the Nottingham District, of fifty years ago. Without mentioning names, a few persons who yet "linger on this side the brook" will remember the case. It was a case of discipline. Carthy was prosecutor, and the defendant a man of position and influence. The yellow records of the case that lie before me as I write, do certainly seem to place Carthy "upon a rock," to quote a favourite phrase of his. But he had, nevertheless, to fight the case through all the courts. And when, at last, the Conference declared against him, the 'cute and irrepressible prosecutor discovered a technical error in the proceedings, and insisted on going the round again. Then there was the case in which Carthy came into collision with Hugh Bourne. Twice only, I think, was the presence of the founder objected to in the higher courts of the Connexion. Once at an early Tunstall Conference, and again, later, at a Nottingham District Meeting. This meeting was not held at Nottingham, but in another town in the district. I suppress names, although I doubt if any be living now to whom this incident will not be news. A young minister had entangled himself with a couple of persons of the opposite sex. All that is meant by entanglement here is that the lad had made love to one person and married another.

The jilted lady pursued the false one in the Connexion courts, and as the "irregular" brother then happened to be junior colleague to Carthy and crept under Carthy's wing, the superintendent took up his case and fought it out. Before the case came on at the District Meeting, it was known that H. Bourne had "blackballed" it, and that he intended to be there, and to see right done. But, to his surprise and that of others, Carthy objected in limine to the presence of the "intruder." "Mr. Bourne," he said, "had no locus standi in that court. What circuit did he represent? Who had sent him thither? He protested in the name of all Connexional rule and equity against a case being opposed by a voice that was more powerful than any ten men's there, and by a person who, though dearly loved and esteemed by them all, had not a leg to stand on in that meeting." What the meeting would have done with Hugh Bourne, I do not know, but the dear and just old man relieved it of embarrassment by offering to be silent on any question or case in which objection might be taken to his speaking. To this Carthy agreed. That episode, notwithstanding Carthy's almost Irish delight in a scrimmage, was doubtless to him, as I know it was to others, a very unpleasant one. But here is another which, in its result, would cause him unmixed satisfaction. For, whether Carthy was Scoto-Irish or not, there was enough of the thistle in him to have justified him in engraving upon his crest, if he had one, the Scotch national motto, "Nemo me impune lacessit." Soon after his arrival at Ilkeston, some fifty years ago, the vicar of that parish gave it out that "he would turn all the chapels into hen-roosts before he had been there a dozen years." To his surprise and chagrin, every Nonconformist Church in the place, with the single exception of the Unitarian, had, within that period, acquired a new and more commodious place of worship. Stung to the quick that the tables had been so completely turned upon him, the vicar rashly seized any weapon that offered with which to check and hinder the "chapel building mania." Calling at Mr. S. Keeling's—an official of ours at Ilkeston, and still living—after Mr. Carthy's death, he saw a portrait of the deceased above the mantel-piece. "What's that?" said he, pointing to the offending photo. "Mr. Carthy's portrait." "Why is it there?" "Because of the respect I have for his memory. I never knew a man for whom I conceived so much esteem in so short a time, as for him." Picking up his hat, the vicar strode angrily to the door, exclaiming as he did so, "I never knew any good of him." At a loss to understand such evident animosity against a dead man, especially on the part of a professed minister of Christ—for Mr. Keeling was not on the ground when the offence was given—this gentleman made it his business to inquire into the cause of it. And this is the story that was told him by one who was intimately acquainted with the whole affair. When Carthy was preparing for the erection of Bath Street Chapel, Ilkeston, he waited upon the surrounding gentry for subscriptions. He obtained in this way a respectable list of promises, and took it to Squire Mundy, of Shiply Hall, a gentleman who, living near to the town and employing many "hands" who lived in it, he conceived would help him handsomely. Mr. Mundy said to him on the production of the list, "I am told in a letter that this list is a fictitious one." "Can I see that letter?" "Yes." "May I take a copy of it?" "Certainly." The letter was from the Vicar of Ilkeston. Carthy returned home, wrote the vicar demanding instant retraction and apology. The reverend gentleman replied, expressing regret (if he had been misinformed) that he had written the letter. Carthy re-insisted upon a plain and full retraction and apology within a given number of hours, or else—? The vicar complied, with ill-grace enough, it may be imagined, and the wronged minister took the document to Mr. Mundy, who, having read it, gave a donation of £5 to the building fund, and closed the door of his Hall against the vicar for ever. Thus signally did "vaulting" bigotry "o'erleap itself and fall on the other side."

It only remains for me to record some of Carthy's chapel building exploits. He built in what was then the larger Nottingham District no fewer than twenty-two chapels, at a cost of £7,743, leaving a debt upon them of £5,455. As will be surmised, some of these structures were small and unpretentious, but suited to the circumstances of the people who worshipped in them. Several of them, for whose erection truth compels me to admit there never was any crying necessity, have since been sold. In fact, had the great Free Church movement of our time been in progress in his, Carthy would, surely, notwithstanding his ultra denominationalism, have stayed his hand. Of the rest, Portland Row, Ripley Circuit, not for its size or architectural distinction, but for the steps that preceded its erection; "Bethel" chapel, in what was "Coalpit Lane," but now, and since the close of the Crimean War, called after the Duke of Cambridge, "Cambridge Street," Sheffield; and Bath Street, Ilkeston, remain as monuments of Carthy's enterprise and tireless activity.

front of it, in which repose the ashes of Thomas Morgan, and other local and less known heroes, was erected in 1835, and was, without exception, the most imposing and finished structure the Connexion at that time possessed. It cost £3,000, and the debt upon it at completion, was £2,100. This amount of debt on a chapel of that size would, to-day, cause but little anxiety, but such was the hardness of those times compared with these, the low wages of workmen, and the generally poor circumstances of the trustees and people connected with the place, that it was a question for some time whether its head could be kept above water. I well remember "Old William Wright," as he was called, telling me that the trustees were driven to their wits' end to save the chapel from the hammer, and themselves from ruin. Carthy could build, but not fill chapels, and so it came about that the circuit had to petition Conference—the ground of the plea being the perilous state of the Trust—to station a man to it who could do this latter thing. The Conference appointed John Verity, a man who, by his pleasing and popular style of address, succeeded in conserving the results of Carthy's dash and energy. Some unpleasant feeling was created in the minds of one or two of Carthy's immediate successors, on the ground of the heavy debt left upon the property; and they may, whilst this was brewing, have forgotten "that one soweth and another reapeth," but, in the clearer light of eternity, where matters are viewed in juster proportions, and weighed in fairer scales than they can be here, doubtless those brethren—they are all there now—"rejoice together" in the fact that their divergent gifts co-operated to the production of one grand result.

Bath Street Chapel, Ilkeston, was erected in 1852, and considering the size of the town at that time, and the circumstances of our people, was a credit to Carthy's pluck and perseverance. But here again, the mark was over-shot in the matter of cost. It may be recollected by a few persons that on Carthy's lamented death, I was sent from the Edinburgh Mission to fill the vacancy. This was in 1861. I found the trustees in difficulties; indeed, writs were out against them. And one of my first duties was, after fishing out the facts of the Trust, to run down to Grantham and beg the suing parties to stay their hands. Of course, I made the most of the mournful circumstances in which the Trust and the whole station had recently been placed, and of my own late coming to the circuit, and consequent inexperience of its state. The solicitor in the matter kindly listened to me, and on my promising to see his clients righted, arrested the writs. It is needless here and now to detail the struggles we had to meet the engagements into which, on behalf of the trustees, I had entered; but they were met, and the chapel, altered, improved, and with new and commodious schoolrooms added, stands there to-day in one of the best positions in the borough as an evidence of Carthy's persistent and herculean efforts.

Portland Row is a mining hamlet in the parish of Selston, Ripley Circuit. Here, for years and years, we had a good and flourishing society, but no building, except a house, to put it into. All the land thereabouts was in the hands of one statesman, Lord Melbourne, after whose death it fell to Earl Cowper, a minor, and could not, it was said, on account of his minority be either sold or leased. Lord Palmerston married the widow, Earl Cowper's mother, and so was drawn into the negotiations that were being carried on about a site. Carthy was our chief agent in them. The minutes drawn up, and letters written on this case, would drive any man compelled to read them to despair. At length, Carthy suggested that as writing had failed, himself and Joseph Bailey should go up to London and see Lord and Lady Palmerston. They went, and discovered that the noble pair were down at Broadlands, at the far end of Hampshire. "Let us follow them," said Carthy; and away they went. Arriving in the evening, they were received by his lordship with great bonhomie, and after refreshments had, were invited to stay the night. This they did, and the following morning found that the house—Lord Palmerston being at that time the head of the Government—was full of English and foreign guests. Carthy, being a minister, and the only one present, was given the place of honour at table, and asked to do duty as chaplain. This he did, but at breakfast was in a quandary as to what he should ask for, as neither he nor his colleague knew the names of some of the dishes on the sideboard. Bailey, a shrewd man, whispered Carthy to this effect, "Let us ask first for something we do know the name of, and listen to what the others ask for, catch the names of the same, and follow suit." By this stratagem they managed to play themselves off as "diners out," and at the same time to gratify their palates with unaccustomed viands. Afterwards, however, when Carthy's openness and honesty re-asserted themselves, he said to his comrade, "What a precious couple of hypocrites we were!" After years of writing, working, and waiting, a site was granted and a chapel built.

Less effort, but no less shrewdness, was needed to secure land for a chapel at Kimberley, Notts, a large village then on the Ilkeston Circuit, but now, and for years past, the head of a station. This story, in which Lord Melbourne figures again, is extremely interesting, but too long for telling here, and I must hasten to a close.

I have said little or nothing about Carthy's inner experience and Christian life, for the simple reason that I have no information on the subject. Had he kept a diary and I had had access to it, doubtless this lack could have been supplied. In its absence, one may almost certainly conclude from the esteem in which he was held by pious persons, inside and outside our churches, and from the general mourning at his death, that he was not only a man, but a saintly man. From all that has come under my notice I judge him to have been good, but not goody. There was nothing flabby or flashy about him; no "building with untempered mortar, nor crying peace, peace, when and where there was no peace." If he appeared, as at times he did, harsh and partial, this was because his fine moral qualities existed side by side, so to say, and did not blend so as to soften and subdue each other into a true and tuneful harmony. On this account some persons misread him; but they had only to re-read, or rather, read the next page of his life to find out their mistake. Had Carthy been a different man from what he was, he could not have accomplished the work, weathered the storms, or conquered the difficulties which awaited, overtook, and confronted him in his busy life. The material that he had to whip into shape, as one or two persons still living know, was of the most gnarly and intractable kind, demanding that the tools and the workman should be suited thereto.

The modern phrase, "We cannot live on the past," expresses only half a truth. It is equally true that we cannot live apart from, independently of, the past. It is still truer to say that had the past not been what it was, the present would not have been what it is. The present grows out of the past as the branch out of the bole of the tree, or the flower out of the plant. We are, in a large and important sense, what the past has enabled us to become. And, applying this view of things to the present generation of Primitive Methodists, one may reasonably affirm that it would prove itself very ungrateful for, and unworthy of, that glorious heritage into which it has entered, could it forget or undervalue the hard conditions, the self-denying and consuming toils, and the poor earthly rewards which lay back of it and which furthered its development. "Poor Carthy!" writes one, "he did a great amount of work for the Connexion for which he was very poorly paid; but he is at home now." Yes; at home and at rest; and doubtless, if permitted to review his career in this world, would, had he to recommence it, prefer the same lot to that of the richest modern sybarite.

The Widow's Investment.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE.

THE chapel stood on a mount, and was the conspicuous architectural object for miles around. "Rosehill" was one of the landmarks of the district. The name was euphonic and æsthetic, partly truth, and partly fiction. That the edifice was on a hillock was a geographical fact, but the floral suggestion was purely imaginary. No roses could grow in the neighbourhood of the Imperial Engineering Company's furnaces and the factories of the Excelsior Iron Works. Even the chapel was not exempt from the blackening process which went on six days a week, when the furnaces were roaring, and the chimneys belching forth their smoky clouds. All was done that could be done to save it from atmospheric contamination. The turrets of the towers were regilded three times a year. It was some satisfaction that the Dales at Woodlea Hall, five miles away, could see the turrets glittering in the sunlight on a clear Sabbath morning.

That the chapel was the property "of the Religious Community known by the title of the Primitive Methodist Connexion" was well understood. The magic clauses of the Connexional Model Deed were incorporated in the legal document in the custody of the trustees. Nevertheless, the denominational appellation was seldom used. Far and near, the chapel was known as "Rosehill." By-and-by, even this designation fell into disuse, and the name of Mr. David Dale became identified with the sanctuary where he and his delighted to worship.

The association of the name of David Dale with the chapel on the hill was the spontaneous recognition of a life-time's service.

The cottages are still to be seen where the early Primitive Methodists were wont to meet. Reminiscences abound of the experiences of those sacred days. To listen to Barbara Brightside, when the old times were recalled, to hear her descriptions of the preachers, the famous sermons, the memorable hymns, the miraculous conversions, was a recital never to be forgotten.

The recollections centred in the personality of David Dale. In those days he had been in the offices of the Imperial Engineering Company. Beginning in the lowest grade, as the years had sped he had risen in the estimation of the proprietors, and made himself invaluable to their interests. Unbounded as his energies were in the secular pursuits of his life, his interest in the "cause," and his devotion to its weal, never gave sign of diminution. Even when he established the "Excelsior" works, his religious procedure was undisturbed.

"Rosehill" would never have been built if David Dale had not taken the initiative. His was the mind that planned, the eye that surveyed, the heart that inspired, and the purse that lightened the burden. Through all the years of its history his soul was wrapped up in its manifold enterprises.

There were those who thought that a change would be inevitable when the engineer purchased Woodlea Hall and took up his residence there. Certainly there were changes, but the changes were rearrangements.

His Continental business was extensive, but times without number he had crossed the Channel to be at home for the Sabbath Day. To Glasgow he was frequently summoned. It excited no comment, so often it had occurred, when he returned from Scotland to be at the class-meeting on the Tuesday night.

Visitors came to Woodlea Hall from all parts of Europe. French, German, Belgian, and Russian engineers arrived to arrange contracts with the "Excelsior" proprietor. Whoever might be the guests over the Sabbath, they were driven to "Rosehill" with the family for both services of the day.

One year, at the Anniversary celebration, seated in the Dales' pew, was a Russian Count, a member of the Greek Church, a German Baron, who adhered to Roman Catholicism, and a French savant, who made no secret of his Agnosticism.

The relations of the Dales with the other members of the Rosehill congregation were of the most cordial and affectionate nature. The majority of the men and lads were employés of the engineer; but this secular bond did not explain the attachment. There were secret links between the hearts of David Dale and these numerous families who worshipped with him. Had not he been their human refuge when storms had strewn their homes with wreckage? Was it not to him, man and woman, youth and maid, instinctively turned when life seemed ominous and unmanageable? When they had watched by the side of their sick ones, had he not stolen gently in and shared their vigil? He had given his heart to them. Their secrets were known to him. Many a strange confession had been breathed in his ear. His name was as "ointment poured forth," for he had been to these whom he knew and loved the best, "as a hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

When Barbara Brightside thanked God for His providence, David Dale was always present in her mind. His face, to her grateful soul, was as the face of God. It was well for the widow that she did not know all. If the truth had been in her possession, she would have been overwhelmed with the beneficence which enriched her solitary years.

James Brightside had gone to his grave, leaving his secret to his friend and employer. For fifteen years the secret had been unbreathed. It was only when Barbara "fell on sleep" that the facts were revealed to him whose right it was to know.

David Dale was seated at the secretaire in his private office despatching replies to the letters which required his personal supervision. There were but fifty minutes till post-time, and a score of the commercial inquiries could brook no delay. So engrossed was he that the tap at the door was unheard, and hence unheeded. The entrance of a clerk interrupted the speed of his quill.

"Well, Harold?" he said interrogatively, as Dodgson waited for the sign to speak.

"Mrs. Brightside has sent a messenger to say that her husband is nearing his end, and that he is praying to see you. He cannot die till he speaks to you again. She begs of you to lose no time, as he is sinking fast."

Sliding the lid of the secretaire, without a word the master took his hat from the peg, and made his way to the home where death was hovering.

The wife and the nurse were at the side of the sick man's bed. One glance at the face on the pillow convinced Mr. Dale that the moments of earth were few for his life-long friend. A look of relief, and yet of fear, sprang into the eyes of the dying man as the master entered the chamber. His excitement was uncontrollable. With wild gesture he bade the women leave the room. He waited till the door was closed upon them, and then, thrusting his hand beneath his pillow, drew out a bundle of papers and forced them into his visitor's grasp. Turning his face to the wall, he wept and moaned during the anguished minutes while the master perused the direful documents.

"James," said Mr. Dale, in serious, yet gentle tones, "this is a sad business. Why didn't you speak to me when you thought of changing the investment? Does Barbara know of this?"

The face which met the questioner's gaze was the face of the shamed and hopeless. The dying man writhed in the agony of remorse.

"The fool I was," he stammered, "to do the thing in secret. The money's gone—every penny! I meant to leave you word and hoped to have given you a big surprise. The packet came this morning. I dare not tell the wife. It would kill Barbara if she heard the news from me. My poor wife!" he groaned. "The money was more her's than mine, for she saved the most of it; and now it is gone—gone; and she'll be left a pauper!"

The tears rained down his cheeks in the realisation of the tragic calamity which came to end his life, and to make the future of his widow a desolation.

Not a shadow of hope could the master perceive as he scanned the cruel papers he held in his hands. Bravely banishing the thought, he strove to console the stricken husband.

"Never mind, James," he said, putting the papers in his pocket, and taking the hand of the dying man. "I am the executor of your will, and I will see that all is put right. You need have no fear on that score. Barbara and I will make some arrangement so that she will be able to live in comfort. As to your heir, he is young enough to gather his own fortune."

An hour passed away. The presence of David Dale was a consolation to the man to whom death was hastening. They spoke of the solemn realities, of the Friend of the dying, of the Home of the redeemed. Barbara crept in to hear the sacred whispers. The eyes of the dying man would fasten on her face, and his soul was harassed in the thought of the nameless wrong he had done to her; but the vision of the generous face of the master, kneeling by his side, eased the anguish, and awakened hope.

That night the engineer was the last to leave the offices. The clerks had long since departed, but he sat on, in the privacy of his room. Before him were the papers with the disastrous intelligence.

James Brightside had left the Imperial Engineering Company's service to become the foreman of the "Excelsior" Works. Through all the years he had been a faithful servant of David Dale. With a lucrative salary, and with ceaseless economy, he and Barbara had managed to save over a thousand pounds. On his master's advice, the money had been invested in a well-established shipping concern, and for years the interest had been a handsome increment.

His name had become known to the speculators. In an evil hour he had yielded to a tempting bait. The assurances of high percentages had caught his fancy. Without a word to living soul, he had withdrawn his capital, and re-invested it in the company of larger promise. In his heart he revelled in the adroitness of his stealthy transaction. There was no suspicion of evil. He had left all his papers concerning the new investment for the scrutiny of his executor, and meant to die cherishing the thought that an ampler provision than was imagined would be left for his widow's support, and a larger fortune for his heir. On the morning of the death-day, the disaster shattered his dreams. He died penniless, and left his widow to poverty abject.

In the silent room David Dale reviewed the position. Nothing could be done, for the collapse of the speculators was irretrievable. Barbara would have a home, for the house and furniture were safe, but the sources of visible maintenance were cut off.

What was to be done? Long and anxiously the master brooded. Finally, enclosing the papers in a foolscap envelope, he locked them in his private safe, and sought the coachman for the drive to the Hall.

The will was read on the evening of the interment. Its terms declared that the income of the investment was to provide the widow's sustenance; at her decease £500 was to be paid to the Rosehill Trustees for the reduction of their debt; the remainder to pass to the testator's nephew.

The humane provision of the will was the sole satisfaction which remained to the woman bereaved. Of the momentous contents of the packet which had reached her husband on the morning of his death, she had no knowledge. It was sufficient for her that all the papers were in the possession of Mr. Dale as the administrator of the testament.

"Now, Barbara," he said, as he prepared to leave, "James entrusted all the documents to me. I have all the information that is required. You need have no concern about anything. I will see that everything passes through my hands, and I will let you have your dividend quarterly. It will simplify matters if I give it you, as it comes, in gold. And if ever you want more than the ordinary, a line or a word will be enough."

Barbara began to age when her widowhood commenced. She drooped and whitened in the loneliness of her lot. The years were long and the days were dreary. Her wedded life had been one of unbroken peace. That she was favoured in having such a profitable investment she profoundly felt, and in having a friend like David Dale, whose solicitude never wavered. Her quarterly dividends varied as they used to do in James's days. Sometimes fifteen, oftener twenty, occasionally twenty-five pounds, would be handed to her by Harold Dodgson in the name of Mr. Dale.

A pathetic figure she was on the Sabbath morning as she passed down the aisle to her seat in the centre of the chapel. Her black silk dress rustled as she walked, and her face was full of sadness, set in the bonnet with her weeds. There was pathos in the care with which she took the very place in the pew where she had worshipped by the side of her partner. They had had two sittings in the same pew from the day "Rosehill" was opened. James had sat at the end near the aisle, and she at his right hand. No one had ventured to suggest that as only one seat was occupied, she should only pay for one. She paid the rent for the two sittings, and left James' seat vacant. It grieved her when the empty seat was required for the use of a stranger, and she never failed to remind the one who sat in his place, that he or she was sitting where a good man had been wont to worship.

James Brightside had contributed for years to most of the Connexional Funds. When the circular announcing the Orphanage Anniversary came to Barbara in the first year of her widowhood, she wondered whether the investment would warrant the usual donation. With the circular bearing her late husband's name, she made her way to the offices of the "Excelsior" works.

"Well, Barbara," Mr. Dale exclaimed, as the clerk ushered her into his office, "what can I do for you to-day?"

"The subscription for the Orphan Home is due," she replied. "James always sent two guineas. I could spare one myself, but I was wondering whether the capital invested would admit of the two guineas as usual."

"Oh, certainly, certainly!" her executor rejoined. "The capital is just as it was, but the dividends are all right. And now that you have mentioned these annual donations, James was a donor to the Missionary Society, and the Superannuated Preachers, Widows and Orphans' Fund. I am glad to say you will be able to continue all these gifts, if you find that your regular dividends suffice for your personal needs."

The tears were in her eyes, in her gladness for the opulence which was hers.

"James will be glad to think," she soliloquised, as she returned home, "that I am in a position to continue the gifts. What a blessing we were careful through all the years, and got the money so finely invested! To think that I have a settled income, and more to spare for the interests of the Church! There are few widows enjoying investments, and none with such a one as mine!"

Barbara's visit was a means of grace to David Dale. His gladness was inexpressible that the secret had been kept from her cognisance. The "works" were increasingly busy. He was wealthier by thousands year by year.

The French savant was the first of the foreigners to observe old Barbara Brightside. Monsieur Delcasse noticed that in the singing of Bonar's beautiful hymn-prayer, "When the weary, seeking rest," at the fifth line of the fifth verse,

"When the widow weeps to Thee, Sad and lone and low,"

the little woman in the widow's weeds sank to her seat.

So inquisitive were his investigations at the dinner-table, that his host's prevarication was obvious, and at length Mr. Dale observed: "By-and-by, I will tell you all there is to tell about Barbara and her investment."

"By-and-by?" the Frenchman queried. "When is by-and-by?"

"When Barbara does not need the dividends, and the heir comes to claim his own," Mr. Dale explained.

It was a curious coincidence that M. Delcasse should be staying at Woodlea Hall when Barbara breathed her last. That death had touched her had been clear for many months. The summons tarried, and the delay was a time of radiant calm. She was overwhelmed with the bounty which had encircled her widowhood, and whenever Mr. Dale called to see her, iterated and reiterated her passionate gratitude for his fidelity to her investment.

The heir had been resident in Australia for twenty years. As a youth, Howard Brightside had emigrated to seek his fortune. Nothing could appease Barbara's anxiety to see her husband's nephew before she died.

A big, broad-chested, handsome man he was, with genial face, and eyes frank and winning.

Barbara's pride was unbounded. The cruellest pang was the knowledge that she could not take him to the chapel.

"Oh!" she would murmur twenty times a day, "How I wish I could lean on your arm and walk to Rosehill! You could have sat in your uncle's seat!"

It was in the evening when she gave him her farewell counsel.

"You won't forget, Howard," she whispered, clinging to his hand, "that half of the investment is to go to the chapel. Send the trustees a nice letter just to show you approve of your uncle's legacy to them. And, if you take my advice, you will consult with Mr. Dale about your share. He will tell you where it is. You had better not touch it. A grander investment you could not have. It has been life and peace to me."

In the early hours of the morning following, Barbara's spirit took its flight. Her body was laid to rest by the side of the man she had loved the best on earth.

The French savant was one of the last to leave the side of the grave. He was startled from his reverie by hearing himself addressed by name.

"Come, Monsieur Delcasse!" Mr. Dale called. "Mr. Brightside is going with me to the office.

There are many things he ought to hear. If you care to come, your kindly interest in Barbara may be satisfied."

"You should never have known the truth about the investment," David Dale began, when the three of them were locked in the private room, "if your uncle's will did not compel me to give you the revelation. These papers will explain all," he proceeded, unlocking the safe, and unfolding the hidden documents.

Not a word was spoken as Howard Brightside inspected the speculators' direful confession.

"Why, there is no investment at all!" he cried, wonder written on his face. "My uncle's will is worthless!"

The engineer nodded assent.

Silence ensued.

"Then the dividends to my aunt have been given from your private means?" the heir without possession exclaimed in amazement.

David Dale confusedly replied with an affirmative gesture.

"God bless you for your kindness to the widow!" Howard Brightside exclaimed, with genuine pathos in his tones, and gripping the hand of the man who had financed the void investment. "As for me," he continued, "it matters not. I take my uncle's intention for the deed, and honour him none the less that his money can never be mine. I have as much as is good for a man to hold. My only regret is that the 'Rosehill' trustees can never receive the legacy meant for them."

"Why not?" M. Delcasse suggested.

The two men stared at the interlocutor.

"Count Streletski will be delighted to give one hundred pounds; Baron Barnhelm, though a Romanist, will be proud to similarly subscribe; I shall be grateful for the privilege of giving the third hundred, and—"

"I will provide the balance!" Howard Brightside interjected, "as a thank-offering that my aunt's widowhood was free from sordid care!"

And so it came to pass, and the world was none the wiser.

New Discoveries and Explorations in their Bearing on the Scriptures.

VIII.—LIFE IN A CHRISTIAN CITY OF EGYPT IN GRÆCO-ROMAN TIMES.

By ROBERT HIND.

SINCE the publication of the famous "Sayings of the Lord," which readers of this magazine will remember created such a profound interest among all classes of thoughtful people a little over twelve months ago, the two fortunate discoverers, Mr. Bernard P. Grenfell and Mr. Arthur S. Hunt, have been engaged in deciphering some of the other documents which they dug out of the ruins of Behneseh, the ancient Oxyrhynchus. The first instalment* has been issued recently by the Græco-Roman Branch of the Egypt Exploration Fund, and is hardly less interesting than the "Logia" themselves. It contains a fragment of what is probably the oldest known manuscript of the New Testament in existence, besides valuable portions of Plato, Thucydides, Xenophon, Homer, Demosthenes, Sophocles, Herodotus, and other classical writers. In addition to these literary documents, there are an enormous number of another kind, private letters, wills, writings dealing with the administration of public affairs and the taxation of the country. For the most part, these papyri are in a good state of preservation, thanks to the care with which they have been stored away in the Government offices. They are so varied in character as to bring up before the people of to-day, in an exceedingly vivid and detailed manner, the life of the people of a Greek city in Egypt in the first centuries of the Christian era, and it is impossible to study them without realising that human nature to-day is much what it was then, having the same virtues and vices, its life brightened with the same amenities and courtesies, and darkened with the same evils as those existing at the present time. A writer in "Biblia," impressed with this fact, calls into requisition the saying of the old Hebrew, "There is nothing new under the sun."

In the New Testament documents are several verses from the first chapter of St. Matthew's gospel. It is not necessary to refer to these writings at length, as the only difference between them and our own versions are a few changes in the spelling of the proper names.

Not the least interesting of the recovered documents are the private letters. Some of these are of a formal kind, but they are important, inasmuch as they throw considerable light on the fashions and customs of the day. Here is one of several invitations to dinner, "Chæremon requests your company at dinner at the table of the Lord Serapis in the Serapeum to-morrow, the 15th, at 9 o'clock," and yet another, "Hexais requests your company at dinner in celebration of the marriage of her children at her house to-morrow, the 5th, at 9 o'clock." These notes indicate that 9 o'clock was probably the fashionable hour for dinner, and that the invitations to dine on great occasions were sent out on the day previous. The form of the invitation, too, seems singularly modern, and shows how little change has taken place in many of those things in which modern society regards itself as specially adept. Feast days and other holidays were made the occasions of visits between friends, and the hosts did not omit to meet the visitors on their arrival in the town. Whether the boats were as punctual as in modern times does not transpire, though, in the case of rowing boats there was no reason why they should not. At least, equestrians need not have been less able to fix the time of their arrival than those people who to-day travel by train. "Greeting," writes one of these citizens of Behneseh, "my dear Serenia, from Petosiris. Be sure, dear, to come up on the 20th for the birthday festival of the god, and let me know whether you are coming by boat or by donkey, in order that we may send for you accordingly. Take care not to forget. I pray for your continued health."

The following letter gives us glimpses of many aspects of the life of this ancient people. It refers to the old story of falling in love and becoming engaged to be married. Then, as now, it is evident, young men became addicted to dissolute habits, and made it necessary for prudent parents, anxious for the welfare of their daughters, to intervene for the purpose of breaking off the betrothal. The phraseology of the document is especially impressive, because of the dignified and yet frank bearing of the writer. The feelings of the young lady are not even hinted at; we learn nothing as to whether she may have influenced her father to take this step, or endeavoured to hold him back from it. On this point there is a delicacy and reserve that could only be the outcome of refinement and culture, and it is all the more marked because of the honesty with which he deals with the offender, and states the cause of the rupture. Further, whatever sorrow and anger there may be in the heart of the father of the young lady, he does not express any in his letter. He does not rate and scold the young man, or even withhold from him the appellations of respect that are due between gentlemen in their intercourse with each other. The young man's conduct has been infamous and unpardonable, but until the betrothal has been annulled in proper form he addresses him as "my honourable son-in-law." Nevertheless, the decision at which he has arrived is irrevocable. One is glad to note that the reason for this extreme measure is not one dictated by any worldly feeling, but by the highest moral principle. The young man may be still wealthy, influential, and even a pet in society, but he shall not be the husband of this young lady, because he has given himself "over to lawless deeds, which are pleasing neither to God nor man, and are not fit to be put into writing." United to such a man he cannot see any prospect of his daughter having the peaceful and quiet life he desires for her. Here is the document: "Forasmuch it has come to my ears that you are giving yourself over to lawless deeds, which are pleasing neither to God nor man, and are not fit to be put in writing, I think it well that the engagement between you and her, my daughter Euphemia, should be dissolved, seeing that, as is aforesaid, I have heard that you are giving yourself over to lawless deeds, and that I wish my daughter to live a peaceful and quiet life. I therefore send you the present deed of the dissolution of the engagement between you and her, my daughter Euphemia, by the hand of the most illustrious advocate aforesaid with my own signature, and I have taken a copy of this document, written by the most illustrious advocate aforesaid (Anastasius). Wherefore, for the security of the said Euphemia, my daughter, I send you this deed of separation and dissolution written on the 11th day of the month Epeiph, in the 11th indiction. I, John, aforesaid, father of Euphemia, my daughter, send the present deed of separation and dissolution to you, Phoebammon, my most honourable son-in-law as is above written." The document not only reflects credit upon Euphemia's father, but also upon the member of the legal profession upon whom devolved the duty of drawing it up. Reading it, one feels that the title "illustrious advocate" is not wholly used as a mere matter of courtesy.

Another of these documents shows that the law allowed damages, not from private persons only and business firms, but from the authorities of the city. A girl was injured by the fall of a house, and claimed damages from the governing body. Before it was paid, however, a physician was appointed to report on the case, and his document is contained in this discovery. It reads:—"Your grace sent us, in consequence of a petition received by you from Aurelius Dioscorus, son of Dorotheus, of Oxyrhynchus, to make a report in writing on his daughter, who, as he complained, had been injured by the fall of his house which had occurred. We accordingly went to Dioscorus' house, and saw that the girl had several cuts in her hip, and wounds near the shoulder and on the right knee, we therefore present this report." We do not know that the law in this country holds the town corporations and their surveyors responsible for allowing buildings that are unsafe to be erected, or those that, through decay, have become unfit for human habitation, but not a few will believe that such a law would be righteous and salutary.

There are documents here bearing on the appointments of guardians over orphan children, others on sales and leases of land, and yet others that are a kind of Promissory Note given as a guarantee of honesty by one person in a position of trust. Flavius Apion the younger, is evidently either a landed proprietor of some consideration, or a dealer in agricultural implements. In either case he requires a watchman. Aurelius Menas secures this appointment, but to hold it he has to sign an undertaking to pay twenty-four solidi should he be shown to have been a party to any theft of the agricultural plant that has been placed in his charge. So that in those days, not only was the ordinary thief a well-known character against whom it was necessary to take precautions, but trusted servants were at times accustomed to betray their masters' interests, and make common cause with the burglar. Nor was thieving the only vice to which these ancients were addicted. Then, as now, gambling was a practice only too common, and great ladies at times became victims to it, with the result that some of their most valuable trinkets occasionally found their way to the pawnbroker. What would the law courts of England to-day have to say about a payment of interest at the rate of four per cent. per month, equal to forty-eight per cent. per annum? That is what one of the ladies of Behneseh paid, who had also pledged several of her personal adornments, the want of which she felt to be very inconvenient. Among the articles pledged were caskets of sandal-wood, one of onyx, a white veil with a real purple border, armlets, etc., and the letter from which this information is taken was written to her friend beseeching her to redeem them.

One of the most valuable literary documents in this collection is a part of a poem by Sappho, and addressed to her brother Charaxus. The high literary quality and the sweet humanness of this beautiful production may be left to speak for themselves. It has been translated into English.

"Sweet Nereids, grant to me

That home unscathed my brother may return,
And every end, for which his soul shall yearn, Accomplished see!

And then, immortal Queen,

Blot out the past, that thus his friends may know
Joy, shame his foes,—nay, rather let no foe
By us be seen!

And may he have the will

To me his sister some regard to show,
To assuage the pain he brought, whose cruel blow
My soul did kill.

Yea, mine, for that ill name

Whose biting edge, to shun the festal throng Compelling, ceased awhile; yet back ere long
To goad us came."

Mr. James S. Colton, the well-known archæologist, has expressed surprise that there are so few direct references to the Christian religion in the documents that have been examined up to this time. Perhaps, in the large number remaining to be published there will be some interesting fragments of this kind. There can be no doubt that the Christian religion took a firm hold upon the place, and as the town, although in the provinces, was large and populous, it must have exercised a large influence throughout Egypt. It was the seat of a bishop, and there were in it at one time 10,000 monks. It is at least pleasing to learn that on the whole the city was distinguished for its morality. Order and justice prevailed in public life, and in private life there was a singular absence of crime.

IX.—THE LABOUR QUESTION IN THE TIMES OF THE PHARAOHS.

It may prove rather disappointing to those who are constantly asking when the labour disputes that so seriously affect trade and commerce will come to an end to be informed that there were trades' unions and even strikes, thousands of years before the dawn of the Christian era. If they have continued so long, the natural inference to draw is that they will continue for some time to come. Wise men will be in no hurry to meet troubles, but making the best they can of the present, await calmly the complications that may arise, feeling confident that some settlement will sooner or later be made, that will bring yet nearer the time when all men's good shall be each man's rule. In the ancient city of Thebes, in the reign of Ramses III., there was a trade dispute attended by several riots. The workmen seem to have had a righteous cause, and sought by fair and peaceable means to obtain justice. They and their families were starving. They held meetings and appointed deputations to persons of influence—the priests, and “the keeper of the books,” who was probably not a mere clerk, but a manager. The ancient document now lying in the museum at Turin, and recently deciphered, reports the words of the man appointed to speak to these persons on behalf of the deputation: “Behold, we are face to face with famine. We have neither nourishment, nor oil, nor vestments; we have no fish; we have no vegetables. We have already sent a petition to our sovereign lord, the Pharaoh, praying him to give us these things, and now we address the governor, in order that he might give us the wherewithal to live.” This deputation waited on the authorities two months after the men had come out on strike. The dates are given in the document, so that the time can be fixed accurately. They were under police guard, but at times broke away, crying, “Go tell your chief what we tell you. It is famine which speaks by our mouths.” They had become desperate, the pangs of hunger preventing them from being able to reason. The keeper of the books writes: “To argue with them was useless; there was great agitation. I gave them the strongest answer I could imagine, but their words were true, and came from their hearts.” The distress of the poor men had evidently touched the book-keeper’s heart, and, so the records say, it became absolutely necessary to distribute some scant rations among them. The name of the leader of the men is given. Kohus must have been a good organiser, intelligent, skilful, and possessing the courage of a lion. When he failed to realise his object by more rational methods, he advised an attack on the stores. “Let us fall upon the stores of provisions, and let the governor’s men go and tell him what we have done.” The suggestion was acted upon as soon as it was given. The keeper of the stores, Lamén Nextu, seems to have been a prudent and astute man. When his premises were invaded he handed out provisions, using the opportunity to advise the men to return to work. What was the ultimate issue of the struggle does not transpire. But several days after this, when the commander of Thebes was passing, he observed they were holding a meeting. Whether the appeal they had first sent to Pharaoh had ever reached him is somewhat questionable, seeing he had made no response to it. Pharaoh’s responsible advisers appear to have sympathised with the men. The commander, when he saw their condition, at once ordered fifty measures of wheat to be sent in the king’s name, and promised further supplies.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

I.—NEW COURT CHAPEL: THE MINISTRY OF MANTON, BAXTER, AND THEIR SUCCESSORS.

HERE is a unique interest associated with the history of the older Nonconformist Churches of the City of London. The ancient-looking meeting-houses and chapels in which the dissenting congregations worshipped during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were generally located in the dismal alleys and sequestered side-streets of the main thoroughfares. They date from the Stuart times, and were founded by godly men, who forsook the Church of England, not on account of immorality or incompetency, but because they could not conscientiously conform to the teachings of the Book of Common Prayer. After “Black Bartholomew” of the year 1662, about two thousand five hundred divines forsook their livings, and went forth trusting in the Lord for their daily supplies. They were men of blameless character, pious demeanour, and many of them had received the best education the country afforded. Locke has well said: “Bartholomew Day was fatal to our Church and Religion, in throwing out a very great number of worthy, learned, pious and orthodox divines.”

In these days of Free Church movements, and on the other hand, of revived sacerdotalism, it is a profitable study to glance at the bygone Nonconformist times and to recount the doings of the leaders of our Nonconformity. The Book of Common Prayer against which they conscientiously revolted, was revised by Convocation in November, 1661, and contained about six hundred alterations and emendations. The calendar was revised, and the Apocrypha was appointed to be read in the daily lessons. In the Litany the phrase “rebellion and schism” was added to the petition against sedition. The words “bishops, pastors, and ministers of the Church,” were altered to read, “bishops, priests, and deacons.” Extra collects were added, and one of them described Charles I. as being “our most religious king.” Nonconformists objected also to the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration; the sign of the Cross in Baptism; the exclusion from the Lord's table of those who would not receive the elements in a kneeling position; that bishops, priests, and deacons are three distinct orders in the Church by divine appointment; that all who die are saved except the unbaptised, the excommunicated, and the self-destroyers; the damnable clause of the Creed of Athanasius, and other important features.

The Act of Uniformity may be outlined as prescribing that every parson who neglected or refused to declare publicly before his congregation, "his assent and consent to the use of all things contained and prescribed" in the Book of Common Prayer before the Feast of St. Bartholomew, 1662, should be deprived of his living, and be treated by patrons and donors as if he were actually dead. It also declared that if any unordained minister administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper after St. Bartholomew's Day he should forfeit £100; and if he should presume to lecture or preach in any place of worship he should suffer three months' imprisonment in the common gaol. A secondary provision was that the wardens, at the cost of the parish, should provide every parish church with "a true printed copy of the revised Book of Common Prayer;" and that they should be fined £3 per month, after St. Bartholomew's Day, if they neglected to obey the Parliamentary mandate.

The Sabbath previous to the Feast of St. Bartholomew of 1662, was such a day as England had never before witnessed. On that day hundreds of faithful ministers preached farewell sermons to heart-broken and weeping congregations. "Churches were crowded; aisles and stairs were crammed to suffocation; and people clung to the open windows like swarms of bees."

Amongst the old-time structures that were destroyed to furnish the building site of the palatial Law Courts was Carey Street Nonconformist Meeting-house, better known as New Court Chapel. The church worshipping within its walls originated in the troublous times which followed the enforcement of the Act of Uniformity, which deprived so many godly men of their livings. The life-stories of the notable founder and the distinguished pastors of the Church during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, make the history of the church peculiarly interesting.

Dr. Thomas Manton, of Puritan fame, was practically the founder of the New Court Nonconformist Church. Having been ejected from the living of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, he gathered a congregation, which assembled for worship in an unpretentious and unconsecrated meeting-house in an obscure alley off Bridge Street. As a despised Nonconformist divine he preached "the unsearchable riches of Christ" in the same parish where he had previously held the wealthy rectory, which was valued at £350 per year. Manton was one of the best-known Puritan preachers and most prolific writers of the seventeenth century. By birth he was a Somersetshire man, and he was a clergyman of the third generation. Before he forsook the Establishment, he preached several times before the representatives of the House of Commons. As an evidence of his popularity it may be stated that he was selected to offer prayer at the induction of Oliver Cromwell into the Protectorate; and he was subsequently appointed one of his chaplains.

Dr. Harris in his "Memoirs of Manton" gives the tion, I may say treason, as an egg is full of meat. Hadst thou been whipt out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy. I know thou hast a mighty party, and I see a great many of thy brotherhood in corners, and a doctor of the party at your elbow; but by the grace of Almighty God, I'll crush them all.'" Baxter was found guilty and imprisoned. His ministry at New Court Chapel was cut short by his imprisonment under the Five Mile Act, and for five long years the meeting-house was closed.

When the Act of Indulgence was passed, the chapel was re-opened, and Daniel Burgess, the son of an ejected clergyman, became the pastor. After a successful ministry of nine years, Burgess, along with the congregation, left Bridge Street, and in 1696, began services in a conventicle in Russell Court, Drury Lane, which had the peculiar situation of being located between the noted theatre and a disused burial-ground. During this period the ministry of Burgess became the "talk of the town," and his church was one of the most prosperous in the Metropolis. In 1705 the lease of the conventicle expired, and the landlord turned the Nonconformists out, and granted it as a Chapel of Ease to the parish church of St. Martin's. Before the Episcopalians could enter it, certain structural alterations and improvements had to be made. In order to defray the cost, the managers of Drury Lane theatre gave a benefit performance of "Hamlet." This peculiar and questionable method of raising funds for an Episcopalian place of worship was much commented upon at the time. Daniel Defoe, author of "Robinson Crusoe," and Editor of the "Review," published a sermon in which he severely satirised the strange league of church and theatre, and pulpit and stage. He sarcastically suggested that the following inscription should be placed above the door of the church, viz.:—"This church was re-edified, Anno 1706, at the expense, and by the charitable contributions of the enemies of the reformation of our morals, and to the eternal scandal and most just reproach of the Church of England and the Protestant religion. Witness our hands, Lucifer, Prince of Darkness; Hamlet, Prince of Denmark: Churchwardens."

Ejectment from Russell Court meeting-house did not scatter the members and congregation of the New Court Church. They secured a site in obscure Carey Street, in the neighbourhood of Chancery Lane, and erected a substantial, but bald-looking, chapel. In this newer building, the church was heavily burdened with debt, and suffered from internal dissensions. Burgess was approaching his threescore years and ten, and his ministry was subject to many discouragements. Three years after entering Carey Street meeting-house, the building was attacked by the rioters who sympathised with Dr. Sacheverell. The days of persecution and destruction had returned. The mob smashed the windows, and broke into the chapel. The furniture and fittings, including pulpit and benches, were ruthlessly torn out and conveyed to Lincoln's Inn Fields, where they were destroyed in a huge bonfire, around which the mob danced in brutal glee, and shouted, "High Church and Sacheverell." They threatened that if they could only find Daniel Burgess, "that they would roast him in his own pulpit in the midst of the pile." The rioters burnt and otherwise destroyed over £300 worth of property belonging to the church, and for a time the chapel was closed. Some friends in the City who sympathised with the suffering congregation, raised the necessary funds, and the chapel was refurnished and re-opened for public worship. After faithfully serving New Court Church for twenty-six years, Daniel Burgess died in the year 1713.

He was succeeded by a minister of the name of Wood, who held the pastorate for fourteen years. During the popular ministry of the eccentric Thomas Bradbury, who had removed from Fetter Lane, Carey Street reached the highest point of prosperity. It outgrew its Presbyterian tendencies, and became a distinctly Congregational Church.

About the middle of the present century, the inhabitants of the City began to migrate towards the outlying fringe of the vast Metropolis. The appearance of the City was rapidly changing. The wealthier artisans and the middle-classes were seeking the suburbs, while the City was largely left to the poorer classes. Dwellings that once were inhabited became transformed into offices and business houses. The rage for suburbanism began to tell upon the congregation at Carey Street. The older families were gradually forsaking it, and at one time it threatened to be entirely deserted. At its lowest ebb, the old building was purchased by the commissioners, to be incorporated in the site for the erection of the Royal Palace of Justice. Having a clear £7,500, they left the old sanctuary, fragrant with historic memories, and built the handsome New Court Chapel, at Tollington Park, on the breezy heights of North London.

The present New Court Chapel has been served by several well-known Congregational ministers, including the cultured Rev. Ossian Davies, the devoted Rev. William Pierce, and the energetic Rev. Campbell Morgan, who is worthily sustaining the traditions of this historic church.

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

ARE WE IN DANGER OF MAMMON?

MOST of the topics to be discussed in these papers will be of purely Connexional interest; others will concern our own people just as they concern the whole Church of Christ.

No doubt there is a sense in which what is of concern to us is of concern to the Body of Christ in general, just as what relates to the interests of the individual has a bearing upon the race. But we all know perfectly well that there are matters which deeply concern the individual and the family which do not deeply interest the community, still less the nation. In like manner we have questions of Connexional interest which have only a remote bearing upon the universal Church. I wish to say a few words in this opening paper on a subject which, though of vital importance to our own community, is of no less consequence to every section of the Christian Church.

The beginning of the New Year is a time when most Christian people are reminded in some form of the duty of consecration. Watch-night services, Covenant services, Communion services, and the season itself serve to remind us of this duty. It is not too much to say that the success of our Church during the coming year will be according to the measure in which this consecration is real and practical. What a marvellous year it would be were all our people fully consecrated to God. We need often to be reminded of the truth so forcefully set forth in the opening lines of William Law's "Serious Call." "Devotion is neither private nor public prayer; but prayers, whether private or public, are particular parts or instances of devotion. Devotion signifies a life given, or devoted to God. He, therefore, is the devout man, who lives no longer to his own will, or the way and spirit of the world, but to the sole will of God, who considers God in everything, who serves God in everything, who makes all the parts of his common life, parts of piety, by doing everything in the name of God, and under such rules as are conformable to His glory."

Intimately connected with this question of consecration is a subject to which I wish to devote this paper. When we speak of consecration we think instinctively of our money and our business, and there is no more important question for our Church, and, indeed, all the churches at the present time, than the relation between religion and business. The prosperity of our Church is vitally connected with this question. One of the dangers of the nation, as well as the Church, is that which springs from an undue greed of money. In our national life the danger is whether righteousness or riches shall determine our policy. In the Church the Christian race is being forgotten in the race for riches. It is not to be expected that when the greed of gold becomes a national danger the Church should escape the taint. Indeed, if the Church retained her purity such a danger could never assail the nation as a whole, and since this evil has assumed national proportions it may be assumed that the Christian Church has failed in testimony and in example in this regard. If the Church had been doing her duty the national policy would not be dictated by money-makers, nor depend wholly as it does on money considerations.

If the reader would see this question discussed in its larger issues, let him read the terrible indictment in "The Young Man," for November, by William Clarke, entitled, "The Tragedy of a Millionaire," an article which has received the enthusiastic endorsement of such men as Hugh Price Hughes, Justin McCarthy, and Canon Barnett. But I wish to discuss this question as it concerns our own Connexion.

It were idle and Pharisaical to suppose that we have escaped the evil which is eating out the life of the nation. Absorption in money-making has led to a diminished spirituality and a growing distaste for the work of the Church. Of course, this is not universal, or anything approaching it. The Jubilee Fund and many other Connexional projects are proof that the spirit of true devotion in relation to wealth has not died out among us as a people; but is it not painfully evident in many quarters that the time-spirit in regard to money-making is working sad havoc? Are we not often saddened by the spectacle of good men starving their religious life by an undue devotion to business pursuits. It is not that they find it necessary to do this in order to secure for themselves and those dependent upon them the means of living. Were that the case, they would deserve our warmest sympathy. Nor is it that the terrible competition of the time compels them to choose between their present course and the bankruptcy court. They have simply allowed the money-making passion to grow till it has become their master.

And what are the consequences to their religious life? Disastrous in the extreme. I am not now thinking of the cases, not by any means uncommon, where Mammon is deliberately chosen, and there is a complete shipwreck of faith, but of instances such as abound in our Church where men retain their membership with us, but fail to take the place for which they were intended, and to develop the usefulness of which they once gave such promise. It is melancholy to see men spending their days and nights in the futile business of scraping money, and utterly neglecting the culture of their higher nature. They do not seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. If they are honest with themselves they will confess that with them money is first and last, and in the middle. Everything must bend to that. Of mental culture they never think at all. Their intellect is utterly starved. Even the modicum of time and literary interest necessary to the reading of our Connexional Magazine or Quarterly Review cannot be found, and so they tell you that when they took the magazines they did not get read and so were given up. It is not the want of money that makes the circulation of our magazines a problem, but the greed of it. When we were ten times poorer the circulation was vastly larger. And although other influences have been at work to cause the decline, we are persuaded that this has had much to do with it.

In the best interests of our people and of our Church we must do our utmost to check this growing evil. No doubt a deeper spirituality and a revival of religion would cure it. Where these conditions exist business men and workpeople find no difficulty in getting to the week-night services, and the old-time interest in the work of God instantly revives. But our people need to be guarded against the insidious inroads of the Mammon spirit of the time. Mr. Ruskin has somewhere said, that after hearing some two thousand sermons, he had not heard a single one in which the clear issue between God and Mammon had been presented to his hearers by the preacher. Do we ever hear in our Connexional pulpits a heart-searching discourse on the Saviour's declaration that "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven?" That statement points to a frightful danger, but how much is heard about it in the preaching of the time?

One of the best safeguards against the encroachment of the money-making mania is to give wealth away as it is accumulated. There have been some rare spirits who did this systematically. They made a great deal of money, because they could not help it. God had given them business faculty, and using it, wealth flowed in upon them. But they were so full of religious benevolence, and in such dread of Mammon, that they hastened to get rid of their money, and died comparatively poor. To them the joy of giving was greater than the joy of getting. They literally carried out John Wesley's maxim, "Get all you can; save all you can; give all you can." Perhaps the best plan and the most Scriptural, is to resolutely practise systematic and proportionate giving. It is a safeguard against the undue growth of the money-making spirit, and a means of culture in the grace of Christian giving. But it is not enough. There must be a constant recognition of the fact that we are not sent here just to make money; that the claims of intellect and of the spiritual nature must be considered, and that if at the last all we have to show for our life is the accumulation of so much money, while both heart and mind have been starved and neglected, the reckoning will be a terrible one.

To return to the point with which we started. The need of the hour for our Church is Consecration, the consecration of the whole man, of the whole life to God. We sing with great fervour—

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small;
Love so amazing, so Divine, Demands my soul, my life, my all!"

and—

"Take my silver and my gold,
Not a mite would I withhold;
Take my intellect, and use
Every power as Thou shalt choose."

But is it not often a solemn mockery? Oh, if ministers and people were consecrating their wealth to God at the beginning of this year, and resolutely and conscientiously carrying out the principle of systematic and proportionate giving; if the world were kept under our feet; if we were devout in the sense of making "all the parts of our common life parts of piety, by doing everything in the name of God, and under such rules as are conformable to His glory," what a year this would be! Not only would chapel difficulties and station difficulties disappear, but the means at the disposal of the Missionary Committee would be enormously increased, the Connexion would assume a healthier tone, the week-night services would be once more thronged, and that glorious consummation for which we have so long prayed, a great Connexional revival, would be at last realised. May God deliver us from the curse of Mammon, and make us a people whose great business it is to spread Scriptural holiness through the land.

JOSEPH RITSON.

The Little Grave.

When eve puts on her russet cloak
Wet with the tears of parting day,
I love to muse and pensive walk
The churchyard's flagg'd and foot-worn way.
I love to hear the wind-tuned grass;
Low whistling o'er the tomb-paved ground;
Sad though it be, it doth surpass
The music found in life's gay round.
I love to read those time-worn stones
Which tell of dear departed worth,
And whose are those brown crumbling bones
That rest in lap of mother earth.
But there's a grave among the rest
More dear to me than all beside,
Where in her little grassy nest
My own sweet birdie doth abide.
Where minstrel birds her requiem sing,
Where tears of gold laburnums shed,
And children early blossoms bring
To deck their little playmate's bed.
She was a sunbeam in my cot,
Whose winsome ways and playful smile
Did light up many a shady spot,
And many a weary hour beguile.
With bright hair as of sunshine made,
And cheeks like roses set in snow,
She seem'd an infant cherub stray'd
From heaven above to earth below.

But death he struck her with his wing,
And suddenly amidst her play,
Like music-box that breaks its spring,
At once she hush'd her merry lay.
We saw her close her dew-bright eye,
And o'er her face Death's shadow creep,
And, cooling down to marble, lie,
Mute as a wearied bird asleep.
And like the spirit of the flower
By sunbeam kiss'd from new-mown sod,
She left our happy household bower
To gild the paradise of God.
And though I have a cottage sweet
That peeps through thickets of wild rose,
Yet, when at eve I point my feet Towards its porch, I'm sad because
The face that met me at the door
With all its little news, I miss;
The patt'ring feet that tuned the floor,
The tiny mouth with rosy kiss,
Are gone; and yet 'tis best, I know,
My spotless uncaged dove should fly
To where no sin can stain her now,
No tear-drops dim her starry eye.
And when Death sets my spirit free,
And, lark-like, singing home I soar,
She may be first to welcome me
At heaven's jasper-lighted door.

FIG. 1. HUMAN EYE.

The Eye of an Insect.

Illustrated by Original Micro-Photographs, etc.

BY ARTHUR E. GOODMAN.

THE gift of eyesight is without doubt one of the most precious of all the blessings with which a beneficent God has endowed mankind. It is, perhaps, the one of our senses by which we receive the greatest amount of pleasure and enjoyment, and therefore, the one we should be most loath willingly to lose, had we any choice in the matter. The creature, whether man or beast, is at best, at an immense disadvantage when deprived of the power of vision.

With the nature of human eyesight most people are now-a-days fairly well acquainted, for the injunction—"Man, know thyself"—is more fully appreciated and heeded in these days of School Boards and University Extension Lectures than heretofore.

In order, however, more clearly to explain the nature and marvellous structure of the so-called compound, or multiple eye of an insect, the particular task before us, a short explanation of the method by which man sees, with the simple eyes he has at his command, is more or less of a necessity.

In Fig. 1 is a diagrammatic drawing of the various parts of the human eye. The bulk of these details do not concern us in the present case, although so important in themselves that a very small defect in any one of them would seriously affect the power of vision. Hence for a full description and explanation of the use of these minor details the reader is referred to works of physiology.

In Fig. 2 the fundamental principle of eyesight is illustrated, and the organs in an eye, which are absolutely essential to the formation of a picture of a real object, are indicated. The object—an arrow, the ends of which are marked "a" and "b"—is placed at a certain distance from an ordinary magnifying glass, or lens, as it is called. The rays of light reflected from the arrow fall over the whole surface of the lens. It is only necessary, however, to consider four of these rays of light, two from either end of the arrow, in order to explain how the image or picture of the arrow is reproduced on the other side of the lens at A. B.

From the point "a," one ray passes directly through the centre of the lens in a perfectly straight path because the front and back surfaces of the lens in the path of such a ray are parallel, and the lens behaves in this case just as an ordinary piece of plate-glass would do. The other ray of light passing from "a" strikes against a part of the lens "A" where the front and back surfaces are not parallel.

FIG. 2. PRINCIPLE OF LENS.

Whenever this is the case the path of the ray becomes bent toward the centre of the lens according to the well-known laws of refraction of light, so that the ray "a.A'" is bent at "A'" into the direction A'A., and ultimately meets the first ray "a.O.A." at A., reproducing at this point an image of the point "a."

If the lens is properly made all the other rays of light passing from "a," on whatever part of the lens they may fall, will be so bent as to meet at the same point A., and in fact the clearness of the image or picture depends upon all the rays from a point meeting, or being focussed, in this way to one point. As is the case with the point "a" in the arrow, so it is with the point "b" and every intermediate point; the result being the formation of an image exactly like the real object, only less in size and inverted.

From this short account of the formation of a picture or an image, it will be evident that to produce such a picture a lens is necessary, and if the drawing of the human eye, as shown in Fig. 1, is again examined, it will at once be seen that such a lens is present in the structure E, which is placed close behind the pupil (C) of the eye.

Moreover, if the image is to be seen or rendered apparent to the nerves of the eye, there must be a screen or prepared surface on which the picture can be reproduced.

It need scarcely be pointed out that this screen must be in exactly the right place, that is, just where the image is reproduced. In the human eye such a screen, called the retina (K), is provided, and lines the back of the eye-ball, where the exact image of everything we look at is reproduced in an inverted position. From this it is plain that the image on the retina of every object viewed by a human eye is upside down. This, however, is of little importance, as the brain, where the ultimate impression is produced, very early in infant days learns to interpret aright the pictures so produced.

This retina is constructed of an infinite number of minute nerve structures known as rods and cones, which are extremely sensitive to the various colours producing light, and the sum-total of the impressions made upon these rods and cones is conveyed along the optic nerve (M) to the brain, and the person becomes conscious of seeing.

The usefulness of the human, or any other single eye, is greatly increased by being moveable, and so made capable of being turned towards different objects without necessitating the movement of the whole head.

Animals, with the exception of a few classes, such as insects, amongst those living on land, and crustaceans (crabs, lobsters, etc.), living in water, are generally provided with an internal skeleton which is covered with the soft, fleshy parts of the body, whereas in the case of the classes of animals excepted, the skeleton is external, in the form of a hard and more or less horny skin. It is a remarkable fact that the compound eye is confined almost exclusively to such animals as have an outer skeleton, and it would seem, from this fact, as though the soft fleshy single eye of other animals were an unsuitable mechanism to be fitted into an otherwise horny skin.

The hard, horny cornea of the compound eye is, on the other hand, much more in keeping with the general structure of such animals. This is further accentuated by the fact that many insects in their larval stages, when their bodies are soft throughout, have very much simpler eye structures than in the imaginal or mature forms. For instance, the Common Blow Fly, which in common with other insects possesses compound eyes, has, when in its larval stage as a maggot, much more rudimentary eye structures which practically consist of a few single fleshy eyes. These simple eyes of the maggot are shown in Fig. 3, taken from Lownes' work on the Blow Fly.

As may be inferred from the name compound, the eye of an insect consists of a greater or less number of structures, which are somewhat similar in action to the single eye of man. As a matter of fact the eyes of almost all insects are made up of very large numbers of individual organs, each one of which is capable of reproducing an image of the objects placed opposite to them. That this is so will be conclusively proved before the end of the article is reached. The very great number of these minute eyes which build up the compound eye may be gathered from the photograph of the head of the Common House Fly (Fig. 4), where each tiny dot in the two large hemispherical eye masses of the insect is practically an eye; and it can readily be understood that they are numbered by thousands, and very frequently by tens of thousands. For instance, in the case of the eye of the Great Water Beetle, from which most of the photographs illustrating this article are taken, each contains between four and five thousand, whilst each eye of the Dragon Fly is composed of from 25,000 to 30,000 facets. On the other hand, insects are known which possess only a single, or only a very few, of these very minute eyes in each eye mass. These are, however, the exception and not the rule.

Knowing thus much of the structure of a compound eye, it will not be expected that the internal structure should at all appear to resemble that of the simple eye, and a very cursory comparison of Figs. 5, 6 and 7 with Fig. 1 will confirm this idea. Figs. 5 and 6 are very thin sections of the eye of the Great Water Beetle, so made as to show the internal structure clearly.

On the outside is a comparatively thick and dense layer which is composed of the facets of the eye. It is built up of the Cornea and the lenses, of which there is one to each facet. The facets are so closely attached to one another that, in the case of this particular insect, they may not be separated one from the other. Each facet with its attached lens calls to mind, in the similarity of its structure and action, the small pieces of glass to which series of minute photographs are attached, so often seen in pen and pencil holders, and the like, offered for sale at seaside and other pleasure resorts.

Each facet and lens produces an image of the objects in front of it, and these images are received, not directly by a retina, as in the case of the simple eye, but by crystalline cones, clearly shown in both Figs. 5 and 6, as darker triangular patches adjoining the outer darker layer of lenses. From the cones the image, or rather, the portion of the image which corresponds to that part of the object which comes directly opposite the particular facet, is carried on through long tube-like structures called Great Rods. And this would appear to be the function of these great rods, in that they only carry forward a particular portion of the image produced by the lenses—each eye thus registering the exact part of an object opposite to it, with the result that a real image is formed ultimately on the retina (shown in the photographs as a dark and distinct line lying concentrically to the outer layer of facets and lenses), being built up of the various portions reproduced by the individual eyes.

This is the explanation in general terms of the theory of Dioptric vision as enunciated by Lownes in 1884, and which is very rapidly becoming the accepted one by scientists, inasmuch as it can be much more conclusively demonstrated, both experimentally as well as theoretically, than the older Mosaic theory which was conceived by Johannes Muller in 1826, in which it is presumed that each facet and lens reproduces a complete image on the retina of external objects.

Both these theories are fully explained and contrasted in Lownes' most admirable work on the "Blow Fly" (1895), to which, those readers who may be desirous of knowing more than could possibly be put into an article of this kind, are referred.

The cornea, along with the lenses, may, without much difficulty, be removed from a compound eye and separated from the other organs of the eye, and although naturally covering a more or less spherical surface, it may be laid out flat for examination. Figs. 8, 9 and 10 are micro-photographs of a cornea of the same beetle already mentioned, treated in this manner, and variously magnified. Fig. 8 is magnified about forty diameters. By this is meant that the diameter of the disc covered by the whole photograph is forty times the diameter of the actual disc being examined, and consequently the diameter of each little dot representing a single facet is shown forty times larger than is actually the case.

In Fig. 9 the magnification is 100 diameters, and in Fig. 10 it is 250 diameters.

As the cornea contains the lenses which produce the first images formed in the compound eye, it can be utilised when spread out flat as already described for showing these images: As an image is produced by each facet, as many images will be formed as there are facets in the cornea. But as the facets are very minute, so are the images which are formed; and before they can be seen by the human eye they must be magnified. In Figs. 12 and 13, which are photographs of these multiple images, the magnification is about 300 diameters.

ing these images are shown in the photograph (Fig. 11), and were holes, of the shape shown, cut in black cardboard. Each of these objects in its turn was placed below the cornea when in position under the microscope with a very strong light behind it, so that a beam of light of the same sectional shape as the hole in the cardboard fell on the cornea, and was reproduced by each facet with the result shown in Figs. 12 and 13. The formation of these multiple images is by no means an easy task, and the photographing of them has been found to be a much more difficult one. The photographs are not nearly so clear and distinct as the images are really, when viewed directly through the microscope, but are, nevertheless, sufficiently so, to be easily recognisable.

From what has been said on the formation of images, it will be seen at once that the production of these multiplied images conclusively proves the existence of a perfect and accurate lens in each facet of the cornea, and at the same time, the compound nature of an insect's eye.

Dr. Gregory's "Sidelights on Methodism."

DR. GREGORY has rendered an important service to Methodism by the publication of this work, in which, for the first time so far as we know, light is clearly and directly shed on the inner action of the Wesleyan Conference during a period the most strenuous in some respects that the Wesleyan Church has passed through. It was a period during which ecclesiastical imperialism found itself confronted with a liberalism which, though moderate in its character and aims, and conservative of the many excellences which distinguished the Wesleyan polity, nevertheless claimed greater freedom and a wider franchise in the administration of Connexional affairs. The published official records of this period afforded but scant information of what passed in the exclusive court which held supreme rule in Methodism. They gave decisions reached, but shed no light upon the processes by which these decisions were reached. Now and again, it is true, when conflict became keen, and consequences which passed under the name of discipline were experienced, some knowledge of the inner action of the Conference was obtained, but this knowledge, filtering through strife and dissension, was really more bewildering than informing, and formed a very inadequate guide to the merits of Conferential action. Biographies, too, have been written of men eminent in Methodism, and who played a leading part in Conferential business and in Connexional government, but even these, though in many respects valuable, afford only limited material for forming a judgment on the action of the ecclesiastical courts of which they were members, and give but very scant information concerning any debates which preceded the decision of grave and serious questions, nor of the use that, at least upon some occasions, was made of personal influence in determining Conferential action. These biographies, though valuable from the standpoint from which they were written, were not in any strict sense histories of the period they covered, nor were they written to give historical, but biographical, information. History ought to deal with all sides of any movement impartially, but histories of Methodism, like other histories that might be named, can hardly be said to conform to this standard, and possibly the authors are not to blame for this. We do not suppose that any official record of the debates in the Conference, during the period covered by Dr. Gregory's volume, exists, and the bald, official record of decisions reached does not say much, in fact, says very little about the process which led to these decisions being adopted by the Assembly. Hitherto, in relation to the Wesleyan Conference, information has been lacking respecting its inner history during the strenuous times which made up for it the second quarter of the nineteenth century.

To some extent this lack is now supplied by the work Dr. Gregory has published, but not to the extent the sources upon which he has drawn rendered possible. His main source of information has been the record of Conference proceedings made by the Rev. Joseph Fowler, one of the most eminent men Methodism has produced, but who, in consequence of the moderate liberalism that ever influenced him as a member of the Conference, did not gain the official recognition to which his gifts and services entitled him. So much, at any rate, Dr. Gregory makes plain, and in the course of his work he makes it equally plain that other men suffered more or less in the same way. The concessions upon questions of ecclesiastical administration which have been made, and are still being made, in parent Methodism, have not been gained without some sacrifice as Dr. Gregory's pages testify. At a considerable price has this freedom, and we may add, this growing freedom, been secured. Mr. Fowler, from 1827 to 1852, made copious notes of the debates in the Wesleyan Conference, and it is from this source that Dr. Gregory mainly draws his material, though, of course, he can speak from personal knowledge respecting much about which he writes. The volumes containing these notes are in the possession of Mr. Fowler's son, and evidently form a rare repository of information concerning the period to which they relate. The impression is difficult to avoid that Dr. Gregory has dealt economically with these notes in more senses than one. Of course, publication in extenso was out of the question, and as a wise and prudent editor, he has had to make a selection; but the thought occurs that he has not deemed it prudent to publish too much, and that this economy was practised, not because the unpublished material is trivial, but for more important and substantial reasons. It is not surprising to us that grave apprehension has been felt in relation to these notes of Mr. Fowler's, and fear expressed that publication might not be advantageous to Methodism; that any lessons these discussions furnish are not now needed, and that the publication might prove inopportune and dangerous; and that the susceptibilities of many worthy people might be hurt, hence they had better remain in the seclusion in which they have hitherto been kept. The custodians of these notes have wisely determined otherwise, and the selection and editing could not have been placed in safer or abler hands.

The central and ruling personality in the Conferences, and, in fact, in Methodist administration generally during these twenty-five years was Dr. Bunting. He exercised during these years an authority as imperial and absolute as it has ever fallen to the lot of any man to exercise in Christendom, if we except the Pope. He never exercised any such authority as the occupant of the See of Rome does, but short of that he evidently ruled with an absolutism and secured a submission in Methodism which may appear surprising, but which when duly considered is perhaps not so surprising after all. Dr. Bunting was a man of rare endowments, possessing great force of character, and would have gained ascendancy in any sphere of life. When he entered the Wesleyan ministry he found conditions of Church organisation which favoured the ascendancy and dominance of a personality like his; and given the endowments and qualities of the man and the environment into which he entered, and it would have been singular had he not risen to pre-eminence. The policy of Wesleyan Methodism during the years upon which Dr. Gregory's "Sidelights" are shed, was the policy of Dr. Bunting. Thus much is clear from Mr. Fowler's notes of Conference proceedings, and thus much is conceded in the excellent biography of Dr. Bunting written by his son. Dr. Bunting himself appears to have held much the same opinion, and in the very last message he sent to the Conference, maintained the rightness of his policy. But these "Sidelights" show this policy to have been anything but conducive to the peace and prosperity of Methodism. Three out of the four great Secessions which have taken place in Methodism occurred from 1827 to 1852, and it is plain that Dr. Bunting's policy rigidly enforced was the main cause in each case. It may, perhaps, be urged that his policy was simply to carry out the principles of Church order instituted by John Wesley. This, to some extent, may be correct, but unless we are much mistaken, he pushed these principles to an extreme that was never contemplated in early Methodism. And it is an obvious fact that, only by departing more or less from his policy, has peace been maintained and prosperity realised in the parent Methodist community. Had questions that have arisen in recent years been met in the same way as questions raised in the third, fourth and fifth decades of the century were met, there can be little doubt but serious secession would have taken place. Fortunately, a wiser policy has prevailed, and concessions have been made departing widely from Dr. Bunting's policy, and to which in life he was strenuously opposed. It is true the fundamental principle of his policy is still maintained, but in application it has been considerably modified. This fundamental principle, as he himself stated, was the supreme authority of the Pastorate. This he maintained was the one essential principle of ecclesiastical polity. All else was secondary and subordinate. Taking up this position, Dr. Bunting regarded the superintendent of a circuit as the chief and ruling authority in it. The chairman of a district was practically the supreme authority in it, and over all was the collective pastorate of the Conference, which was represented all the year through by the President and the executive. One of his main endeavours during his long and laborious life was in all respects to strengthen the executive and give more emphatic expression to the supremacy of the pastorate. Not a debate in Conference which finds record in Dr. Gregory's pages but reveals this more or less, and to such an extreme did he push this principle, that he held that the wish of a superintendent of a circuit as to who should be his colleagues ought to outweigh any wish on the part of the officials or members. In fact, the whole question of appointing ministers he regarded as belonging to the Stationing Committee and the collective pastorate assembled in Conference. The extreme to which he carried this principle of pastoral supremacy led him to oppose the production of any authorised compendium of the regulations and rules that would in any way bind the Conference in its action. His position was that the Minutes on Discipline, the Plan of Pacification of 1795, the Leeds Regulations of 1797, were only binding as explained by the action of the Conference itself, leaving the Conference at liberty to observe or depart from these rules and regulations as might under the circumstances be its pleasure. A method of interpretation, as Dr. Gregory observes, bearing "too strong a resemblance to the mode in which the Vatican observes the Scriptures—not as taken in their simple, obvious and straightforward sense, but as explained by its own action." Every request and petition for an authorised explanation or interpretation of the rules and regulations of Methodism met with the determined opposition of Dr. Bunting. This explanation, or interpretation, had to be supplied by the action of the collective pastorate assembled in Conference, and in that collective pastorate Dr. Bunting for many years was supreme. Now the value of these "Sidelights" consists in the revelation they make of this policy in actual operation in the inner councils of Methodism. Some of the effects of it have been apparent enough in the Methodism of the past, but never before has so clear a search-light been shed on the inner procedure of the Wesleyan Conference. These "Sidelights" set in a very different perspective to that in which they have hitherto been regarded, many events in Methodist history, and alter in not a few cases the incidence of blame in relation to some of these occurrences. No more important contribution to the real history of Methodism has yet been made than these notes of Mr. Fowler and these reminiscences of Dr. Gregory supply.

To lay representation in the higher courts of Methodism such as has been conceded in recent years, Dr. Bunting's policy was absolutely opposed. He certainly originated what were known as the mixed committees—a combination of laymen and ministers to deal with various questions of Connexional finance—but even in this step, which was felt to be necessary to allay a growing restlessness on the part of the laity, care was taken to guard the pastoral prerogative. Dr. Bunting resisted any intrusion of the representative principle. The lay members of these committees were not elected but selected, and selected by the pastorate in one form or another, and as a matter of course, as Dr. Gregory tersely puts it, the selectors were not likely to choose men whom they thought would oppose them in what they wished to have done. It was unquestionably a politic move, and served for a time, but like all politic moves, only for a time.

The agitation of 1827, consequent upon the Organ question in Leeds, is the starting-point Dr. Gregory selects in giving publicity to Mr. Fowler's notes; and it is clear, but for the high doctrine of the pastorate which Dr. Bunting held, this question might have been amicably settled. He, of course, was favourable to the use of organs in places of worship, and had some time before got one introduced into Brunswick Chapel, Liverpool; and with an effort of this kind properly pursued no fault could have been found. Had this agitation been confined to the organ question, and the legitimate method of introducing such instruments into the Methodist chapels, no such results as happened would have followed. In 1820 the Conference had settled the procedure that was to govern cases of this kind, and the parties desiring an organ for Brunswick Chapel, Leeds, had been defeated in their attempts to obtain the consent of the leaders' meeting and the sanction of the District Meeting, and here the case should have rested till by the use of legitimate means the end proposed could have been secured. A majority of the trustees were not favourable to the introduction of the instrument, but four of their number whose names Dr. Gregory does not give, put themselves into communication with certain ministers in London, and had the case raised in Conference without the sanction of the District Meeting, which was a necessary condition of Conferential action in the matter. This action raised at once the question whether the Conference could set aside its own law so long as it was unrepealed. That the Conference could repeal the law was not disputed, but could it act contrary to the law so long as the law was unrepealed? The trustees wanting the instrument were in a minority. The circuit was opposed to it, and the ministers in charge warned the Conference of the consequences if the rule was disregarded. Notwithstanding this, the Conference gave sanction for the introduction of the organ, setting aside its own law, and assuming an authority superior to the law, an essential element in the doctrine of the pastorate held by him who had already become the ruling mind in Methodism. The consequence was immediate agitation in Leeds. It was, perhaps, unfortunate that just at this juncture the superintendency of the station changed hands. The new superintendent proceeded to acts of discipline, but the agitation continued, and so, as Chairman of the District, he convened a Special District Meeting to deal with the state of affairs that had sprung up. But in taking this action he departed from prescribed procedure and introduced extraneous members into the meeting, and among others, Dr. Bunting, who happened that year to be Secretary of the Conference. Now, Dr. Bunting had no right to be present at the meeting at all, but to give cover to his presence, a new function, utterly unknown in Methodism, was created by some equally unknown authority, and he attended as the "Official adviser of the President." Other unconstitutional measures were adopted, and so the agitation spread and became more aggravated. At the Conference of 1828, when the case came up again, Dr. Bunting was President. In a lengthy speech he defended the action of the Special District Meeting, maintaining that the straining or overpassing of the law was necessary in the emergency, and characterised the agitation as "an insurrection against the pastoral office" that needed to be effectively suppressed. He carried with him a majority of the Conference, though several of the older and wiser men voted against the resolution—"That the Special District Meeting was both indispensably necessary, and in the most extraordinary emergency, constitutional also." He thus secured for one of his interpretations of pastoral supremacy the imprimatur of the Conference. This seems to have been the first instance in which the Conference assumed superiority to the law as it stood. There followed, as a matter of course, widespread dissatisfaction, and as Dr. Gregory pertinently remarks, the first of the connected secessions which ended in the deplorable disruption of 1849. At the root of each of these secessions lay the asserted supremacy of the pastorate. It has been stated that the Secessionists of 1828 separated from the parent body merely because an organ was introduced into the Brunswick Chapel, Leeds. Such evidently was not the case. It is doubtful if the mere question of the organ would have led one person to separate himself from the Methodist Church. Nothing is clearer from the record Dr. Gregory gives than that it was the unconstitutional action of the Conference itself which led to the disastrous consequences which befell the Church in Leeds and other places; and it is equally unquestionable that Mr. Grindrod, the superintendent of the Leeds Circuit, acted under the direction of a will more inflexible, and a nature more imperious and masterful than his own. Such, at any rate, is Dr. Gregory's opinion, and he says he has never met with any one who, acquainted with the men and the facts of the case, held any other opinion. When occasion suited him, Dr. Bunting could remind the Conference that while it possessed power it must not be used impetuously or arbitrarily; but that if it wished to keep power it must use it sparingly. Had this prudent utterance been at all times observed, Methodism would have been spared many a painful experience.

In the earlier pages of Dr. Gregory's work nothing is more painful than the account given of the treatment of Dr. Adam Clarke. Dr. Clarke was at the time an aged man, and few men in Methodism had served it as he had; and yet his treatment in relation to his Irish Schools and his retirement from the active ministry was such as could hardly be credited unless given upon good authority. Dr. Clarke, actuated by the best of motives, had used his position and influence in providing educational facilities for his native district in the North of Ireland, facilities that were greatly needed, and though he was over seventy years of age, he did not hesitate to make a tour through the North of Ireland and establish and provide for the maintenance of several schools. These schools he placed under the care of the Irish Conference as the body most likely to attend to their welfare through the superintendents of the circuits in which they were located. This, however, did not meet with the approval of the executive in London, who regarded it as anomalous that a member of the British Conference should be supporting establishments that were not authorised by and connected with the body of which he was a member. Dr. Clarke explained the situation, and pointed out that there was more likelihood of the schools being efficiently managed by direct superintendence in Ireland than by making them dependent upon the management of an agent of the Missionary Committee resident in London. His action was branded as irregular, and a resolution regretting the course he had pursued, which was, in fact, a resolution of censure, was adopted, though, as Mr. Fowler in his notes remarks, a few hands only were lifted in favour of it, but the contrary was never put. But Dr. Clarke received even less consideration than this in connection with the close of his ministry. In the Life of Dr. Beaumont, written by his son, there is considerable reference to this treatment of Dr. Clarke, for at the Conference of 1832, Dr. Beaumont felt it necessary to speak out plainly and forcibly in relation to the case, which action on his part was made a ground of accusation against him, his accuser being Dr. Bunting, who, when the course of business relating to ministerial character came on, rose and called attention to the conduct of Dr. Beaumont, who had deemed it necessary to defend Dr. Clarke. To entertain the idea that any one had acted or wished to act unjustly towards Dr. Clarke, and that any defence was needed, was construed into an offence against the authority of the Conference, and as a consequence, Dr. Beaumont was censured from the chair. He felt this to be a grievous injustice, and wrote a long remonstrance to the Conference, but without any effect. It had evidently become an offence that could not be brooked, for any man to oppose himself to the ruling spirit in the Conference. Dr. Beaumont, as Dr. Gregory testifies, was a strict upholder of Methodist rule, but injustice, and especially to such a man as Dr. Clarke, he could not permit to pass without protest, and so he spoke out plainly and forcibly concerning the unjust treatment that had been meted out to Dr. Clarke in connection with his retirement from the active ministry. A venerable man, Dr. Gregory says, his senior in the ministry, wrote him not long ago, and said, "If every one of us had spoken out in Conference as Dr. Beaumont did, we should have had no rift in the Methodist lute, no Fly Sheets, and no disruption in 1849." To the last day of his long and useful life Dr. Beaumont looked back upon the action he took in connection with Dr. Clarke's case with satisfaction and approval. His letter to the Conference, which is fully given in his biography, is a manly and Christian remonstrance against the unjust censure which had been passed upon him for doing what he regarded as his duty, and which he would fain have avoided could he have done so with a good conscience.

Dr. Clarke did not attend the Conference of 1831. He had been stationed the preceding three years as an additional minister to the Hinde Street Station, London, but without any salary from the circuit, receiving only an allowance for travelling expenses as he lived out in the country. As the Conference drew on he communicated with the Chairman of the District, whose name is not given, but who, we gather, presided at the Conference of that year, respecting his future appointment. The chairman gave him no hint respecting superannuation. In fact, there did not appear any reason for retirement. He was taking regular Sunday work in the circuit, and during the week was preaching special sermons in various parts of the country. The Chairman of the District even suggested that the Lambeth Circuit would be a suitable station for him on the same conditions under which he had laboured at Hinde Street. And so the matter rested till Conference came, at which, for some reason or other, he was not present. To his surprise he received from the Chairman of his District a letter to the effect that a strong opinion had been expressed in the Stationing Committee that he should be placed upon the list of retired ministers, but by whom the opinion was expressed was not stated. To this Dr. Clarke replied, protesting against the suggested superannuation as harsh and unwarrantable treatment, and requesting that he might be allowed to continue another year and so complete his half-century of active ministerial labour. This letter was never presented to the Stationing Committee or to the Conference; in fact, as Dr. Gregory points out, the Stationing Committee does not appear to have presented the case to the Conference at all as a case of superannuation, and though he was placed to the London Sixth Circuit, his name does not occur amongst the ministers who are to become supernumeraries. There was considerable discussion respecting the ministers who were to be placed to the London Circuits, but Dr. Clarke's name is not so much as mentioned in these discussions. Against his own expressed wish, and to his great sorrow and pain, and really without the knowledge of Conference, he was set aside by the action of some one whose name and influence does not appear in the annals Dr. Gregory deems it prudent to publish. At the Conference of 1832, the case, of course, came up, and it was at this Conference that Dr. Beaumont was censured for his manly action in denouncing the treatment Dr. Clarke had received, while the ex-President, who had suppressed Dr. Clarke's letter, received not a word of remonstrance or rebuke, nor did the Assembly in any way resent the action which fastened upon the Conference conduct of which it was ignorant in 1831, and knew nothing till the following Conference brought it to light. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the old man who had won so distinguished a position among scholars, and the recognition of whose worth was national, and who was withal too liberal in his views, was felt to be an inconvenience, and so this method was adopted with a view to quietly shelve him. A further indignity still was inflicted upon him by severing his connection with Metropolitan Methodism, and relegating him to a country station. He did not, however, long survive this treatment, for in a short time after that Liverpool Conference, he ascended to the higher service of the Master's Kingdom. Before his departure, however, he received back from his Irish brethren the schools he had made over to them, and conveyed them in excellent condition, and well endowed, to the Wesleyan Missionary Society. Dr. Bunting manifested great anxiety that it should be understood that this was Dr. Clarke's own act and not that of his executors, but at the same time, it is evident enough that but for the action of Dr. Bunting and his supporters in Conference, this would not have been done. Before he left Liverpool he had an interview with the Irish representatives, and the result was as stated,—they surrendered the schools back to him, and he, to pacify the British executive, conveyed them to the Missionary Society. Dr. Gregory has done a service to the Church in making it clear that the treatment of Dr. Clarke did not originate with the Conference, nor indeed in the first instance was sanctioned by Conference, but was accomplished by one of the devious methods to which men in power are sometimes tempted to resort; but he cannot altogether exculpate the Conference, for whatever may be said in relation to the Conference of 1831, the Conference of 1832 acted with full knowledge. This chapter in Methodist history yields little credit to any save those who were the sufferers.

The Organ-Master.

I STOOD in the ancient minster,
Close beside the white-robed choir;
And the faces of the singers
Seemed to glow with heavenly fire.
Their voices rose in the anthem,
Like birds on ecstatic wing;
And e'en the angels must have paused
To hear them so sweetly sing.

It ceased, and the organ-master,
In rapture began to play
A theme which filled me with wonder,
And charmed care and grief away.
Through resplendent pictured windows
The sun its radiance shed,
O'er the master wove a veil of gold,
Cast a halo round his head.

He appeared as though transfigured,
So majestic were his lays;
Anon like solemn requiem,
Now swelling in hymn of praise;
Now soaring to heights supernal,
Then falling to depths untold;
My soul rode on the organ's notes,
Its cadences manifold.

Ere long came a soothing calmness,
Which shrouded the soul with peace,
And methought the white-haired master
His seraphic airs would cease;
But the hush was but the prelude
To music sublime and grand,
Which stopp'd abrupt, for the throes of death
Had still'd the magician's hand.

The Home Circle.

"IF I WERE KING——"

IF I were king," said Ernest, "I would give to every little boy in the land a fine rocking-horse, or else a model train with engine that gets up steam, and goes round a line of rails on the table."

"And if I were queen," said Dora, "I would give to every little girl in the land a doll's house with six large rooms, beautifully furnished, and a papa and mamma doll, with two little boy and two little girl dolls."

"I tink kings and queens is drefful mean," said little Isabel, "for they keep all the lovely things for themselves. I wish Ernie was king and Dora was queen."

Ernest and Dora felt very good just then, their hearts overflowing with kindly intentions towards all the little boys and girls of the land; but I am not so sure that if their wishes had been fulfilled, those little boys and girls would have been quite certain of getting that rocking-horse, or train, or doll's house. You see, there is such a difference between what we think we would do with something that is not ours, and what we actually do with the things that are ours. We think, "If I had thousands and thousands of pounds a year, I would go about finding out all the very poor people, and would give them nice warm clothes to wear, and food to eat, and would try to put them in a better position so that they should not be poor any more." But as a matter of fact, when Uncle Joseph gave Ernest a shilling, he did not share it with anybody, but bought himself a fishing-rod with it, and when Dora got from Aunt Julia that lovely doll that shuts her eyes when you hold her in your arms, and opens them when you hold her upright, and says "Mamma" when you pull a string, she refused unkindly to let Isabel play with it.

"If 'ifs' and 'ands' were pots and pans,
What would the tinkers do?"

we used to say when I was a boy, and there is a moral in the jingle we all need to learn.

It is very nice to imagine what we would do if we lived under conditions in which we could do what we liked, and be Lord Bountiful and Lady Bountiful to everybody, without making any real sacrifices, but the boy or girl who, just as they are now, makes a real sacrifice, however small, to help some one else, or to please some one else, is really showing that he or she is one of nature's uncrowned kings and queens.

But this is not meant to be a sermon, although I should like it to teach, as the poet Tennyson says, that—

"Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

What a lot of unkind people—cold hearts—there are in the world! It reminds me of the German story of the man who was persuaded by the Little Glass Man—a wicked sprite who lived in a fir-wood—to exchange his heart for a heart of ice, on condition that the Little Glass Man made his fortune for him. The exchange was made, and the fortune came, and the icy heart went on working as if it had been a heart of flesh, but the gold brought no joy to its owner, for he had lost the power to love, and became more and more wretched as he grew richer and richer.

There is no happiness in living only for ourselves. It is in making others happy that we become happy. That is why, of all people, real genuine Christian people are the most happy, the fullest of joy. They "feel like singing all the day," because their religion is a religion of doing good, just as Jesus Himself came into the world, and was just the kindest and the tenderest and the most sympathising Helper who ever came into the world. Now, if ever you find a miserable grumbling Christian, you may be sure that he or she has not been living to make others happy, but has only been trying to get something for his or her own selfish ends.

What a beautiful thing a truly Christian home is, where father and mother, and brothers and sisters, are all just trying to outdo each other in acts of love and kindness, and to show which can be the most unselfish, and can do most to make the others happy! I saw over the mantelpiece in a minister's house lately, a card with the inscription, "Christ is a perpetual Guest in this house. He is present at every meal, and listens to all our conversation." If it be so, and there is nothing to offend Him, that house is surely a little heaven upon earth. And why shouldn't it be? Jesus joyed to share in happy home-life while He was on earth. I think of Him at that wedding-feast, looking with smiling eyes at the merry guests, and silently blessing the new home that was being founded. I think of Him in Peter's house, with Peter's wife's mother, whom He had healed of the fever, bustling about Him in loving service. And most of all, I think of Him in the home of the sisters of Bethany, where there was always the best bedroom kept for the dear Friend who had given them back their brother from the grave. Ah! Jesus loved the home, though often He "had not where to lay His head."

There is a very pretty book by Mr. William Canton, called "The Invisible Playmate." All children, as you know, are fond of making believe, and sometimes their making believe is so realistic that you are deceived by it. Why, I have heard my boys and girls talking angrily, and behaving, as I have thought, quite badly, and when I have gone to reprove them, they have said, "We are only playing at school, and pretending to be naughty!" I do not much like that sort of making believe.

But about Mr. Canton's book. He tells of a little girl who was always pretending to play with somebody who was not there. She would carry on a conversation of which you heard only her part of it. She would sit at table and gravely take tea with her unseen companion. She would go walks with her, and really, the invisible playmate seemed more real to her than her actual boy and girl friends. And one day this unseen playmate fell ill, and for days was carefully nursed in bed, and it grew worse, and the little girl was very grave and shed silent tears, and then it died; the little girl was broken-hearted. As you read the little story you try hard to laugh at the little girl, and say, "It's only make believe," but you find that you are laughing, after all, through your tears. Yes, children's sorrows are often imaginary, but they are very real to them. But what I wanted to say is, that we should try to realize the actual presence in our homes of Christ, the Invisible Guest, just as vividly as that little girl realised the presence of her invisible playmate.

Connexional Biography.

REV. ISAAC HEDGES.

THE subject of this sketch passed to his rest and reward on September 7th, 1898. For over 20 years he had been a prominent and distinguished figure in the town of Burnley. He was tall and gentlemanly in deportment, with a frank and pleasing countenance, and possessed a voice, both strong and musical, and of marvellous compass. Kind and gentle in disposition, optimistic and genial in conversation, he won the confidence of members in all the churches, and the esteem of hundreds outside.

"Father" Hedges, as he was called, was regarded by old and young, rich and poor, as the Grand Old Man of Primitive Methodism, for he was the friend of all and the enemy of none.

He was born on Christmas Day in 1815—the memorable year of Waterloo—at Shefford, near Reading. The Connexion was then in its infancy, but already waxing strong for its great conflict. The times were stirring; the people in darkness; superstition, sensualism, cruelty, and oppression rampant, and the toilers overworked and underpaid. Scenes of Sabbath desecration, gross licentiousness, and coarse brutality were disgracefully common and appalling. The struggles for civil and religious freedom were often fierce and stern, and Isaac Hedges was destined to take a part in these struggles, and to help make that history, some chapters of which are full of the splendour of a Christly self-sacrifice, Christian heroism, and a noble, holy audacity. To men of the type of Mr. Hedges, our debt is great. The nation, the empire, the world, the Church, and especially our Connexion, are all under deep obligation to these men. How great our obligation will not be known until the great God shall reveal it from His book of Remembrance before an assembled universe.

Isaac Hedges' father was a farmer, and both his parents were members of the Church of England. In April, 1830, under the labours of the Rev. Thomas Russell, who was then missioning the southern counties with true apostolic zeal and marvellous success, Isaac, with a number of others, was converted from the error of his ways. He at once joined the Primitive Methodist Society, though much against the wishes of his parents, for in those days we were not only feeble but under great reproach. He was trained in the hardihood of apostolic simplicity, for he received his first class-ticket under a hedge, and the first sacramental service he attended was in God's temple beneath a tree. He soon began to take an active part in the great revival which was stirring the counties of Buckingham and Hertford, and the adjacent districts—a revival which was creating epochs in the history of religious life and progress. Having, in due course, been placed on the plan as a local preacher, he showed such zeal, piety, and aptitude, that in July, 1839, he was called to the work of a travelling preacher.

He commenced his ministry at Marlborough, and for nearly forty years, amid storm and calm, persecution, poverty, and stern opposition, he gave proof of his divine call to the work. Like his noble predecessor, the Apostle of the Gentiles, he was often ill-treated, spurned with contempt, pelted with refuse, driven out of the villages by the baser sort, who were often encouraged and aided by the squire and parson, condemned to prison and the treadmill as a common felon. He endured hunger and weariness, and often after walking many miles, preaching four or five times, conducting prayer meetings, leading classes, and visiting the sick, there was no room for him either in the cottage or the inn, and, having no place where to lay his head, would, in sheer exhaustion, sink upon the hard ground to rest.

It was both delightful and painful to hear him tell of the opening of some of these missions. Delightful to note his noble endurance, but painful to think of the brutal persecution, hardship, privation, and excessive toil through which he passed. In establishing societies he met with determined opposition, and often from those who ought to have given their sympathy, yet nothing daunted, he prosecuted his task against the forces of ignorance, prejudice, superstition, pride, self-interest, and worldliness, demonstrating the power of the glorious gospel to triumph over all the powers of darkness. In the recital of these experiences his face would brighten, his eyes flash with the fire of his soul, whilst his whole frame would quiver with excitement, as he punctuated his stories with exclamations of "Glory!" "Bless the Lord!" "Halleluia!" To hear him at these times was like a recital from the "Acts of the Apostles."

Some idea of his excessive and exhaustive labours may be formed by a quotation from his Journal, bearing date 1854. "Rose at 5 o'clock, read a portion of Scripture and prayed; at 6 a.m. attended a prayer meeting. After breakfast, walked fifteen miles and preached in the open-air, and conducted a prayer-meeting, after walking three miles preached in a room and led a class-meeting, then walked two-and-a-half miles and preached in a cottage, conducted a prayer meeting, and then walked seven miles, arriving home at 2 a.m., besides visiting several families and praying with them. Monday, rose at 6 a.m. After reading a portion of the Scriptures, and devotional exercises, learned some Latin words, translated some Greek exercises, read a portion of Pollok's 'Course of Time,' studied a lesson in Cassell's Popular Educator." After this we find him starting for a week's mission over the mountains and valleys of Wales, forming new societies, strengthening old ones, singing and preaching in the open-air, cottages, hired rooms, visiting the people in their homes, and, where permitted, praying with them, giving consolation to the sick, and directing the dying to the Lamb of God, and receiving such hospitality as the people would or could give him. Often on these journeys, drenched to the skin, and too foot-sore to proceed farther, he would lie down by a haystack, or beneath the shelter of an old barn, and yet amid all these toils and privations, coupled with persecution and the contempt of the people, he was delighted if he saw men and women saved, and the cause which was dear to his heart prospering.

Some idea of the stations of those days may be inferred from the fact that one of them has since been made into nine independent circuits. The toil, privations, and hardships of those days required special gifts and endowments. A sound physical constitution, more than ordinary courage, deep piety, tact, perseverance, and good common-sense, were absolutely essential. Hundreds of ordinary men entered upon this great work but gave up after a brief season, either through inability, despair, or disgust. We have often heard our old friend, Mr. Hedges, refer to some of them, some of whom he said received short calls. Of himself it could truly be said his was a call for life.

There were not many inducements in those days for young men to enter our ministry. The fare was scant, the pay small and uncertain, and even out of this small allowance had often to be deducted an adverse balance when changing stations. The homes were poor, miserably furnished, and in low neighbourhoods, and often amid unpleasant surroundings that must have been repulsive to men and women of sensitive nature. The mode of travelling from one circuit to another in those days was often tedious and expensive. Journeys that now would be accomplished in a few hours would then have taken several days.

Mr. Hedges was married in 1845 to Miss Ganstone, of Hammersmith, London, by whom he had four sons and one daughter, but of these only two sons are living, one of whom is an eminent musician and distinguished organist. His wife died in 1870, and he married again in 1897, and Mrs. Hedges survives him.

He has left a name fragrant in the memories of thousands in our Israel. During his ministry he travelled on the following circuits:—Marlborough, Windsor (twice), Hammersmith (London Mission), Wallingford, Oxford, Brinkworth, Sturminster, Buckingham, Tredegar, Falmouth, Frome, Aberdare, St. Austell, Pontefract, Clayton West, Pateley Bridge, Sowerby Bridge, Silsden and Burnley First, where he was superannuated by the Manchester Conference in 1878. For several years he was engaged by the Burnley First Circuit to visit amongst the people. This labour he accomplished with much acceptability, and he only relinquished it when compelled by failing health. Up to the last he took deep interest in the progress of the Connexion which was so dear to his heart, and in which he had spent the whole of his life. Nothing, indeed, gave him greater pleasure than to read or hear of the extension of the work. The local press has spoken in the highest praise of his life and service. Though Burnley will miss his familiar figure, and the voice which has so often rung out in the streets and from the pulpits and platforms of our town, is now silent, yet we know he is engaged in higher service for his great Master. Deep and widespread sympathy has been expressed for the widow and the two sons.

GEORGE WINDRAM.

MR. WILLIAM RAWNSLEY.

WILLIAM RAWNSLEY, whose death, in his seventy-eighth year, occurred on January 18, 1897, was born at Eccleshill, near Bradford, his parents being members of the Wesleyan Church. Upon the removal of the family to Esholt, in the Otley Circuit, young William attended the cottage services held by our people there, and became a member of society when about twelve years of age, and a local preacher at about the age of fifteen. While at Esholt he married his first wife, a Miss Forest, a saintly, useful character, with whom he lived over ten years. Their son, Mr. Rawnsley's only child, George Henry, is a useful and respected official in the Newhaven Circuit, where he now resides. Mr. Rawnsley afterwards removed to Armley, where forty-three years ago he married his second wife, who was to him a godly and devoted helpmeet. He did much to inspire the feeble Society there to arise and build their first chapel. The church, however, to reap the benefit of his ripest experience, and probably his best service, was our church at Bramley, in the Leeds Fifth Circuit, to which place he removed in 1860. At that time our Society was but feeble, and worshipped in an old and dilapidated chapel. Mr. Rawnsley's proposal for new premises was at first considered impracticable by the somewhat disheartened Society, but his quiet power did much to increase the spirit of enterprise and endeavour. Ultimately the present buildings, among the handsomest in the Connexion, and in easy circumstances, were erected. Our brother's work in the Society, and indeed, in the circuit generally, was so many-sided that he had occupied almost every office in the church, but he was supremely the counsellor, guide, and father of the church. One of our ministers writes of him:—"As an official of the church, he was one of the wisest men I ever knew. . . He was an able manager of men. . . I thank God for such men in the church, and that He has thrown my life into fellowship with them." He cherished a most tender regard for our ministers, and esteemed it ever a joy and honour to entertain them. Of Mr. Rawnsley's beautiful and symmetrical character, it may be said that "the beauty of the Lord his God was upon him," and whether at home or in the mill, of which he was manager, or in the church, he was filled with the fruits of righteousness "which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory of God." After the death of his wife, which occurred some four months before, our dear brother seemed more with her than with those left behind, and in the early morning of Jan. 18, after lying in a comatose state for a few days, he slept himself away to eternal rest. His old friend, Rev. H. Cooke, assisted at the interment, and delivered a touching address. An impressive memorial service was held in our Bramley Chapel on Sunday, Feb. 7, conducted by our circuit minister, Rev. W. D. Judson.

W. D. JUDSON.

MRS. COLING.

MARY COLING, whose maiden name was Boraston, was born on Oct. 11th, 1814. Her early years were spent at Henley, Pangbourne, and Goring. In her father's cottage Hugh Bourne once preached. She was converted when very young through the ministry of our early preachers, and for sixty-two years or more remained a faithful and consistent member of the Church of her choice. Soon after her conversion she went to live at Quick's Green, which at that early time had a very vigorous Society, and whilst there she became a local preacher, and her name appeared on the Reading Plan. She soon became an acceptable local preacher, so much so that she was approached with a view to her entering the Itinerant ministry. She preferred, however, to serve her Master in a smaller and humbler sphere. After her marriage she still continued her work. At length, as family responsibilities increased, she was obliged to relinquish the work, taking as her last text, "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound." In 1852 the family removed into Reading, and were at once identified with our Society then worshipping in Minster Street Chapel. Here, as opportunities and health permitted, she was assiduous in attending the various services, and always enjoyed the means of grace. For some years the father, mother, and children always attended the seven o'clock prayer meeting held on Sunday mornings.

On our migration as a church from Minster Street to London Street in 1866, she took an active part in begging money and assisting at the first Bazaar. In later years her health failed considerably, and for the last fifteen winters she has been confined to her home entirely, but with each returning spring, emerging from her seclusion, and reappearing on Sunday mornings in the house of God. She was intensely interested in all that pertained to the Connexion's life and work. She always welcomed into her home Primitive Methodist literature and the Primitive Methodist newspapers. During her last illness she eagerly inquired of her son, "What news is there in the 'Primitive' this week?" She revelled in Connexional biographies and memoirs. She had outlived all the companions and co-workers of her early days. During the illness that terminated fatally she was perfectly calm and happy—apparently she had not a single doubt and fear, and at length sweetly fell asleep like a tired child upon its mother's breast. She leaves behind her a dear husband to mourn her loss, who is considerably beyond the threescore years and ten, and one son and two daughters. May the Great Head of the Church vouchsafe to them that sympathy and help that they require in their time of sorrow.

J. A. C.

MRS. MARY SIMPSON.

OUR sister, Mary Simpson, who passed to her rest on February 2, 1897, was born on March 7, 1858. Her husband and friends are unable to give the precise date of her conversion, but as she was naturally of a very quiet and retiring disposition, it would not be at all likely in her case that there should be the sudden outward change or startling upheaval that some natures experience. As she attended the Mount Zion, Brompton, Sunday School from very early years, the influence of her teachers, and the Sunday School lessons and hymns gradually and almost imperceptibly influenced her young heart, so that in her teens she joined the Society and received her ticket of membership as a member of the Sunday afternoon class.

For several years she was a great sufferer from chest and lung disease, which frequently rendered her unable to attend the services of the sanctuary, or take a very prominent part in the more active work of the Society and Church; but in her frequent illnesses there was ever manifested the greatest resignation and patience. Just before Christmas her illness manifested more dangerous symptoms, but after consultation with a medical man some slight improvement took place, and it was thought she might recover, but it was not to be. A week before her death she was laid aside completely, and feeling that the time of her departure was getting near, with her own hands, unknown to her husband, proceeded to put matters in the home, with written directions, where needed, into such order that there should be no difficulty to her friends after her decease.

The friends visiting her previous to her decease found her, although exceedingly feeble, peacefully reposing on the promises of the Lord. Longing for rest, yet perfectly willing to wait the Master's time. At last the angel of death touched her, the tie that bound her to the frail tenement of clay was loosed, and her happy spirit passed into the presence of the King, to be, as her favourite hymn expresses it, "For ever with the Lord."

MRS. ISABELLA DOLPHIN.

OUR deceased sister, Isabella Dolphin, who died January 14, 1897, was originally a member of the Wesleyan Methodists, her mother and father being members of that denomination. She was brought under the influence of Primitive Methodist teaching in consequence of the fact that her father opened his house for them to hold services in at Colver, in the Bradwell Circuit, the preachers frequently staying at her home from the Saturday night until the Monday or Tuesday following. On her removal to Brompton she joined our Society about the time of the erection of the Mount Zion Chapel, and was consequently one of the oldest members connected with the place, having been associated with it for upwards of sixty years.

She was one of the quiet and retiring Christians whose influence would be more felt in the home than in the glare of public life, and the influence of her character and life is seen in the lives of her children, whom she trained in the fear of God and a deep love for Primitive Methodism and its usages.

Her leader, Bro. Henry Gaunt, says, that although she never possessed much of this world's goods, such was her true Christian character that she has been an ornament to the Church. Her experience was always given with cheerfulness.

A month or two before her death she had a slight paralytic stroke which partially affected her speech and one side. During this affliction she revealed much true Christian resignation and a cheerful trust in God, with a full reliance upon the faithfulness and love of the Lord Jesus Christ as her Saviour.

Two days before her death, although too weak for speech, she gave signs to those who visited her that all was well, and she was peacefully trusting in Jesus.

MR. WILLIAM BIRKETT.

OUR beloved brother commenced life in the small village of Bishop Norton, in Lincolnshire. He was blest with parents who prayed for their children, and endeavoured so to train them as those who must give account. This godly training led to his conversion when he was but fifteen years of age. His educational advantages were very small, but his natural gifts and his piety were such as led the authorities of the circuit to give him a call to local preachship, when he was twenty-two years of age, and the results justified their action. Nearly twenty years ago he came to reside in South Yorkshire, and here as local preacher he rendered much aid at camp-meetings and also at the ordinary services. He was also a very useful class leader. Being possessed of good voice, decent knowledge of Scripture, and unquestionable piety, he was indeed very mighty in class meetings. Under special circumstances, he regularly walked after his day's labour, midst darkness, and all sorts of weather, to a village two and a half miles from his residence, to lead the flock of God in connection with our Church. He succeeded in commencing at least two classes, one of which is amongst the best classes that it has been my privilege to know. In these, and in many other ways, he served our denomination in a very useful manner. Those of us who knew him the best had hope that his valuable life would be spared to the Church on earth for a long season; but He who doeth all things well saw fit to take him to the land of endless rest. The affliction resulting in his death became somewhat serious, and during the month of October it became quite clear that he must shortly go the way of all the earth. We were not in the least troubled concerning his safety. We had such high estimate of his piety that we fully expected that his death would illustrate the beauty and value of religion. In this we were not disappointed, for his last days on earth were days long to be remembered by his relatives and friends, because of the testimony that he gave concerning his happiness and safety. His funeral took place in Hatfield Cemetery, the writer conducting the service. A large number of people from near and far gathered around his grave, and thus testified that the "memory of the just is blessed." His death was improved by Rev. J. Wilson, in the Hatfield Chapel, on Sunday evening. A large congregation assembled, and in connection with the prayer meeting, a youth came forward and sought the God of our departed brother. He has left an afflicted widow, an aged father, and a large family of sons and daughters. It is a joy to us to know that nearly all the members of his family are serving the God of their father, and that one son and three sons-in-law are useful local preachers in our circuit.

Literary Notices.

Jesus Christ and His Surroundings. By the REV. NORMAN L. WALKER, D.D. (3s. 6d.) Hodder & Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row.

WE would defend Dr. Walker against himself. His appraisal of his own work is far too modest. He disclaims all idea of giving a new Life of Christ, and pretends to have communicated in his book no other knowledge than an ordinary reader of the Gospels may possess. A life of the ordinary kind—dealing with events in their chronological order—we certainly have not in this volume. Its character forbids it. The various relations Christ sustained to nature, the spirit world, the outlying races of men, His own kith and kin, the rich, the poor, the government of His time, etc., are passed in review, and the Scripture passages which throw any light on Christ's relations to these are skilfully grouped, and their combined light concentrated. The resultant impression made on the reader is quite as distinct, and perhaps more powerful, than the impression likely to be made by the reading of an ordinary chronological Life of Christ. And we can also testify that, while Dr. Walker does not claim for his book that it is particularly original, we have found it often very suggestive. Regarded from fresh angles and points of view, many of the old sayings concerning Christ are made to stand out with new significance. This is much for a writer to accomplish.

Words of Strength and Cheer, for those who Work and those who Weep, gathered from the Writings of Phillips Brooks, sometime Bishop of Massachusetts. By MAY COCHRANE. R. Dickinson, 89, Farringdon Street.

THE title of this book is so clear and explicit as to render much further description unnecessary. The passages from the published discourses of Bishop Brooks have been selected in view of "those moments of discouragement, weakness, and depression that come to all alike." The introductory memoir with which this volume is enriched shows what a charming personality Phillips Brooks possessed, and how great was his influence in the United States. Americans seem to have regarded him as quite as great in mind as he was in body—he stood six feet four. Indeed, the writer of the biographical sketch referred to, claims for him that "he was beyond dispute, the greatest preacher America has produced." Some Englishmen—of whom this reviewer is one—would be disposed to demur to this estimate, and give the premier place to Beecher. However, we believe this is not the verdict of the Americans themselves, who almost idolised Phillips Brooks while living, and now deplore his loss and greatly revere his memory. And, truly, his was a great and lovable soul.

Christ Come and Coming. By FOLLAND. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE writer of this book seems to us to have a distinct message to utter. He holds that the Second Advent is past; that Christ has come and abides, and that He rules the world in righteousness. The outward signs of His advent were the Destruction of Jerusalem and the passing away of the Jewish polity. He cautions us against identifying this Second Coming of Christ with the promised sending of the Holy Spirit. He regrets that the translators of our Authorised Version, and even the Revisers, have obscured the distinction between Christ's coming and His presence by relegating the latter word to the margin. It is while insisting upon the abiding presence of Christ, and explaining the believer's relation thereto, that our author is most suggestive and spiritually helpful. He thinks we postpone the application of many passages of Scripture to the next life which have to do with this. Christ is now our Judge and King. We should seek the manifestation of His presence, and beware lest, in honouring the Holy Spirit, we do not do so to the disparagement of the Son. What our author says on this important and yet somewhat obscure point of practical theology is well worth careful study. Some attribute the work of Sanctification almost entirely to the Spirit, but he holds that the work of the Spirit is mainly preparatory, and to be carefully distinguished from what Christ imparts to us by His indwelling. In the realisation of the abiding Presence of Christ there stretches out before the believer a boundless vista of blessed possibilities of which the experiences of God's saints in various ages and Churches furnish some hints. Some of the most remarkable of these experiences are given. The book is devoutly written, and devoutly read cannot fail to result in much spiritual quickening.

The Man who Feared God for Nought, being a Rhythmical Version of the Book of Job. By OTIS CARY. Elliot Stock, Paternoster Row.

THE critical and moral questions springing out of the book that Carlyle called "one of the grandest things ever written with pen," are of perennial interest. Some of these questions are discussed in the interesting essay prefixed to this volume. Mr. Cary is disposed to believe that Job belongs to the cycle of the Wisdom literature, and that, while Job was a real historic character, the drama which has him for its central figure, turns on the problem of the relation between sin and suffering raised by the leprosy of Uzziah and the sickness of Hezekiah; that it must therefore have been written as late as the reign of the latter king, and possibly by Isaiah. The Rhythmical version here given is not based on a new translation, but mainly on the Revised version with a few verbal transpositions rendered necessary in order to preserve the Rhythm. Occasional irregular lines occur which, as the author observes, may not be a defect, since they relieve the poem from the monotony which the parallelism of the Hebrew verse, together with unvarying pentameter lines, would have produced. The version here given seems to us to possess very considerable merits. We have noticed a few doubtful locutions which we should think are due to the imperfect reading of proofs. For instance, we have "meter," "Encyclopædia Britannica," "Counselor," while "bran-new" occurs twice over.

The Church of the West in the Middle Ages. By HERBERT B. WORKMAN, M.A. (Books for Bible Students.) (2s. 6d.) C. H. Kelly, 2, Castle St., City Road.

A BOOK like this should encourage some to take up the fascinating but undeservedly neglected study of Ecclesiastical History. The plan of Mr. Workman's volume is good, alike in what it excludes and includes. He has not dissipated his strength and run the risk of wearying his readers by multiplicity of detail, but has confined himself to the great outstanding features of the period under consideration, which is the one comprised between the dates 800 and 1153. The book is divided into three parts, the first dealing with the Rise of the Papal Supremacy, the second with Scholasticism, and the third with Monasticism. Those who may wish to pursue their studies on these still farther will find supplied useful references to accessible authorities. A second volume is contemplated, bringing the History down to the Reformation.

Judgment, Human and Divine. By REV. G. JACKSON, B.A. (1s. 6d. net.) Isbister & Co., Ltd., 15 and 16, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

THIS new work of Mr. Jackson's may be unreservedly recommended as a fresh and practical contribution to Christian Ethics.

The Restored Innocence. By R. J. CAMPBELL. (Little Books on Religion.) (1s. 6d.) Hodder & Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row.

THE title, "Restored Innocence," seems a paradox, for is not innocence once lost irrecoverable, like the fractured vase which can never again become flawless? But Mr. Campbell seeks to justify the paradox, and he does it in a very beautiful and forcible way. He holds that the essential element of innocence is not the negation of the knowledge of sin, but the negation of sympathy and compromise with it. In this sense Christ was "innocent," and in this sense innocence may be restored. The second part of the booklet is taken up with a fine discourse on the nature and conditions of true repentance.

A DELIGHTFUL and original book for children. The volume contains twelve simple and clear narratives taken from the Bible. No names are mentioned, and all references to places or persons are made by pronouns or in some roundabout way. At the end of each chapter questions are appended; while at the end of the volume removable answers are inserted for the use of parents. The touch of mystery will give zest and interest to the children's reading.

David Brown, D.D., LL.D., Professor and Principal of the Free Church College, Aberdeen. A Memoir. By WILLIAM GARDEN BLAIKIE, D.D. (7s. 6d.) Hodder & Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE name of Principal Brown was for many years known and honoured, not only in Scotland, but in England also, and even in America, so that Dr. Blaikie's excellent memoir is both opportune and welcome, in making us see what manner of man the Principal was. Both biographer and subject had been intimate friends for a lifetime, and were brother professors in the same Church, though in different colleges. It was therefore fitting that Dr. Blaikie should give the world this biographic portrait of his friend, and a full and capable portrait it is.

Dr. Brown's life ran on to an almost patriarchal span, and but for an accident which occurred three years before his death, he might have seen the century out. The biographer's first sentence has reference to this:—"Practically, Dr. David Brown's life stretched from end to end of the nineteenth century, for he was born on the 17th August, 1803, a little less than three years after it began, and he died July 3rd, 1897, a little more than three years before its end." What changes and revolutions he saw, from the wars of Napoleon on to the present day! What hosts of notable men in politics, science, theology and literature were his contemporaries! Singular to say that such a long-lived man should have been the most puny and feeble of infants, so that an aunt, Mrs. Dyce, who "assisted" at the birth, and whose daughter was destined to be his beloved wife for forty years, said that he could not live, and that it would be a mercy if God were to take him. His mother was of the finest type of womanhood, so that her children rose up to call her blessed; albeit her extreme Calvinism made her own one of pervading gloom; she was the spiritual child of "Mr. Fear- ing." "Glad should I be," she wrote to her son David in after years, "if I could say anything cheering as to the state of my soul, but I cannot." She had two sons and three sons-in-law, all gifted ministers, yet she never heard them preach, because it was against the conscience of a Secessionist to enter an alien church. In her husband's trade as a paper maker, and in his business as a bookseller she was most helpful and energetic. Never did mother love her children more ardently, or do more for them, and hence the mingled love and reverence in which they held her. David's education was carried on in the High School, and from his pluck and perseverance it was no wonder that he came out "dux" when he was fourteen. Nor are we surprised that he should honourably win his M.A. degree at the University of his native city when he was eighteen; students of "pairs" often did that.

But the vital, formative force in his life was the salvation of Christ. He grew into this; that is, it was not by a single leap or bound, it was a series of steps. When the first was taken he could not tell, but the last he knew. This decision of surrender and consecration to God was taken under the preaching of Dr. Cæsar Malan, a Genevan divine, who was evangelising in this country. Light, liberty, and joy filled his soul; from this time his path shone more and more to the perfect day. Throughout his future life his great theme was the Cross; from this he never deviated; it was in the forefront of all his sermons. He obtained his licence as a preacher of the Gospel in June, 1826.

It was the father's wish that his newly-pledged son should "see London" in the beginning of his career, which he did, and through Mr. James Nisbet, the well-known publisher, was introduced to Edward Irving, then at the height of his fame, and so much pleased was he with the young Aberdonian licentiate, that he became his assistant for over two years. This was the period of the introduction of the "unknown tongues" practice, with the scenes that followed; this and other vagaries of the great preacher led ultimately to his overthrow. For the man himself and his wonderful gifts, Mr. Brown cherished a profound admiration and reverence through life, though he was obliged to dissociate himself from teaching and practices which tended to disorder and irreverence. It was not till 1824 that he got a ministerial charge, and then it was to an out-of-the-way, almost out-of-the-world, parish in Banffshire, known as "The Ord." It was a country chapel in a bare and desolate region, a small manse, and a stipend of £100 per year. The only population was the small farmers and their servants scattered about. But he could wait no longer; he must get his foot on the lowest round of the ladder to climb to better things. Having settled and taken to himself one of the best of wives, he girded himself for his life's work. By his labours, his visitation, his earnest preaching, he soon became a power for good through the whole district, and was known as "Brown o' the Ord." These ten years served to establish his name in the Church. In the great Disruption struggle, no advocate of freedom was more indefatigable, and few more able. He was one of the 474 who signed the Deed of Demission, and went out from manse and church not knowing whither he went. He had not long to wait, for Glasgow wanted the sort of minister he was, and he became the first minister of Free St. James' in the metropolis of the West. As might be expected from a man of his energy, intellectual resource, and preaching power, he built up the excellent church and congregation of St. James'. This period of fourteen years was a very fruitful one in a literary respect. It was here that he wrote his Commentary on the Gospels. In this work his master and model was Bengel's Gnomon (and what better model could he have had?); Bengel was his ideal; he esteemed Calvin as an exegete, but he valued Bengel more. Undeniably valuable as this Commentary was, his work on The Second Advent established his fame upon a solid and enduring basis; it gave him a place among theologians of the foremost rank. Irving's rhapsodies first specially directed his mind to this one of the "Last Things." His book dealt a heavy blow at the fanciful theories and exegesis of the pre-millennial writers of that period. This "noble example of careful Biblical research" stands on the firm ground that the teaching of the Bible is that the Second Advent will take place at the end of the world. Never was the title of D.D. better deserved than when the Princeton University (the College of Jonathan Edwards and Charles Hodge) conferred that distinction upon him in 1852. Afterwards, his own alma mater gave him the same doctorate, and after that again, the further honour of LL.D. In 1857 he was nominated for a vacant chair in the New College, Edinburgh, but another man was chosen. The Assembly, however, appointed him to a chair at Aberdeen; and thus, after twenty-two years' absence from his native city, Professor Brown returned to spend the rest of his life there. During the thirty years of his occupancy of this chair, how many budding ministers he must have had through his hands, and what an impress for good he must have left upon them. Of his scholastic acquirements, his knowledge of the literature of his subjects, his skill as an exegete, and his gifts as a teacher, there is a general agreement among those qualified to speak. But the outstanding feature of his teaching was its evangelical character; he iterated and reiterated that "the essential feature" of the student's future work was "seeking for souls, a watching for souls; nor must they be content with getting them into the Church, but looking after them one by one."

In regard to such Scottish Church questions as the union of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches, the use of hymns and the introduction of organs in public worship, the relaxation of the bonds of the Westminster Confession of Faith, Principal Brown stood boldly on the liberal side; nor was he less bold and energetic in the revivalistic work of Moody and Sankey, and other Revivalists. The singing element had a great attraction for him, being himself no inconsiderable musician, and having a rich clear voice. In politics he was an ardent Liberal to the end. He visited and corresponded with men of such opposite opinions and beliefs as Cardinal Newman and Dr. Martineau, and when in London he stayed with Dean and Lady Augusta Stanley. As a member of the New Testament Company he appears to have played the part of a critic rather than proposing new readings. But the crowning honours of his life came when, in 1876, he was made Principal of his own college, and in 1884, when he was called to the Moderator's Chair of the Free Church Assembly. We pass over the most painful episode of his life—the prominent part he took in the Robertson Smith case. While he had a spirit of large tolerance for differences of opinion, he was convinced that his gifted, brilliant young colleague had overstepped such bounds; though his prominence in the affair arose from his position in the Aberdeen Presbytery.

The setting of the sun after a long day was calm and beautiful. His powers of locomotion failed him, as did his eyesight, but his mind was unclouded till he slept away into everlasting day. He was a man of many friends and few enemies, if any. He was a full man, and was ever ready to impart. His convictions were strongly held, yet held in love. If not to be counted amongst the greatest thinkers and scholars, he was not far in the rear.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

—A Special District Meeting appointed by the District Meeting held in Morphett Street Church in March last, and invested with full power to act, was held in the same church on September 9th, to consider and deal with the question of Methodist Union in Australia, and to this meeting all resolutions and documents from the British Conference were submitted. It was decided that all information needed by the Sub-Committee appointed by the Conference in Leeds to consider the financial aspects of the question should be supplied, and that negotiations be opened with the Sub-Committee for the settlement of the indebtedness of the South Australian District to the British Book Room. These resolutions, we suppose, have taken effect, and the Sub-Committee will now be in possession of the desired information, and so will be in a position to resume their deferred consideration of matters when they have obtained the information they are seeking in this country. It has been decided to consummate union in this District in March, 1900, and consequently the authorities urge the speedy settlement of their pending claims, which, as will be seen from the following paragraph, are neither small nor unimportant.

—The proposed Union of the Methodist Churches in Australia raises several financial questions of some interest to both the Churches in this country, and at the Antipodes. Many of the ministers in the Colonies are, of course, members of the Itinerant Preachers' Friendly Society, and the Union will, as a matter of course, terminate their membership in this Society. Then comes the question as to the value of their interest in it, for it is a registered Society with a considerable reserve capital. This interest of the Colonial ministers will, of course, have to be actuarially valued, and payment made accordingly, subject to such deduction as the state of each case may render necessary. But there is the Superannuated Ministers and Widows' Fund, upon which it is questionable that any claim can be made on actuarial grounds. This Fund is practically a benevolent Fund, to which the ministers certainly subscribe, but which is mainly sustained by the Connexion at large, some £6,700 or more being paid over yearly from the Book Room and the Connexional Fund. This Fund is an exhaustive Fund, the money being paid out each year. The Colonial ministers expect they have some claim upon it, and so they have while they continue Primitive Methodist ministers, and they and their churches subscribe for its support the same as the Home Churches do. But the question is, Can they have any claim beyond what these conditions imply? This is the question which the Committee appointed by last Conference has to consider. It was proposed on behalf of the Colonies, that they should be relieved of all responsibility for Annuitants now residing on Colonial Stations, and that these responsibilities should be provided for by the Churches in this country. But this was seen to be inequitable, as the Colonial Churches when separated from the British Conference would take with them all sources of revenue, and it was not regarded as an equitable arrangement that they should take with them the sources of revenue and leave the obligations behind them. A suggestion that the sources of revenue should continue, and the obligations also, was considered more equitable, though this suggestion was seen to be beset with many difficulties. Another suggestion, that all Colonial ministers should, while in active work, pay £7 7s. into the Fund annually, was negatived, as the proposed payment was no equivalent for the revenue that would be withdrawn when Union was effected. The whole question is under further consideration, but any continued obligation will have to be met by at least a revenue equal to what has during past years been contributed by Colonial ministers and Stations, and the difficulty is to secure this when separation from the British Conference is effected. Possibly some equitable and agreeable basis of settlement may be found, but at present it is not easy to see how and whence it will emerge.

—The first Quarterly report has been received by the Missionary Committee from the Mission Stations in the newly-formed Devon and Cornwall District. The report does not show much change from the state of things as reported in June last. A decrease that cannot well be afforded is reported from the Teignmouth and Dawlish Station. This Mission at the best is feeble, and there does not appear to have been much progress made for years past. More convenient places of worship are much needed in these two sea-side resorts, but the churches are too feeble to meet this need, and the Missionary Committee is not in a position to render such help as the case requires. With better premises there might be some chance of developing our Connexional interest on this part of the coast of Devon, but without these our labours must necessarily be crippled. The Plymouth Station makes steady progress, and an effort is to be made to strengthen the outlying Church at Holbeton by securing the services of a superannuated minister, who will reside at the place. The other missions do not show much progress, but report hopeful prospects.

—The Fund for assisting aged and necessitous Local Preachers continues its beneficent work. Among recent applicants for aid the youngest was seventy-four years of age, and the oldest eighty. One had been forty-four years a local preacher, another forty-eight years, and another fifty years. It is sad to think that men who have lived sober, righteous and godly lives for all these years have been placed in circumstances only admitting of the bare supply of current needs. Plainly labour does not get a fair proportion of the growing wealth of the country. We cannot say from what part of the Kingdom the requests for aid mostly come, but we should suppose from those districts where the wages of labour don't rise above ten or eleven shillings per week. There is some need for reform in the relations between labour and capital. Men ought, at any rate, to have the chance of living comfortably and making some provision for old age, and those acquainted with the agricultural districts know that they have no such chance. Men such as those who are receiving aid from this Fund have most of them had no chance of providing for the needs of gathering years when they were no longer able to toil with the vigour of youth. The Church is but recognising a duty of practical religion by the establishment and working of this Fund.

—The Sunderland and Newcastle District Missionary Committee is endeavouring to accomplish what we hope every other District Missionary Committee in the Connexion will try to effect, that is, to realise all the promises made to the Jubilee Fund. Many promises in most of the Districts are yet unredeemed, and the time for closing the Fund is drawing on apace; so that immediate action is necessary. Let the matter be taken in hand in every District where there are outlying promises, and then the original aim of the Fund may be realised.

—The Sunderland and Newcastle District Missionary Committee has engaged to provide the Missionary Breakfast next May; and the same District will also provide the Breakfast at the Annual Meeting of the Orphanage, the same week. We believe, too, that gentlemen from the North will preside at the Orphanage Meetings. The Northern Districts take a deep interest in this Institution, and rank among its most liberal supporters.

—There has been a growing desire in the Hull District for some time for an increase of spiritual vitality and power. This desire found expression when the District Committee decided to convene conventions to promote its realisation. Owing to the extent of the District it was decided for Conventions to assemble at two centres, and Bridlington and Hull were chosen as the most convenient places. The Conventions were fixed for Friday, November 4th. Some 1,500 Church officials received cards of invitation, and letters urging them to attend, and a large number responded to the invitation. Three sessions were held at each centre, and the same subject was considered in each Convention at the same session. The subjects were eminently practical, and had direct relation to Church life and work. The morning session was devoted to considering whether Primitive Methodism was or was not fulfilling its mission in the area covered by the District. The afternoon session was devoted to considering the duties and responsibilities of Class Leaders, and the evening session to the Relation of Officials to Church Prosperity. The subjects were introduced in a plain, practical and earnest manner, and the conversations which followed gave evidence of much serious thought. The devotional part of the day's proceedings were attended by rich spiritual influence, and great good is anticipated in the District from these gatherings. A repetition of them is desired, and will probably be arranged for at no distant date.

—The Hull Primitive Methodist Council has for a few years now contributed £30 annually to the Victoria Hospital in that important seaport. This contribution secures the appointment of two life-members, and also the privilege of naming two cots in the hospital, "Primitive Methodist Sunday-school cots." The £30 is regularly raised in the Sunday-schools in Hull and the neighbourhood, and is an excellent method of interesting the young people in works of charity and leading them to sympathetically regard the suffering. In most of our towns something like this might be done, and an important part of Christian education be promoted thereby, as well as much needed help afforded to some of the most useful philanthropic institutions in our land.

—The Kendal Station has for fifty years and more conducted a Mission in a part of the town where the poor most do congregate. For some years past this Mission has been conducted in a rented room, and was under the charge of Mr. Job Pennington, a man of apostolic piety and zeal, and untiring labour. For many years, winter and summer, Mr. Pennington and his helpers conducted two open-air services every Sabbath beside the services in the Mission-room, and had the room open for service of one kind or another nearly every night in the week. Many who were far sunk in sin and wretchedness have by this Mission been reached and rescued, and are now living and walking in the fear of God. Mr. Pennington's work commanded the sympathy of many gentlemen in the town of Kendal and the neighbourhood, and they were not slow in recognising its value and affording support. Some months ago this good man died, but his labour remains, and the Mission still goes on. Circumstances have occurred rendering it necessary for the rented room to be given up, but steps have been taken to secure a site right in the midst of the population the Mission has served on which to erect a "Job Pennington Memorial Mission Hall." The undertaking commands the good wishes and practical sympathy of the town. One gentleman gives £100, and another £50, and others lesser sums. The building will be commenced in the spring, and there is every prospect that it will be opened free from debt. It will be a worthy memorial of an excellent man, who was, under God, the means of doing incalculable good in the town in which he was born, and in which he spent the most of his life. Mr. Pennington was only a working quarryman, but he became a recognised force, working for righteousness in the town. He was a fearless man, whom opposition never daunted, and who was never afraid in any place when duty required to bear testimony for his Master. He was held in general esteem, and whatever men had to say against the Churches, no man could gainsay the evidence of Job Pennington's life. He went down to his grave amid universal regret, and it is a meet and proper thing to perpetuate his memory in the neighbourhood where for many years he devotedly sought to lead his fellows to the freedom and joy of the Christian life.

—The Rev. T. Jackson has just completed twenty-two years' mission work in East London, and the twenty-second anniversary of his appointment has just been celebrated. Mr. Jackson has not entered into any man's labour. He has taken the ground as a pioneer, and under God's blessing, has raised up the interests comprehended in the area over which he has worked. Three Stations have sprung from his labour and that of his helpers. Walthamstow, with three Connexional chapels, and a rented chapel that will in a short time become Connexional. Clapton, with three Connexional chapels, one of which was taken from Stoke Newington Station because that Station was not able to work it as it needed to be worked in one of the poorest and worst districts in East London, and Southend, where excellent Connexional premises have been secured. The Missionary Committee have rendered Mr. Jackson much assistance in his work, and the result is an ample compensation for the outlay. Mr. Jackson has also taken charge of the Working Lads' Institute in White-chapel Road, where every form of social and evangelistic work is being carried on with great success, and to this centre of work probably his labour will be confined after next Conference. He has also established a Home of Rest in Southend, which has proved a blessing to many a convalescent person in poor circumstances, who otherwise could not have obtained the change to the seaside needful for the full restoration of health. We regret that at present Mr. Jackson's state of health gives cause for anxiety, and this is not surprising when we consider the labour he has put into these twenty-two years. We trust, however, he may recover strength and be able to continue his valuable service to the Church for some years yet.

The Wider Outlook.

—Affairs in the Established Church are fast approaching an acute stage. The doings of the Ritualistic section are so pronouncedly Roman that the laity are taking alarm, and the Archbishop of Canterbury has felt compelled to attempt to define what is, and what is not, admissible in the doctrine, ritual and discipline of the State Church. His charge was divided into three sections, the first being delivered in the Cathedral Church of the province; the second at Maidstone; and the third at Croydon. It is open to question whether the pronouncements of the Archbishop will effect anything approaching a satisfactory settlement of the questions by which Episcopacy is distracted and divided, or secure peace within the State fold. Judging from the immediate effect of Dr. Temple's deliverances, his effort is more likely to accentuate the existing divisions than to harmonise them as in all probability was his desire and design. The charge is viewed by the Evangelicals with alarm, and regarded by the Ritualists as affording them some vantage ground, and there is much to be said in favour of both these views. As the Record puts it, the Archbishop, instead of peace, has introduced the sword, and instead of quenching the flames of controversy now raging in the Establishment, has added to their intensity. While, on the other hand, the Guardian dwells with satisfaction on the advantages given to Ritualists by the Primate's utterances. Emphasised discord rather than harmony promises to be the result of this remarkable charge, the definitions of which are as fine a sample of ecclesiastical trimming as any dignity of the Church ever furnished.

—First place is given to the doctrine of the Eucharist. The Zwinglian view which regards the Lord's Supper as a commemorative rite, but at the same time a means of grace, is swept aside, and the Primate joins hands with the Greek and Roman and Lutheran Churches in maintaining that with the elements administered there is a real gift bestowed, and that the English Church does not forbid the doctrine that there is a real presence attached to the elements at the time of consecration; so that the bread and wine are not after consecration exactly in the same condition they were before. He, however, repudiates the Roman transubstantiation, and propounds a kind of consubstantiation similar to the Lutheran theory—that is that after consecration we have the bread and wine plus a real presence of Christ in connection therewith—not a presence realised, as Hooker taught, in the believer, a subjective real presence, but a presence objectively connected with the elements. The Primate does not say bluntly that this is the doctrine of the State Church, he puts it in another way, and says that the Church does not forbid it, so that any clergyman of the Establishment is at liberty to teach this form of Eucharistic doctrine, and regulate his practice accordingly. No wonder this deliverance upon a crucial question delights the ritualist party, for it is distinctly favourable to sacerdotalism. Certain words pronounced by a priest bring into connection with the bread and wine the real presence of Christ. The same words pronounced by any other man won't do it. The whole theory of priestism is contained here, just as fully and just as truly as in the Roman Church. The difference is merely one of form. In one case the Romanist says that by the consecratory act of the priest the bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ; in the other case by the consecratory act of the priest, the body and blood of Christ become connected with the bread and wine. The one is transubstantiation, that is a transformation of the substance of the bread and wine into the real body and blood of Christ; the other is consubstantiation; that is, the connection of the real body and blood of Christ with the bread and wine—and in each case the real presence is due to the consecratory act of the priest. The whole sacerdotal theory is here, and to this the Primate commits the State Church.

—In respect to worship, the Primate said that the Church of England sanctioned no worship of the Virgin, nor of any Apostle, nor the invocation of any saint. But he went on to say any person who believes Christ to be present in the Eucharist may adore Him, though he must not do it by any visible expression of adoration except kneeling to receive the elements. A singular limitation this, if the real presence is consubstantiated with the elements. Prayers to the dead—that is, the invocation of saints, the Church does not allow, so the Primate says—but prayers for the dead are not forbidden. They are not authorised in Church ritual, but they are not prohibited; and so the thin end of the Romish practice of masses for the dead finds a foothold in the Primate's charge. In relation to confession, the Primate speaks as he does on some other questions, with two voices, and, of course, the clergy are at liberty to heed which voice they please. Confession, he admits, is morally hurtful, and weakens the authority of conscience by making forgiveness possible on terms stated by the priest; it interferes with the sacred privacy of domestic life, and is otherwise injurious to the individual. But he maintains that it is lawful in the State Church, only it must be free and voluntary, there must be no compulsion, nor ought any clergyman to institute a process of questioning the person who comes to confession, but simply to hear the matter which is the cause of distress or trouble. So the Primate gives license in the Church for a practice that he declares is morally hurtful; and actually commends it as likely to be a spiritual help in some cases—only it must be confession to a priest, as he alone can absolve. While the Primate denounces the practice with one voice, he gives away the whole position with the other, and concedes to the sacerdotal party their theory of priestly absolution.

—In relation to ceremonial, the Primate goes strongly for uniformity, in fact, he maintains that it is the unity of ceremonial that enables the Church to tolerate a diversity of opinion in teaching. Diverse doctrine may be taught if only unity of ceremonial is maintained. A singular position to take up. According to the rule of strict ceremonial, as stated by the Primate, it is contrary to the law of the Church to elevate the consecrated elements in the Communion office; to receive them after the office is over; to carry them out of the Church for any purpose whatever; to use incense ceremonially, by carrying it in procession, or by censuring persons or things; to mix water with wine ceremonially by doing it visibly during the Communion office; to introduce additional prayers, psalms, hymns, or anthems, at any part of the services except where there is special order permitting it. This is a commendous statement of what is not allowable in the order of the State Church; yet is there any one of the particulars which the Primate so distinctly states to be essential to Church order but what is violated with impunity in many an English parish? The unity of ceremonial of which the Primate speaks is a fiction. It does not exist. There is in the Established Church a diversity in ceremonial, corresponding to the diversity of doctrine, in fact, the ritualistic ceremonial so common in the parishes of England is the exponent of the doctrinal diversity that prevails; and the Primate does not live in such a fool's paradise as to be ignorant of this.

—In the latter part of his charge Dr. Temple refers to the authority by which this uniformity of ceremonial has to be maintained. This authority is vested in the Episcopal Bench. The Bishops possess, so the Primate says, two kinds of power—one coercive, to be exercised through the Courts, the other non-coercive, resting wholly on the law of the Church and to be enforced by spiritual means only. But it appears that neither of these kinds of power is of any value for maintaining order in the ceremonial of the Church. If a dispute arises in any parish as to the meaning and application of any rubric, the matter in question may be referred to the bishop of the diocese, who may interpret the rubric, but cannot enforce his interpretation. He may interpret, but the parties to the dispute may please themselves whether they accept the interpretation or not. But there are the Courts. Yes, but what does it cost to put them in operation? and when they are put in operation it is not the bishop's authority that acts, but the authority of the Court. His own direct power under the law of the Church is ineffective; his power to move the Courts is hampered with serious difficulty, and when he uses it he simply shows that the Church is subject to other authority than that vested in her bishops. In fact, Dr. Temple confesses to impotency all round. Ceremonial unity belongs to the order of the Church, but the bishops are powerless to maintain it.

—This charge of the Primate of the English Church shows as clearly as can be that the only solution of the difficulties entangling the Episcopal Church in this country is Disestablishment. It is a conglomeration of antagonisms held together despite these differences and hostilities, by the bond of State patronage. Let that bond be cut and the divergent parties will at once separate and each assume the authority and control of a free church, and manage its affairs as do the other free churches, subject to the law of the land, in all over which the State has rightful jurisdiction, but in all other respects perfectly at liberty to direct and control its own concerns. Until this comes to pass the real life and power of Episcopacy will never find its full expression, nor its legitimate sphere of action.

—On the 27th of October, Dr. Fairbairn sailed from Tilbury to deliver the course of the Haskell Lectures in the principal cities of India. Dr. Fairbairn is the second lecturer, the first being Dr. John H. Barrows, who presided at the "Parliament of Religions" which met in Chicago in 1893, and, perhaps, to whom more than to any other man that remarkable gathering was due. As one result of the discussions in that assembly, Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell, a wealthy lady of Chicago, founded a lectureship bearing her name, in connection with the University of that city, on Comparative Religion. But beyond this, influenced by the appeals of some of the Oriental delegates attending the Parliament, she founded a second lectureship on the same subject of Comparative Religion, the lectures to be delivered in the chief centres of Indian life and learning. It is this course that Dr. Fairbairn has gone out to deliver. The intention of the lectures is to present to the scholarly and thoughtful people of India, in a friendly, temperate, conciliatory way, and in the fraternal spirit which pervaded the Parliament of Religions, the great questions of the truths of Christianity, its harmonies with the truths of other religions, its rightful claims, and the best method of setting them forth. The lectureship is to be a work of enlightenment and fraternity. The general title of the course Dr. Fairbairn intends to deliver is, "Religions and the Philosophy of Religion," and will comprehend lectures on the following subjects: (1.) The Interpretation of Nature and the Creative Ideas of Religion; (2.) The Interpretation of Man and the Ideal of Religion; (3.) The Interpretation of Life and the ultimate Ideas of Religion; (4.) The Origin and Historical Development of Religion; (5.) The Historical Personality in Religion; (6.) Comparisons of Religions as regards Conceptions of God and Man. The whole course will be delivered in the three Presidency cities, Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras, and some of the lectures in Lahore, Agra, and Delhi, and perhaps in other cities, for Dr. Fairbairn purposes to visit the principal centres of Hindoo thought and worship. We presume the course will be published, and will be eagerly looked for by all students of theology. It will be the end of February before Dr. Fairbairn returns to this country.

—The Wesleyan Methodists are vigorously pushing their Twentieth Century Fund Scheme, and are sanguine of success. The million guineas will in all probability be raised. At any rate, so confident are the chief promoters of the Fund that they arranged for a distribution of it at a recent meeting of the Committee, which the President stated was the largest and most important financial Committee ever convened in Methodism, and this was no exaggeration, for there were present at least a dozen ex-Presidents, and most of the leaders of Methodism, lay and cleric. The attendance was so large that the Mission House could not furnish sufficient accommodation, and the meetings were held in City Road Chapel. All parts of the Connexion were represented. A fairly lengthy agenda had been prepared by the officers of the Fund, in conjunction with representatives of several Connexional Committees. For the purchase of sites and the erection of chapels, schools, and mission halls, a sum of £300,000 is to be appropriated, and the administration of this sum will be entrusted to the Chapel Committee, located in Manchester, which is to be strengthened for this work by representatives from other parts of the Connexion. For educational purposes £200,000 is to be set apart, and out of this sum the cost of a training college for women teachers in the North of England is to be provided. Foreign Mission work will absorb £100,000, and a like sum will be devoted to Home Mission and Temperance Work. One-fourth of the million has to be used in the erection of a Methodist Church House in the neighbourhood of Charing Cross or Regent Street, comprehending a large hall to accommodate 3,000 persons, and smaller hall to accommodate 1,000, a room for the Allan Library, with committee rooms and departmental offices. In all probability the West End Mission will find a permanent home in this building. Dr. Stephenson's work among the children is put down for £50,000. Out of the £200,000 devoted to Education, Scholarships will be provided in connection with the Leys School, and possibly some scholarship connected with some University. The position of Methodism in the villages is to be strengthened in connection with Home Mission work. It is a big scheme, but it is in a fair way of becoming a fact. Superintendents have been requested to furnish a reliable estimate of the number of persons in their circuits who will contribute their guinea to the Fund, and it is expected to show a goodly number at the inaugural meeting of the Fund. The success of the scheme seems already assured.

REV. WALTER GRAHAM.

Rev. Walter Graham.

HE Rev. W. Graham has spent the whole of his life in the Manchester and Liverpool Districts, and few men have been better known or more generally respected than he. His parents were associated with our cause, and, according to their ability, supported it by their service and their purse. His brother, the Rev. J. Graham, after forty-three years of devoted and efficient service in our ministry, superannuated in 1893. He is now approaching three-score years and ten, but still preaches almost every Sunday. He is a kind of pastor of our Church at West Kirby, in the Birkenhead Circuit. Mr. W. Graham was born at Marple on December 21st, 1841. He attended our Sunday School in the village, and when a youth just entering his teens, he was converted and became a member of our Marple Church, which at that time belonged to New Mills Circuit. The human agent of his conversion was the late Rev. Charles Jackson, brother of the Rev. J. Jackson, ex-president of Conference. Mr. C. Jackson was a cultured preacher and a lovable man. After a membership of two years, the love of Mr. Graham waxed cold, and he was lost to the Church, but he was dissatisfied and miserable, and in a revival which broke out in a neighbouring church, he was restored to salvation and sought re-admission to our Church. His conversion was a clear and distinct experience. It was a conscious breaking with his past, and a conscious entrance into a new life. This fact is one reason for the marked emphasis which in his preaching he lays on the necessity and importance of regeneration.

Our friend now settled down to the cultivation of his spiritual life, the improvement of his mind, and to such Christian work as was open to him. He was diligent in his attendance at the means of grace. He gave himself to reading and study. He took an active part in the Sabbath School, in the prayer-meetings, and mission services. His general deportment won the respect of his neighbours and the esteem of the Church.

He was put on the plan as a local preacher on the recommendation of the late Rev. G. Herod in December, 1859. They were accustomed to lay hands upon men more suddenly in those times than now; but there must have been some special reason both in our brother and in the circumstances of the station, when one so young in years, who had only been in the Church a few weeks, was appointed to publicly preach the Word of God. This was done by the Quarterly Meeting without consulting our brother. There was nothing strange in this, for the members were expected to regard the call of the Church as the call of God. Our brother took this view. He entered upon his work with fear and trembling, yet with all his mind and heart, and more than justified the appointment. His ministry of the Word as a local preacher was acceptable to the churches, and was confirmed with signs following.

He was recommended as a fit and proper person for a travelling preacher by the September Quarterly Meeting of his station in 1862, and in October of the same year went as a hired local preacher to what is now the Manchester Fourth Circuit, but at that time it was a Branch of the Manchester First Circuit. The following May he attended the District Meeting at Chester as a candidate for the ministry, and after a searching examination was accepted as a minister on probation.

The Conference stationed him at St. Helens, Lancashire, and that circuit became responsible for his pledge. He has since travelled in Douglas, Lymm, Lowton Branch of Lymm Circuit, Preston, Castletown, Bradwell, Stockport Second, Blackburn First, Fleetwood, Liverpool First, Lowton, and Manchester Third. He is at present in Manchester Fifth.

Mr. Graham has what is called a good presence. He has more grey hairs than many of his years. He is somewhat corpulent, but strong and active, and carries sunshine in his countenance. When we meet with him, we often think of him as the tall, thin, pale youth who in 1863 attended the District Meeting for examination. His examiners were three of the most eminent men in the Connexion. All of them were afterwards called to Connexional office, and two of them to the Presidential Chair. At that time it was deemed important for a minister to have good lungs and good legs as well as intellectual vigour and spiritual character. His examiners expressed unqualified satisfaction with his "gifts, graces, and fruits," but they were suspicious that a recent illness had left traces upon his lungs that might prove a detriment to one who would have, not only to preach, but to be exposed to all kinds of weather. They submitted him to a test of which the majority of the meeting had never heard before, viz., holding his breath for a given number of seconds. He came out of the ordeal in triumph. He has remarkably good health, and is still hale and hearty.

He has a vigorous intellect. His studies have been mainly concentrated on subjects which have a direct bearing upon ministerial life and work. Like many more, he had but a limited education in youth, and was pressed into the ministry without the inestimable advantage of a college training, but he has intellectual capacity and resources which command respect. He is a ready speaker, and in impromptu addresses seldom hesitates for a word, and does not often use the wrong one. His preaching is practical rather than speculative, and appeals to the conscience rather than to the emotions. Not that he is deficient in emotion, or that his preaching is cold and harsh. He has a big, tender, sympathetic heart, and sometimes he kindles into an enthusiasm which leads the old folks to exclaim, "Thank God, the old fire still burns." It would be a surprise to us to hear of his preaching without saying something well worth hearing.

He has a good knowledge of Connexional rule and usage, a sound judgment, a strong sense of fairness, and a large fund of tact and common-sense; therefore he excels in administration. He has rendered excellent service as secretary of various District Committees; in fact, he has held all the offices to which a district can appoint a man. He was District Committee secretary for five years, and his knowledge of procedure, his painstaking carefulness, his mastery of details, and his well-balanced judgment so impressed his brethren that they recommended him for one of the executive offices of the Connexion, and will probably do the same again. At the present time, he has the responsible post of treasurer of the Itinerant Preachers' Friendly Society, and we have no doubt that he will discharge its onerous duties with credit to himself and with satisfaction to all concerned. He is esteemed most of all for his personal character. He is deeply devotional, conscientious in his actions, generous in his gifts, and genial in his intercourse with his people. He makes many friends and few enemies. He is every inch a man, and a creditable minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. We hope he may live and grow in power of service for many years to come.

Songs in the Night-Season.

"That Thou shouldest visit him every morning."

"He hath done all things well."

THOU doest all things well,
God only wise and true!
My days and nights alternate tell
Of mercies always new.

With sacred toils o'er-pressed,
I sink in welcome sleep;
I wake in darkness and unrest,
Yet patient vigil keep.

Soon finds each fever'd day,
And each chill night, its bourn;
Nor zeal need droop, nor hope decay,
Ere rest, or light, return.

But be the night-watch long,
And sore the chastening rod,— Thou art my Health, my Sun—my Song,
My Glory, and my God!

Thy smiling face lights mine;
If, veiled, it makes me sad,
Even tears in darkness, star-like shine,
And morning finds me glad!

For weeping, wakeful eyes
Instinctive look above;
And catch, through openings in the skies,
Thy beams, unslumbering LOVE!

Hours spent with pain and Thee
Lost hours have never seem'd;
No, those are lost, which but might be
From earth, for heaven, redeem'd!

Its limit—its relief—
Its hallow'd issues—tell,
That, though Thou cause Thy servant grief,
Thou doest all things well!

W. M. BUNTING, M.A.

Is thy cruse of comfort failing?
Haste its scanty drops to share,
And through all the years of famine
Thou shalt still have drops to spare.

Love Divine will fill thy store-house,
Or thy handful still renew;
Scanty fare for one will often
Make a royal feast for two!

CHAPTER IV.

HOW DUNCAN'S LETTER AFFECTED FATHER SHEEN.

FATHER SHEEN sat in his study on the morning on which Duncan's letter appeared in the Lynford Observer. He had performed his offices in the Church, had afterwards eaten a good breakfast, and had now come into his study for a little quiet.

"I've had a busy time," thought the priest, "and now I'll have a rest. Those addresses cost me a world of anxiety and labour in spite of all the help I could get. But they are over now, and that young fellow has not shown fight. Well, I'm glad I gave them, I shouldn't be surprised if they result in converts."

He sat down before the fire, and saw a copy of the Lynford Observer lying on the table by his side. "More letters, I expect," he thought. "I must say I am surprised that young Rutland has never written a word. Well, all the greater victory for me. I shall now be regarded as a champion of our Cause."

A minute later he sat with his mouth open, and his eyes staring into vacancy. At first he could not believe what he read, but presently he saw that there could be no mistake about it.

"Bother it!" he cried at length. "I never imagined the fellow would do this. At the worst I thought he would only answer me in his own chapel. But a public debate! a public debate!"

He perused Duncan's letter through again very carefully.

"I therefore invite Father Sheen to a public debate of three nights' duration, to be held in the Industrial Hall, on any dates most suitable to him," he read aloud.

"I suppose I must accept," he said piteously, "although heaven knows I am not prepared for such work. I wish I'd never meddled with the business. I shouldn't, either, but for Lady Neville and Alizon. Yes, it was Alizon who was always at me."

There could be no doubt about it, Father Sheen was much worried. He paced his room many times, constantly giving expression to savage ejaculations.

"I'm not the man for the work," he said, "I've done but very little reading on those lines for many years. I've forgotten my Greek, while even my Latin is rusty; as for Church history, I am all at sea. I'm an old man, too, while this young fellow is fresh from six years of training. I'll refuse; I'll say I haven't time; I'll refuse to discuss the doctrines of the Church with a heretic."

All this did not satisfy him, however, because he knew it would not satisfy the public. To say that Father Sheen had a bad half-hour after reading Duncan's letter, would be to very inadequately describe his feelings.

"It's all Lady Neville's fault; yes, and Alison's," he said at length. "They got me into this scrape, and they ought to get me out of it. I'll go down to the Priory; that's it. I know her ladyship's at home. She will help me out of it."

This decision evidently gave Father Sheen considerable relief. There is always comfort in the thought of being able to shift our burdens to the shoulders of others, and when, as a few minutes later he made his way towards the Priory, he felt quite jubilant at the thought that her ladyship would help him out of his dilemma.

"Well, Father Sheen," said her ladyship, "I am honoured this morning. It is not often you come before lunch, except on special occasions. I hope nothing's the matter."

"Plenty's the matter," said the priest. "I wish to speak to you on a very important matter this morning."

"Come into the library. There's a good fire, and no one is in the room but Alison. You don't mind her being present, I suppose?"

"Oh no, oh no. It has to do with Alison as much as with you."

"That's right," said her ladyship, leading the way, and wondering what caused the woebegone expression on the old man's face.

Alison met Father Sheen with bright eyes as he entered, and bestowed on him a look of genuine affection.

"Father Sheen wants to see us both this morning, Alison," said her ladyship pleasantly. "I hope you've not been a naughty girl," she added with a laugh.

"Oh, no, nothing of the sort," said the old priest hurriedly. "Have you read—that is—have you seen?—but I suppose you haven't?"

"Seen what?" asked her ladyship.

"This morning's Lynford Observer."

"No, I haven't."

"Then, here—read this, your ladyship," and he put the paper in her hands.

Lady Neville began to open the paper.

"Excuse me, let me find it for you," said the old priest hurriedly. "Ah, there it is—that letter, signed Duncan Rutland. It's an awful business, isn't it?"

Lady Neville read the letter, and then with a smile passed it on to Alison.

"What shall I do?" asked Father Sheen.

"There's only one thing you can do."

"What?"

"Why, accept, of course."

"But I can't. I—I—that is, I'm very rusty on such questions."

"Then you must furbish your weapons. My library will be at your disposal. The letter is perfectly fair, perfectly courteous, you cannot refuse. You would be the laughing-stock of the town if you did."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure you would. You see, you gave those addresses."

"I did, I did," said the old man ruefully. "You persuaded me, you and Alison, to give them. I wish I hadn't."

"Why, you told me they had been well received."

"Yes, they were, or they seemed so, but a public debate, your ladyship, a public debate!"

"Nothing could be better. You are, of course, sure of your arguments?"

"Perfectly, oh, perfectly." This he said in such a plaintive way that her ladyship could not help laughing aloud.

"Then what is there to fear? You are not a youth of twenty-six, you are an old man, and a skilled debater, all the arguments for our faith must be perfectly familiar to you."

"Your ladyship is very kind."

"Not at all. I am simply wanting to show that this is a most fortunate occurrence. You will be able to speak to a Protestant audience, you will be able to show them the truths of our faith, and make them realise how foolish they are to keep out of the Church. Why, you might begin a New Reformation movement in the town."

"Yes, yes," said Father Sheen tamely.

Lady Neville was partly in earnest, and partly joking in what she said. Belonging as she did to an old Catholic family which had suffered much for faith's sake, she was a good Catholic; she did not believe that any arguments which Rutland might adduce would do harm to her cause; at the same time she doubted the powers of Father Sheen. While believing in the sacredness of the priest's offices, she regarded many of the priests very lightly as men. In the past, many who had come to the Priory to say Mass, were not even invited to partake of food with the family, but had to be content with the company of the butler, or, at best, the housekeeper. Since those days custom had changed, and she now treated Father Sheen with respect, but she had no exaggerated notions as to his powers as a debater and scholar. She was sincere in her belief that he would triumph in argument, but she could not help laughing at the thought of the old man's appearing as an intellectual gladiator.

The gift of humour is very dangerous to a religion built on ceremonial. Lady Neville did not realise this at the time, nevertheless she felt a strong curiosity to know what Duncan Rutland would say.

"Of course, all the Catholics would have to be invited to come," sighed the priest.

"Of course."

"Don't you think it will be very dangerous? That young Rutland is a clever fellow."

"But you will be there to answer him. Think of the triumph of pulverising him."

"Yes, yes, of course," said Father Sheen sadly. "Of course you will come and sit on the platform?"

"If you wish it."

"Oh, I do, I do! But—but don't you think it would be better if I got one of our recognised speakers to accept his challenge?"

"No, certainly not."

"Why?"

"Because the people would assume that you are afraid, and because the words of a stranger could not have the same weight as yours."

"You think not?"

"I am sure of it. Besides, if you invited one of our recognised debaters, Rutland would be justified in doing the same thing. No, no, you are the man. Besides, when you have beaten him, I see promotion for you as a consequence. It may end in a Bishopric."

Poor Father Sheen, he would gladly have given up the chance of the Bishopric if he could have been spared the awful ordeal that faced him.

Alizon had listened eagerly to all that had been said, and if the truth must be told she was delighted at the course events were taking. Unlike her mother she regarded Father Sheen as a formidable antagonist, and she longed for the fray to begin. She could not help feeling, after Duncan had accompanied her across the moors, that he had refused to argue with her, because he regarded her as unworthy of the trouble. There had been a patronising tone in his remarks which she resented, and as she listened to the conversation, she pictured the enthusiasm of the Catholic portion of the audience, and the consternation of the Protestants, as the old priest showed the glory of the Church, and the fallacies of the Reformed faith. Nourished as she had been on Catholic tradition, and ignorant of the true issues of the Reformation, she believed that selfishness, greed, and lust had caused the cleavage of the Church, and if Protestants would only open their ears to the truth, the Church of her fathers would be flooded with converts.

"Oh, I am delighted!" she said; "it is glorious, Father Sheen," she cried.

"Of course, of course," said the old man gloomily.

"When will you begin?" she asked. "I am afraid it will be impossible before Christmas."

"Yes, yes," said the old man eagerly, "it will be impossible before Christmas. It must take considerable time. I shall have to spend much time in reading."

"In reading! Why?"

"I must prepare myself."

"But you have been a priest for forty years. Are you not always prepared?"

"Yes, yes, of course," replied the old man gloomily.

"Besides, the longer you delay the matter, the longer time this Mr. Rutland will have to prepare. I do long for you to give him a good thrashing. He is a conceited fellow."

"Is he? How do you know?"

"Oh, I met him once," and Alizon described her journey with him across the moors.

"And what did you think of him, Lady Neville?" asked the old man eagerly.

"Oh, he seems a smart fellow. He looks and speaks more like a lawyer than a dissenting minister. He is the very opposite of the approved type. But for the fact that he is clean-shaven, he has a certain military air. He is young, gentlemanly, and I should say decidedly good-looking. But such fellows are seldom strong as debaters."

Father Sheen shook his head gloomily.

"Well, what would you advise me to do?" he asked.

"Oh, I should write to the paper saying that you accept Mr. Rutland's invitation."

"Yes, what then?" he asked plaintively.

"Really, Lady Neville, I am not the man for this work."

"I should fix, say the 10th, 17th, and 24th of January for the debate. Those are early-closing nights, and the people will be able to come in crowds."

"Of course, of course," said the old man, but in his heart of hearts he prayed that the hall might be empty.

"Then I should name six of our most respected Catholics to act as a part of the Committee, and leave them to arrange details."

"Yes."

"That is all, I think."

"All except the subjects."

"Oh, yes, the subjects. Well, do you accept those which he has suggested? They strike me as important. If you prove your case on the lines he marks out, Protestantism crumbles to the ground."

"Oh, quite. Crumbles to the ground;" and the old man repeated the words in a lugubrious tone of voice.

"Oh, it is fine!" cried Alizon. "Let us write the letter now, Father Sheen, I do long to see it before it appears in print!"

Half an hour later the letter was written, and approved of. Alizon was jubilant, Lady Neville confident, Father Sheen in despair.

"You will stay to lunch?" asked her ladyship.

"No, thank you, I must get back. January the 10th—the 10th. No, I must get back."

"You will select your books now," said Lady Neville, looking around the well-filled shelves.

"Thank you, thank you. Do—do you think it would be well for me to call on Mr. Rutland?" he asked timorously.

"Why?"

"Well, it might be courteous, you know. He is a stranger, and we might—well—"

"What?"

"Arrange some sort of compromise."

"Compromise with an avowed heretic!" cried Alizon.

"Of course, of course I did not mean that," said the timorous old man hurriedly, "I did not mean that. I only thought we might place the matter on a friendly footing."

"I think such an action would be wrongly construed," said her ladyship.

"Doubtless you are right, doubtless you are right. Of course any compromise is impossible. We must give no quarter, we must be bold for the truth," but the old man's eyes were humid, and his lips tremulous as he spoke.

A little later Father Sheen left the Priory in a carriage. Around him was piled a large number of books, while in his pocket was a letter, which he dropped in a post-box on his way back, and in which he accepted Duncan Rutland's challenge.

"Oh, I wish I could get out of this," he said, as he threw himself in his study chair. "It is all Alizon's fault. She went to hear the fellow, and afterwards gave me no rest until I had given those addresses. What he said was quite true; he did not openly attack us."

Father Sheen did not doubt the foundation on which his faith rested, he only doubted himself. He felt sure he was not fit for the duty which faced him. He was getting old, he was timorous, and he was neither a thinker nor a student. He knew men who would have rejoiced in this fray; young, eager men, who had all the arguments at their fingertips. Oh, if it were possible for one of them to take his place!

The following Wednesday Father Sheen's letter appeared, and a few days later arrangements for the debate were made. All the town was in a ferment, and on the night of January 10th the doors of the Industrial Hall were literally besieged more than an hour before the time announced for the debate to begin.

CHAPTER V.

A TOURNAMENT OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

WHEN Lady Neville and Alizon took their places on the platform the Industrial Hall was packed from floor to ceiling. A charge had been made for admission, the arrangement being that all money should be given to local charities, but this had evidently made no difference to the attendance. No less than two thousand people were within the building, all eager, excited. The mental and moral atmosphere of the place was electric. All were wondering as to the results of a debate unprecedented in the history of Lynford. Like most Lancashire towns, a great deal of religious sentiment was manifest. With the exception of perhaps Yorkshire and Cornwall, Lancashire has more religious sentiment than any county in England. There is, moreover, no county where the people will give so liberally to religious objects as in Lancashire. Thousands of people who seldom attend a place of worship, regard themselves as being identified with some Church, either Conformist or Nonconformist. They pay for a pew, and may be generally depended upon at School Sermons, or, as they are often called, "Charity Sermons." The religious bodies may be roughly described in their own terms: Chapel, Church, Catholics. First in strength and number come the Nonconformist bodies. They form the great bulk of religious people; then comes the Established Church, and afterwards the Catholics, most of whom are importations from Ireland and elsewhere. Each and all love their churches with great fervour, and many would sacrifice a great deal rather than their own particular spiritual home should suffer.

The great audience gathered at the Industrial Hall was mostly composed of Nonconformists and Catholics. A good sprinkling of Churchmen were present, but as their position was largely that of a compromise between the Church of ancient ceremonial on the one hand, and the unflinching Protestantism of the other, they did not feel inclined to take any prominent part. Besides, some of them naturally felt slightly annoyed that a young Free Churchman should monopolise so much of the attention of the people.

When Father Sheen entered there was a great buzz of excitement. His supporters shouted vociferously, and gave him every encouragement in their power. The old man looked pale and haggard, but resolute. Now that the fight had practically commenced, he felt far less fear than when through the past few weeks he had been preparing to meet his opponent. There could be no doubt that he was very anxious; but dead in earnest. He felt himself to be a champion of the truth, and was bold accordingly. Moreover the books he had been reading sustained his courage. He felt sure he had a strong case, and that however clever Duncan might be, his facts could not be shaken. He nodded to Lady Neville and Alizon, and smiled sadly but confidently when the young girl looked affectionately towards him.

On the platform were two tables, on each of which was a large pile of books.

"There's a rare lot of dry stuff in yon," said one man to another, who sat close to the platform.

"Yi, us 'eads 'll be jammed full o' learnin' afore they've done to-neet. What time is 't?"

"It wants baat three minutes the aaf aar."

"Well, th' 'oud un's 'ere 't ony rooid."

"Yi," said an enthusiastic Catholic, who sat close by, "oo's noan afeard. It 'll be young 'un as 'll back aat if ony body does."

"Ay, but ther'll be no backin' aat to-neet."

As if in confirmation of his words, several more people took their place on the platform, followed by Duncan. There was a great shout when he came, and a good deal of hissing.

"Ther' shell be feear play 't ony rooid," said men to each other all over the hall as they heard the hissing.

Duncan was pale to the lips as he took his seat. He was a young man, and this was his first great public ordeal. He had enjoyed the debates at College, but on those occasions there was not an excited throng listening to his words, nor reporters present to take down every word he said. He looked over the audience and saw hundreds of kindly faces, and some scowling ones. But he was not afraid. Every nerve was strung to full tension, and his heart beat more quickly than was its wont; the young man had no idea of fear however. His brain was clear, and every sense was alert.

While the hubbub subsided, he looked around the platform and noted the face of Father Sheen. He recognised Lady Neville too, but that lady took no notice of him. When his eyes rested on Alizon, however, she was looking towards him. The moment their eyes met, she turned away from him with a smile that was almost contemptuous. Evidently she felt very bitterly towards the man who would attack her faith.

At length the chairman arose, and in a few words stated the conditions of the debate. He had them written down in order to prevent mistakes. Each speaker was to be allowed half an hour, and the meeting was to last three hours. Thus each man would make three speeches. Having made this plain, the chairman said he had only a word more to say before calling on Father Sheen who was to speak first. It was simply that he expected fair play on the part of the audience. No speaker should be interrupted by his hearers, and the arrangements of the meeting must be carried out decently and in order.

"We are met i' Lancashire," said the chairman, "where men like to spaik their mind. On the one hand is a man who has been in the taan for mony a year; I'm sure you'll give him a fair hearing."

At this there was general applause.

"On the other, is a young man, a stranger to us, many on us know next to nowt abaat him; but he's the minister of Tudor Chapel, and because we believe in fair play, we'll give him a fair hearing too."

Again the applause seemed general.

"That's all," said the chairman. "I now call upon Father Sheen to open the question as to 'Whether the Reformation and the Consequent Growth of Protestantism was a Necessity?'"

There was a great shout as Father Sheen rose to speak, while Duncan noticed that Alison Neville clapped her hands most enthusiastically. There was a look of eager confidence in her eyes.

Father Sheen was an Irishman. He had lived long enough away from his native country to lose some of the brogue for which Ireland is famous, but he had not lost the homely eloquence so common to the Celt. Moreover, after he had uttered a few words, and heard the wild cheering of his supporters, his fear forsook him.

He had no notes, and he spoke with perfect ease and fluency. After awhile, too, he allowed the Irish gift of humour to manifest itself, while occasionally he spoke with fervour and passion. He spoke of what the Church had done; what it was to the people. He described it as a refuge for the weary, a home for the homeless, and "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." He told the audience of its ideals, of its outlook, its unity. Then he described the Reformation, and spoke of the disunion, the enmity, the hatred, the wars that followed; how families were disunited, how faith was wrecked, and how nations were led to engage in ghastly and bloody wars.

"This," he cried, as he saw the hand of the clock pointing to the minute when he was supposed to stop, "this is what the Reformation has meant to Christendom; and I ask you, not as Catholics, or Protestants, not even as English people, but as men and women who love righteousness, truth, and purity, was that so-called Reformation a necessity?"

A great shout rose from the Catholic portion of the audience, a shout of triumph. Even his supporters did not believe that Father Sheen could have spoken so powerfully, so well, while a look almost of doubt rested on the faces of the Protestants. They had never heard the Reformation stated in this light before, and they feared for Duncan's power to answer the old Irishman. The great mass of them knew nothing of history; they were Protestants because they had been trained to believe in its doctrines, and, perhaps, because the sturdy independence of their natures discarded the idea of priestcraft. Thus in the excitement of the hour, the Church of Rome appeared as the very haven of God, while Protestants were represented as enemies to those tired souls who longed to enter there for rest and peace.

Alison Neville's eyes were full of joyful tears as her old Father Confessor sat down. To her he seemed like one of the old saints who were heroes for the truth. To her his arguments seemed unanswerable, and she rejoiced with great joy as, in the eye of faith and imagination, she saw thousands in this Puritan town coming back to the Church under whose wings she had been sheltered.

Duncan had been jotting down a few notes while the priest was speaking, he had also opened many of the books before him, and marked certain passages.

"Old Sheen hev given 'im a fair 'ard nut to crack," said some of the audience.

"Ay, and e'll noan crack it," replied others.

"Yi, but he will," said old Matthy Bray, "yo'll see. Let 'im geet on his feet and he'll mak' mince-mait on 'im."

When Duncan rose there was a dead silence. The excitement was too great for cheering. Even his most earnest admirers feared for him. Their confidence, however, was somewhat assured when they saw how perfectly composed he was.

He had intended, he said, to have given an address which he had prepared, but he should, perhaps, best serve the interests of truth, by traversing the statements of Father Sheen, whose speech resolved itself into three parts. First, there was his picture of the Church before the Reformation. Then there was the fact of the Reformation, and afterwards, the result of that movement.

Dealing with the first point he asked whether the picture of the Church drawn by Father Sheen was a true picture. If it were, then the Reformers were enemies of the truth, and of God. But was it? He then sketched the true state of the Church. He showed how it had been stripped of faith, of purity, of common decency. He proved from the writings of even Catholic historians that the priests mumbled articles in which they did not believe, that they went from vile debauchery to the churches to say Masses. That from the popes downward, the clergy were pagan and impure. That the pardon of sins had been degraded into a trade; that a tariff for the forgiveness of sin was fixed—so much for murder, so much for lying, so much for stealing, so much for adultery. Money could buy almost anything. He showed how the people were at the mercy of the priests; how they governed almost every office. He read extracts from historians showing that if men dared to oppose the priests they were excommunicated, and when that was done, it was a sin to give them shelter, a sin to give them food, or help in any way, and that if anyone showed kindness to an excommunicated person, he or she was liable to the same penalty.

It was a terrible picture which he drew, and all the more terrible because every statement was substantiated by a recognised historian. Before he had finished it a look of revengeful hatred settled on the faces of one part of the audience, while on the faces of the other part, a look of wonderment was expressed. They had no idea of what had existed at the end of the fifteenth century.

"So much for the pretty fairy tales, the pathetic picture Father Sheen has drawn of the Church prior to the Reformation," said Duncan as he finished this part of his address.

The remark relieved the intense excitement to which the audience had been worked up, and a great laugh rose from the audience. This moment's interval allowed Duncan time to turn round and open one or two other books. In doing so he saw Alizon Neville. All the joyous triumph had gone from her eyes, her face was pale to the lips, her hands were clenched nervously. He saw, too, that Father Sheen's cheeks were flabby, and that he was sorely uncomfortable.

He then sketched the immediate cause of Luther's actions. He described Tetzel's visit to the quiet German town, gave quotations from his sermons, quotations which promised that for a sum of money he would forgive not only the sins they had committed, but those which they intended to commit. He read the blasphemous words of Tetzel, where he said that God no longer reigned, but that all power was given to the Pope.

At this juncture the chairman rang the bell. This indicated that he had only three minutes more.

"Very well," said Duncan, "I have not at present time to deal with the supposed evil results of the Reformation, but I shall have an opportunity presently. Up to the present I have shown you the value of Father Sheen's arguments. Arguments?" he repeated with a smile, "arguments—why a boy of seven could play at ninepins with them."

The homely figure appealed to the humour of the audience, and the place echoed with great laughter, and before it subsided it was time for Father Sheen to commence his second address.

The old man did his best, he reiterated what he had before said; but he had lost his power over the audience. It is true the Catholic portion of the audience still cheered him, but there was no hope, no confidence in the cheer. He tried to traverse the young man's statements, but even his own friends saw that he failed. The old priest felt it too, and he began to be confused. He saw the good-humoured ridicule which was expressed on the people's faces, and then he did what a true debater would never have done, he descended to invective. When his half-hour was up he had not helped his cause; thus it was that when Duncan rose the second time, he was met with tumultuous cheering.

He could not help being elated, it was not in human nature to feel otherwise. He looked again at Alison Neville's face, and saw chagrin, discomfiture, anger. Lady Neville looked at him superciliously, scornfully, while a low growl of anger was heard in the hall. All this aroused his defiance, and caused him to speak more strongly than he had intended.

First of all he took the statements contained in Father Sheen's second address, and held them up to ridicule; then he dealt with the indictment which the priest had hurled at Protestantism. "Look at it," the old priest had said, "look at Protestantism. Think of what it has done. It has torn the Church in pieces, it has wrecked the faith of millions, it has sent untold multitudes to eternal perdition. Look at your Protestant countries. Where is your unity? It does not exist. You are a rope of sand; you are torn to pieces by petty conflicting sects. Protestantism is doomed because it rests on a false foundation."

This gave Duncan the chance he had hoped for, and he used the chance to great advantage. He showed how while Protestant countries had prospered, had become strong and mighty, Catholic countries had become weaker and weaker. He described the relative positions of Germany and Spain, and showed that while the Pope had cursed the former and blessed the latter, the former had prospered, while the latter was crumbling into decay, and was day by day becoming more impotent. He showed that Austria and Portugal could not be said to belong to the advancing countries of the world, but were becoming more and more mere names on a map. He portrayed the condition of France, largely a nation of atheists, governed by the passions of the mob, a nation where justice seemed a far-off dream. He pointed out that Italy, the home of the Vatican, had only become a great nation by throwing off allegiance to the Pope, and that ever since the Papacy had sulked because of the position of the Italian Government. Then he traced the history of England from the time of the Spanish Armada. He described how the Pope had blessed this movement of Spain, and cursed the heresy which had robbed him of England, and how England had, through her independence of, and freedom from priestly tyranny, marched on to greatness. He showed how the one spot in the United Kingdom where abject poverty and ignorance reigned was in Catholic Ireland, while Protestant Ireland was prosperous and contented.

"Now," he said in conclusion, "have I proved my case? Was the Reformation a necessity? And have the results of the Reformation justified the action of those who freed us from Papal chains?"

When Father Sheen rose for the third time the debate was as good as closed. Even Alison Neville and her mother saw that it was an unequal contest. They saw that much more could be said on their side than it had come to Father Sheen's mind to say. Even the most intelligent Protestants saw that the Catholic arguments had not been ably set forth. Whatever might be the merits of the case itself, the old priest was no match for the eager young debater fresh from his studies. It was like an old worn-out soldier, who had never been at his best a good fencer, doing battle with an antiquated, rusty sword, against a skilled fencer, who was young, strong, and active, and whose blade was new and bright and keen.

Had one of the skilled Jesuit debaters taken the place of Father Sheen, Duncan's work would have been far more difficult, as it was he was victorious all along the line. He had estimated the Lancashire character, had appealed to their sturdy independence, and given the bare strong facts which they so much love. Thus it was, when he rose for his last address, he had little to answer. And for half-an-hour, moved to intense passion by the enthusiasm of the crowd, he poured forth a glowing tribute to the men, who, he said, had made us as a nation, strong and great and free. With anecdote, pathos, passion, humour, he carried the audience with him, until, as he sat down, the great mass of men and women rose to their feet and gave him an ovation.

"By Jove," said a young lawyer who had come to the hall, not because he had any great interest in the subject, but because he loved a battle of brains, "Rutland has used poor old Sheen as a brush with which he has swept the floor. The fellow ought to have been a barrister."

Duncan watched while Lady Neville and Alizon left the platform, followed by the old priest. Neither of them spoke to him, but when they reached the door Alizon gave him a look which he never forgot.

Old Matthy Bray climbed on the platform and shook hands with the young minister.

"I know'd thou wert middlin' well off for brains, mester," he said, "but aw did'n think tha 'ed so mich grit in thee."

A number of people who had gathered around laughed at the old weaver's words.

"And naa tak a bit of advice," continued the old man. "Thee slip aat at th' side dooar, and go whoam in a cab. Ther'll neer be a love of free spaich while th' priests 'ave owt to do."

"I'll take that advice," said Duncan.

"Ay, an' a few on us will go wi' 'im," said another, "for ther's a lot ov Irish aatside."

"Yi, and tak care o' thyssen till this debate is over," continued Matthy.

Duncan Rutland realised the wisdom of this advice before a week had passed away.

CHAPTER VI.

ALIZON NEVILLE'S DILEMMA.

DURING the next few days the chief topic of conversation was the debate between Father Sheen and Duncan Rutland. Never before had the town been so much moved. General election speeches seemed tame compared with addresses on Church history. At the mills, where hundreds of men and women gathered together, Father Sheen's failure was discussed and laughed at. The Catholics longed to invite one of their acknowledged propagandists to meet Duncan, but they dared not do so. For, first of all, the debate was announced to be between Father Sheen and the young minister; and second, it would seem a slight on the old man to suggest it to him. The daily conversation, however, fanned the excitement into a greater flame, and hundreds secretly resolved to be at the Industrial Hall on the following week hours before the time announced for the commencement of the discussion.

"Ther'll be nowt left ov owd Sheen but his gaan by th' end o' th' next fight," said one sturdy Puritan to a devoted Catholic, "th' owd man sud a know'd better nor tackle a lad like Rutland."

"Wait a bit," replied the Catholic, "the gaame 's noan played aat yet. Thoult see that Rutland is nobbut a gassy coward."

The listeners laughed, but some did not like the tone in which the man spoke.

As for Father Sheen he was never seen in the town. What he did no one knew, except that he locked himself in his study, and that no one was allowed to interrupt him.

The speeches were reported verbatim in the Lynford Observer, and Alizon Neville read them through carefully.

"I hate him, mother," she said, when she had finished.

"It's very unfortunate," replied Lady Neville. "I ought to have known better. It is all my fault, I am afraid."

"Why?" asked Alizon.

"Well, it was I, or rather it was you, who persuaded Father Sheen to give those addresses. And it was they which caused young Rutland to challenge him."

"Yes, yes, I know; but I thought that——"

"Yes, I know, Alizon; but Father Sheen is neither a scholar nor a debater. I ought to have realised that at the time. It is true his first speech was good, but I did not imagine that the young minister was so clever."

"Clever! Do you think him clever?"

"I'm afraid we can't help thinking so, darling. No one could fail to see that Father Sheen fared badly."

"I don't think him clever a bit," said Alizon passionately. "He is just a vulgar, conceited——" she hesitated for a word—"coxcomb," she added presently.

"He may be all that," replied Lady Neville, "but he is none the less clever. I cannot help dreading the next meeting. I hear that many Catholics have been sorely unsettled by what was said by Mr. Duncan. No doubt he could be easily answered, and had Father Sheen been a scholar and a thinker he would be answered; but unfortunately he is not."

Alizon was silent. Up to the time when Father Sheen had met Duncan she would have contested her mother's closing statement. To her the old man had always given evidence of wide reading and sound thinking; since then, however, she had seen her mistake.

"I suppose the debate must take its course?" she said presently.

"It cannot be helped. It has been publicly announced. The hall has been engaged and the people will be there. Many Catholics will be there too, and the next subject is more dangerous than the last."

"The Infallibility of the Pope, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"There is no doubt about it, mother, is there?" asked Alizon anxiously.

"Of course not, since the Church has decreed that it shall be an article of faith. As you know, Cardinal Newman opposed the Vatican decrees as long as he could, but when it was once decided he, of course, accepted."

"Yes," replied Alizon dubiously. Even to her it seemed strange that any body of men could decide as to whether a doctrine should be accepted by the whole Catholic world, but no doubt it was right.

"And if that young man succeeds next Tuesday, as he did last Tuesday, it will be a still more dangerous blow for the Church?"

Lady Neville nodded.

"Oh," cried the girl eagerly, "I wish something would happen to prevent him from being there. Why does not God interfere?"

"Perhaps He will, my darling."

Alizon went much among the poor Catholics of the town, and was much beloved by them. During her visits the chief topic was still the debate. Many uncomplimentary remarks were passed about Duncan, and many threats of vengeance uttered. The ignorant and unreasoning part of the people felt that they would be doing God service by preventing the next meeting.

"Tell tha what, Miss Alizon," said one brawny man of Irish origin, but who had been brought up in the town, "yon chap is nobbut the tool of the devil."

"I am afraid he is," was Alizon's unguarded reply.

"And aw believe it would be pleasin' the blessed Virgin if he wur traited as th' tool o' th' devil."

The young girl's eyes flashed. She was terribly angry with Rutland, and she was afraid lest her old Father Confessor should again fare badly at his hands. Moreover, her Church seemed to be in danger. In the past the Popes had passed edicts to destroy those who were enemies to the fold. She had been sometimes ashamed to confess this, but now she saw reason for it.

"Father Sheen's noan a match for yon chap," went on the man, "and there's allus a sight o' waik-kneed chaps as can't stand agin a felly wot's got th' gift o' th' gab like yon. I've 'eerd a' several as 'ave said they're noan goin' to Confession agean."

"It's terrible," said Alizon; "oh, I do wish that he might be away somewhere next Tuesday, and miss his train or something of that sort."

The collier's eyes lit up with an angry light.

"Maybe summatt 'll 'appen, Miss Alizon," he said, "let's 'oap so."

"Yes, let's hope so," replied the girl. She did not realise what she was saying, and had no idea of the effect of her words on the passionate unthinking man.

The days passed away, and nothing of importance happened. The weather was drear and wet and cold. The streets were covered with black slimy mud, the sky was laden with grime and soot, the hundreds of chimneys belched out clouds of black smoke. The weavers, however, did not mind. To a stranger, Lynford was the dreariest town imaginable, but to the natives it was the best place on earth. Whenever a visitor from a distant part of the country mentioned the drear ugliness of the town, he was met with the invariable reply—

"Yi, but thou'rt noan used to it."

Still, in spite of the surroundings, thousands of brave honest people lived there, and although many were rough and seemingly coarse, they possessed kind loyal hearts, and would stand by a friend through thick and thin.

Since Duncan had invited Father Sheen to a public discussion he had risen wonderfully in the estimation of the crowd. They began to look upon him as a Lynford man, and often as he passed down the streets, the weavers would offer kindly remarks about him, of which the following is an example.

"Ay, but yon's a gradely lad!"

"Yi, and oo's got brains 'n all; an' the gift o' th' gab above the middlin'. Art a baan next Tuesday neet?"

"Ay, I am, I sudden like to miss it. I hear as aa Lady Neville is fair cut up."

"Yi, oo will be. Sheen 'll 'ave to git up middlin' early if oo's to do owt wi' Rutland."

All this was sorely trying to those who held to the old Catholic faith, and many there were who shouted after Duncan as he passed along the streets, and uttered imprecations not at all pleasant.

On the afternoon of the day when the second debate was to take place, Duncan was passing down the main street, when old Matthy Bray met him.

"Weel, and aa are ye likin' Lynford?" asked the old man.

"I like the people very much."

"Aw thowt ye would. We got thee a rare congregation at Tudor on Sunday neet!"

"Yes, it was very large."

"An' yo' praiched a rare sermon 'n all."

"Thank you."

"Oa you deserve a word o' praise naa and then. 'Appen yo' think yo've 'ad a fair lot o' th' tother sooart."

"Yes, I've been abused a bit."

"Weel, words do'ant 'urt much, but be careful, mester. I've warned ye more nor once. Do'ant go aat of a neet over mich, and 'ave comp'ny wi' ye. Aw spoase yo're ready for to-neet."

"I think so."

"That's reight. Ther'll be a rare lot o' fowk."

"I expect so."

"Yi, theer will. Cathlicks would give summatt if tha sudden turn up."

"You think so?"

"Aw'm sure on 't. Thee be careful not to go aat to-neet till jist afore the meetin'. Some on us are goin' up to coom daan with thee."

"Thank you, but surely there's no need."

"Mebbe, but ther's lots o' fellys who wen they're short o' brains mak' it up i' ugliness."

"Have you any grounds for saying this?"

"Noa, noan wot ye might call wuth owt. But aw've 'eard some fellys callin' thee moas things but a gentleman, and aw've seen black looks when thou'st gone by. I'm tellin' thee naa."

When Duncan got back to his lodgings it was past five o'clock. He sat down to the tea which his landlady had prepared, and was about to look over his notes before going to the Industrial Hall, when Mrs. Nutter entered and said a lad wanted to see him.

"Who is he?" asked Duncan.

"Oo ses 'oo goas to Tudor School," replied Mrs. Nutter.

Duncan went to the door and saw a lad about fifteen years of age.

"Fayther's deen', an' oo wants to sitha," said the lad.

"Who is your father?" asked Duncan, "and who are you?"

"Aw'm Bob o' th' Croft Farm's lad. They ca' me Billy Scott. Aw goa to Tudor Sunday Schoo'."

"What's the matter with your father?"

"Tha doctor's geein' 'im up. Aw know nowt no more. Oo wants to see tha reight bad. Oo's bin a bad 'un, too."

"Won't to-morrow morning do?"

"Noa. Doctor ses oo'll dee to-neet."

"Where is Croft Farm?"

"Just aboon Boggart's Clough."

Duncan looked at his watch. There was just time for him to visit the man before the debate. After all the walk might do him good; besides he could not think of neglecting a dying man.

He told his landlady where he was going, and putting his notes in his pocket, started for Croft Farm.

"Some men will call here just after seven, Mrs. Nutter," he said. "Will you give them these books, and tell them where I've gone."

"Yi," said the woman laconically.

That same afternoon Alizon Neville was visiting among the poor Catholics of the town. It was rather depressing to her that so many of her fellow-religionists were so poor and thriftless. She could not help seeing the difference between them and the respectable working class audience she had seen on the only occasion on which she had entered a Protestant Church. As on the previous occasion the chief subject of conversation was about the debate.

"'Appen yo'll be there ageean, Miss Alizon," said one.

"Oh, yes, I shall be there."

"Ther'll be some rare fun to-neet," said the woman mysteriously.

"Fun?" queried Alizon. "To me it is not a matter for fun,"

"But yo' know?"

"Know what?"

"Yo' know as aa Rutland 'll neer turn up."

"Not be there. Why?"

"You've 'eerd?"

"No, I've heard nothing;" all the same her heart beat high with hope. Would her prayers be answered after all?

"Yi, but it wur yo as started it!"

"I! What do you mean, Mrs. Pickup?"

"Bridget Kelly told me all abaat it," said the woman confidentially.

"All about what?"

"What yo said to her Shan."

"I said nothing particular to Shan Kelly."

"But yo' did, Miss Alizon," said the woman, "think agean."

"I said nothing, except that it would be a blessing if something prevented Mr. Rutland from attending the meeting to-night."

"Yi, thet's it. Weel, Shan took the hint."

"What do you mean?"

"He tell'd thee, didn't 'a?"

"No, nothing."

"Well," said the woman, "Rutland 'll noan be theer. Oo'll be sent for to see a man wot's deen' at Croft Farm aboon Boggart's Clough."

"And is there a man dying there?"

"Not as I know on;" and the woman laughed. "Oo'll be on his way there by naa."

"And what then?"

"When oo geets to Boggart's Clough, co'll geet no further to-neet."

"But why?" asked Alizon excitedly.

"Cause Shan Kelly, and aar Ned, and Billy Suttle, wot works at Sutcliffe Mill, and some moor, 'll noan let him."

The plot was plain, even to Alizon's bewildered mind. She realised the effects of her words, she saw to what lengths her foolish statement might lead.

"But they'll not hurt him?" she gasped.

"Noan ovver mich. Oo'll seem to 'ave bin suppin' more nor's gooid for him, that's all," and the woman laughed.

"This is terrible, terrible, Mrs. Pickup," she cried. "It is base, it is cowardly."

"Nay, nay," said the woman, with a touch of anger in her voice, "why, it wur yo' as set Shan Kelly on."

Alizon left the cottage with her head in a whirl. She saw herself a party to a brutal plot, and she walked along the gloomy street like one demented.

At first a feeling of joy possessed her. Duncan Rutland would not be at the Industrial Hall that night. This would mean a great triumph for Father Sheen and his party. Father Sheen would be there, but no opponent to meet him. Consequently the Catholic faith would triumph. But this was only for a moment. She felt ashamed that any unthinking words of her's should lead to such base actions. Moreover, the truth might presently come out, and then, guiltless as she was, she would become a by-word for every Protestant in the town. But this was not all, nor the worst. The cowardliness of the act haunted her.

What could she do?

Nothing. Things must take their course. Probably the plot would fail. Rutland was a clever man, and he would discover the meaning of it. It would be best, therefore, that she should do nothing.

She heard the clocks of the town chiming the half-hour. She looked at her watch, it was half-past five. A few seconds later there was a great rattle of clogs on the stony pavements, and the streets were filled with men wearing greasy canvas clothes, and women with their heads covered with shawls.

"We mun mak' 'aaste," she heard them saying. "It's but little tay aw'll sup to-neet. Aw meean to 'ave a front seat."

They were speaking about the meeting at the Industrial Hall.

"What shall I do?" she asked herself.

From Servitude to Liberty.

BY A FRENCH PROTESTANT PASTOR.

VERY interesting movement in the direction of Protestantism is just now going on in France in the Romish Church. I am not speaking at present of the movement in many towns and villages which draws entire populations to hear the old, old story plainly told by men belonging to various Evangelistic Societies, such as the Société Centrale, Société Évangélique, or the McAll Mission. I speak of a movement going on in the interior of the Romish Church, or more properly speaking, among its clergy, and which shows itself in the resignation of many priests or monks, several of whom boldly join Protestantism and become, after a trial and course of studies, ministers of the Gospel, while the others occupy honourable positions in business, the teaching profession, etc.

There have always been priests who have left Rome; as the education they receive does not fit them for anything but the priesthood, they are obliged to occupy posts which do not require special preparation. Many of them are to be found among the Parisian cabmen. Some misdeemeanor or act of rebellion against the hierarchy is generally the cause of their leaving the priesthood, and it must be said that the popular feeling is against them; the word défroqué (lit. "unfrooked") is a term of contempt.

But the movement of which I am speaking now is far more serious. For the last ten years, and more particularly the last three or four years, several priests have left Rome from conscientious motives. This movement exists principally amongst priests who are between thirty and forty years of age. Younger, they are still—I speak of the more serious ones—under the spell, and later on in life they feel too old to change, and they submit to a state of things which they inwardly deplore. But many middle-aged men, vigorous in body and mind, have made an open stand against Rome. One of these, formerly Abbé Bourrier, now pasteur Bourrier, edits a monthly paper called the Chrétien Français, which he circulates among the French clergy. Many of the priests who have not had the courage to leave Rome have minds preoccupied by the new ideas, so that sooner or later a vast exodus of the most serious-minded and courageous members of the Roman clergy may be hoped for. M. Bourrier has opened a house in Sèvres where he receives those who wish to leave Rome and who do not know where to go or what to do.

The Protestant Churches have not remained indifferent to such a promising movement. Some of the leading ministers and laymen of Paris, under the direction of a very earnest man, Professor Bertrand, have constituted a committee, and under the name of "Œuvre des Prêtres," founded a society with a home at Courbevoie for receiving the fugitives and training for the ministry those who seem to have received that call. It is in the Chrétien Français, and in the last Reports of the Œuvre des Prêtres that I have gleaned a few facts which will doubtless interest my readers.

It is difficult to give the exact number of the priests who have lately left Rome. These figures, taken from the Rapports, will enable us to gain some idea of the number. In 1896 the director received forty demands for help from priests, seminarists, and monks, but received only sixteen.

In 1897 l'Œuvre des Prêtres helped seventeen and refused twelve. The Report for 1898 is not yet issued, but in a private letter the director says:—

"This year we have as yet refused thirty-one priests and accepted twelve; then we have helped about fifteen of last year. This week (beginning of October, 1897) I have sent seven to the Theological Faculties of Neuchatel (Switzerland), one to the Preparatory School of Batignolles, one to the Faculty of Montauban, another one will go there soon. The rest are in journalism or business. Two have just obtained their degree of B.D., one goes out as missionary to America, and two have just taken their B.A."

It would appear from the preceding figures that in three years about one hundred priests have applied to the Society, and out of this one hundred, forty-nine proved serious, honourable men, most of whom have gone into, or are preparing for, the ministry.

These figures although encouraging do not include all the priests who have left Rome, nor those, much more numerous, who remain de facto Roman clergy, but are studying the Bible, corresponding with the priests who have been more courageous than themselves, and who will probably, sooner or later, follow in their steps. In one way we must not exaggerate the importance of the movement, and yet in another sense its importance cannot well be exaggerated, because if it spreads it may be the point de départ of a new era for Christianity in France. Still, the forty or fifty earnest priests who have left Rome in three years can do a great deal of good. If the movement continues to go on in the same ratio no one can tell what its ultimate consequences may be.

My readers would doubtless like to know what is the state of mind of the priests who leave Rome, and what reasons they allege in order to justify their conduct. I shall quote some letters of resignation sent by some of these priests.

First of all, here are the criticisms of some priests who have not broken with their Church, or which were pinned before they broke with it. Abbé Charbonnel, speaking of these men, wrote:—"Since so many souls exile themselves so nobly, is there not something rotten in the kingdom of the Church?" Abbé Vindex says: "The Roman Church has been rotten a long time. One must not wonder if priests, having larger or more generous inspirations, rise now and then to demand a radical Reform in the Church. This Reform would consist in cutting from the so-called Catholic Church, all that does not strictly agree with the doctrine and discipline of the Apostles. If my voice alone were needed to help them, I should shout: Courage, friends; courage, brethren. Let us drive out of the temple all these sellers of false miracles who are only intent on money-making. Strike, friends, strike repeatedly, to reduce to atoms all that tinsel, that rubbish, and work to raise instead the only true divine religion." Another priest who feels himself too old to change, writes thus: "I know my Church as the murderess of conscience; but at my age one does what one can. I have done away with the sad Romish catechism, and in its stead I use the Gospel. For the last six months I have explained the Gospel of John instead of preaching on the false miracles, false relics, and the infallibility of a fallible man. I give a more spiritual sense to the ceremonies. In a word, I try to make my children and people really evangelical, not Romish; so the number of my hearers has singularly increased; God has blessed my efforts."

Here is the letter of Abbé Philippot to the Bishop of Soissons, who asked him to retract his evangelical convictions, and who answered by an admirable confession of faith beginning thus:

"When the martyrs of the first centuries were questioned concerning their faith before the judges, they answered, 'I am a Christian.' After their example I resume my confession of faith in these words alone: I am a Christian. I am a Christian because I belong to Christ by faith; and that in Him and by Him I have the forgiveness of my sins and immediate communion with the Heavenly Father. I am a Christian because the teaching of Jesus Christ is the law of my intelligence, because the ethics of Jesus Christ are the ideal of my life, because I cannot conceive a religion more perfect than that of Jesus Christ. I put the Gospel of Jesus Christ above every human word, and I judge of everything by the Gospel."

Here, also, is a letter in which another priest, l'Abbé Bourdery, curate at Marolles, near Beauvais, tenders his resignation to his bishop. The letter is dated 7 April, 1898:—

"My Lord,—A sincere vocation had drawn me to the priesthood in the religion of Christ. After a long and serious study of the dogmas and institutions of the Church, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot remain priest any longer. It is for me a duty of loyalty not to keep any longer the direction of the parish which you entrusted to my care. I tender to you to-day my resignation. Before God, I can testify that my whole sacerdotal life was freely spent in spreading and fostering the Christian convictions of souls. And it is to continue the same work that I withdraw myself from your Church, Catholic but not Christian.

"Let the Son of God who has revealed Himself to my soul thirsty for truth and life, comfort those whom I leave. Later, they will realise, as I have done, that the principle itself of the social Catholic organisation is but a revival of Judaism and of the Roman spirit of domination opposed to the Christian principle of filial love to God, and the liberty of the children of God, and they will certainly not condemn me for having liberated my faith, and for having asserted against an authoritative and oppressive Church, the rights of a religious conscience. May the Son of God comfort me also, and help me. The separation which I make is not without heart-breaking and painful sacrifices. But the present duty is man's business; the future rests with God. Since I do my duty loyally and simply, I put my trust in God, Lord of the future.

"I beg you, my lord, to forgive me the pain I may risk giving you, and to believe me,

"Yours most respectfully,

"E. BOURDERY."

I have chosen this letter out of many because it is short and pithy; in a concise form it contains almost the same ideas which the others develop more fully. I would draw the attention of my readers to the words in italics. These priests of whom we speak are Christian priests, and it is in order to remain Christians, and to continue their work as servants of the Lord that they leave the Church. Therein lies the originality and the importance of this movement of priests out from Rome. It is not through sheer infidelity or levity that they leave, but moved by the highest motives and the strict injunction of their conscience enlightened by the Gospel of the Lord Jesus. If only this movement spreads, and there is no reason why it should not, who does not see that a new Reformation is quite possible, and that it is perhaps near?

Protestants' warmest sympathy therefore should be with these brethren. Certainly there is need of discrimination, but those who show such sentiments must be encouraged. Already some of these priests are at work. Two of them have returned to their former parishes, and opposite their ancient Church (empty) hold religious services. Others have entered the regular ministry and are pastors of Protestant Churches; others are in the service of Evangelical Societies, especially in the Charentes, where two or three priests have opened religious services in thirty villages. Speaking of these, a peasant said: "If the priests become Protestant pastors we have nothing more to do than to follow them and become Protestants." These men are admirably qualified for the task of addressing themselves to Catholic audiences. They know better than any one else how to reach the persons brought up in the Romish Church. They say the same things the Protestant ministers say, but they say them in a different manner. The best way to show this would be by giving a concrete example, but this the limits of our space forbid us doing at present. Suffice it to say their discourses differ in several respects from the discourses usually delivered by Protestant ministers. But these men just out from Rome know better than we how to deal with their former parishioners. Those of our readers who are familiar with the men and scenes of the Reformation, would soon recognise in the popular addresses of these liberated souls some echoes of the discourses that were uttered in Reformation times.

Another remark: little direct allusion to Protestantism itself is made. What is necessary is that light should be shed into the mass of the Catholic people. Once enlightened, they will decide whether they will join Protestantism or form a church of their own. Other priests, as we have said, have boldly made their stand for Protestantism. Much more might be said on that movement; and we trust we may have the opportunity of saying it. What we have said already will surely draw the sympathy of our readers to these courageous, noble-minded men, who sacrifice family-ties, position, friendship, to follow the dictates of their conscience, the voice of their Master.

They will pray that this movement may be the dawn for France of a new Reformation.

MORAVIAN CHAPEL, FETTER LANE.

The Older Chapels of Metropolitan Nonconformity.

II.—FETTER LANE CHAPEL AND THE MORAVIANS.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

IN a narrow alley off Fetter Lane, and within sound of the incessant roaring of the Fleet Street traffic, is the principal entrance to the Moravian Chapel. It has an interesting history peculiarly its own. Originally, it was one of the eight conventicles of the Metropolis where Nonconformist worship was tolerated. It was built previous to the great fire of 1666, and fortunately escaped its dreadful ravages. While the ruined churches of the City were being rebuilt the Episcopalians conducted service therein. Mr. John Turner was the first minister, and he had charge of the church until the closing years of the reign of Charles II., when he removed to Hatton Garden. He was very active in his care for the suffering during the Great Plague. He had been ejected from the parish church of Sunbury, in Middlesex. He has been described as being "a man of great sincerity, extraordinary humility, and profitable labours; beloved by all who knew him. He settled in London after he was silenced, and had a considerable meeting." From January 24, 1672, until August 24, 1682, the renowned Richard Baxter regularly conducted worship within its historic precincts. He says: "I began a Tuesday lecture at Mr. Turner's church in New Street, near Fetter Lane, with great convenience and God's encouraging blessing, but I never took a penny for it from any one."

The Rev. Thankful Owen, M.A., who had been ejected from the presidency of St. John's College, Oxford, was another of the distinguished ministers of Fetter Lane Chapel. Dr. Edmund Calamy in his "Nonconformists' Memorial," writes of him "as a man of genteel learning, and an excellent temper; admired for an uncommon fluency and easiness in his composures (compositions), and for the peculiar purity of his Latin style." He was much respected, and never repented of his Nonconformity. He died suddenly on April 1st, 1681, at his house in Hatton Garden, just after finishing an epistle for a volume of Dr. Goodwin's works. He was preparing for the press, and had almost finished, a book entitled, "Imago Imaginis," designed to show that Rome Papal was an image of "Rome Pagan." At his funeral it was publicly stated "that he had not left his fellow behind him for learning, religion, and good humour." His successor was the Rev. Stephen Lobb, who held the pastorate at the time of the Revolution, and whom Lord Macaulay "pillories" in his "History of England."

During the energetic ministry of the Rev. Thomas Bradbury, who was better known as "Tom Bradbury," Fetter Lane Chapel was attacked by the Sacheverell mob, and entirely dismantled of its furniture, which was burnt. With some difficulty Bradbury himself managed to escape from the vengeance of the infuriated High Church rioters. Bradbury was a contentious Nonconformist divine, who took a prominent part in the ecclesiastical and political events of his time. He championed the cause of civil and religious liberty, and if he had lived to-day he would, doubtless, have been known as a political parson. In his earlier career he was regarded as the strongest man in the Nonconformist community. Queen Anne frequently spoke of him as "Bold Bradbury." He was well and widely known as a powerful preacher, and as a man of strong speech and forceful character. Bradbury was strongly opposed to the practices of Popery, and the tenets of Unitarianism. An attempt was made by the advocates of papacy, who greatly disliked him, to assassinate him. The cruel plot failed, because the man who was appointed to perform the cowardly deed, providentially went to hear Bradbury preach, and had his heart softened while listening to his powerful appeals. It was believed that few persons had a greater share in promoting the succession of the Georges to the throne of England. His allegiance to the House of Hanover was constant and unwavering. The death of Queen Anne was signalled to Bradbury while conducting a service at Fetter Lane, by the pre-arrangement of a messenger upon his arrival dropping a white handkerchief from the gallery upon the floor of the chapel. In after days he boasted that by praying publicly for the young king, when the news was thus singularly brought of the Queen's death, he had been the first person to proclaim the accession of George I.

At times, Bradbury was extremely eccentric, and he allowed his wit to run riot. He has been styled "the South of Nonconformity." His hatred of the Stuarts was strangely manifested in his pulpit prayer when he heard of the death of Queen Anne, by returning thanks to God for "the deliverance of these kingdoms from the evil designs of the enemies of truth and righteousness." He preached "a funeral sermon" for the departed Queen from the singular words, "Go; see now this woman, and bury her, for she is a king's daughter." Bradbury was one of the deputation of Nonconformist divines who presented the congratulatory address to George I. upon his accession. As they attired themselves in cloaks, in accordance with courtly fashion, a nobleman asked him, "Pray, sir, is this a funeral?" To which Bradbury answered, "Yes, my lord, it is the funeral of the Schism Bill, and the resurrection of liberty."

It was Bradbury who publicly expressed his displeasure at the psalmody of Dr. Watts, by contemptuously saying, "Let us have none of Dr. Watts' whims." Another peculiarity of Bradbury's was that he would never allow his congregations to sing a triple time tune, which he denounced as being "a long leg and a short one." In course of time Bradbury became estranged from a portion of his people at Fetter Lane Chapel. He migrated to New Court, taking a large number of his flock with him. This singular yet eminent divine died in September, 1759, and was buried at Bunhill Fields.

In Fetter Lane Chapel, Lady Huntingdon frequently worshipped, and George Whitefield, the eloquent orator, occasionally preached. In the year 1732, the Independents vacated their old chapel in Fetter Lane, where their fathers had worshipped for generations, and built a larger one on the opposite side of Fetter Lane. The Rev. John Spurgeon, father of the distinguished Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of Metropolitan Tabernacle fame, was one of the more recent pastors of this newer chapel.

At Lady-day, 1740, Mr. James Hutton secured Fetter Lane Chapel by a lease from Mr. Ketterage for the use of "The Little Society." Two years later it developed into the Moravian Chapel, with which is now associated the Moravian Book Depot. The United Brethren, or the Moravians, claim descent from the ancient church of Bohemia, which was born of the evangelical labours of John Huss and Jerome of Prague. In the year 1722, a number of religious refugees who had fled from Moravia to escape the bitter persecution of the Romanists, found a home in Saxony. They were under the leadership of a preaching carpenter, who was known as Christian David. Count Zinzendorf deeply sympathising with them, allotted them a portion of his estate in Upper Lusatia, which they named Herrnhut, or "The Watch of the Lord." In this place of safety they formed a settlement, and being joined by others, they organised the Moravian Church.

Their benefactor and friend joined their fellowship, became a minister of the infant community, and in the year 1737, was consecrated a Moravian Bishop. Count Zinzendorf, who gave the Moravian Church organisation, and who preached occasionally at Fetter Lane Chapel, was an extraordinary man. During his lifetime he proved himself to be an able poet, theologian, preacher, pastor, missionary and statesman. He was born at Dresden in the year 1700. The father of this distinguished man was one of the "pietists" who had been protected by the first King of Prussia, and who taught the all-important doctrine of conversion "by a sudden transformation of the heart and will." Their ancestors came originally from Austria, and had been Crusaders and Counts of Zinzendorf. One of them had been amongst the earliest converts to the reformed faith of Luther, and for his avowal of the Protestant belief had been voluntarily exiled.

The close fellowship which John and Charles Wesley had with the Moravians was formed through their eventful connection with Georgia, where a number of Moravian emigrants had been sent from Germany in the year 1735. The Wesleys and a second party of Moravians sailed together in the same vessel. During the voyage, of four months, Wesley taught David Nitschman, the Moravian Bishop, the rudiments of the English language, while he, in return, helped Wesley in the acquisition of German. After the return of the brothers Wesley from Georgia, they maintained their religious intimacy with the United Brethren. In the month of February, 1737, Bishop Count

Zinzendorf visited England on matters pertaining to the German colonists in Georgia. Charles Wesley attended a service that was held at the lodgings of the Count. Such was the gracious Divine influence that rested upon him, that he thought himself to have been "in a choir of angels." In the following year, Peter Böhler, a youthful Moravian Missionary from Germany, was detained in London three months waiting for a ship to sail to Georgia. He was introduced to the Wesleys, whom he instructed on the nature of justification by faith, the witness of the Spirit to the saint's adoption into the family of God, and other important matters pertaining to personal salvation through Christ.

A fortnight after Böhler had sailed from English shores for Georgia, Charles Wesley, in a house at Little Britain, off Aldersgate Street, "found peace to his soul." The "surprising news" was quickly communicated to his brother John while assisting at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at St. Paul's Cathedral. Some four days later John Wesley attended a religious service held in Aldersgate Street. While a person was reading Martin Luther's preface to the Romans for the spiritual benefit of the worshippers, John Wesley felt his heart "strangely warmed," and realised "that he did trust in Christ alone for salvation." In the following June, Wesley sailed for the Continent, and visited his friend Count Zinzendorf at the Moravian settlement at Herrnhut.

On May 1st, 1738, "The Little Society," which was subsequently known as "The Fetter Lane Society," was formed at a bookseller's shop, called "The Bible and Sun," which belonged to Mr. James Hutton. This godly bookseller was the son of an evangelical clergyman at Westminster with whom the Wesleys had frequently found a home. The promoters of this society were John and Charles Wesley; Piers, the Vicar of Bexley, Kent; and Peter Böhler. In the following September they took a room for their meetings in Fetter Lane. The members of this society professed the deepest loyalty to the Church of England. Headed by George Whitefield and Charles Wesley, they proceeded to St. Paul's, where they celebrated the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In the absence of the Wesleys the society became divided, and got into a state of strange confusion, through two of its members "disowning themselves members of the Church of England." A section led by Mr. James Hutton migrated to the old chapel at Fetter Lane, and there founded the Moravian Church. About seventy-two of the members went with the Wesleys to the Foundry and united with the faithful few who composed the mother church of Methodism.

It is probable that John Wesley never preached at Fetter Lane Moravian Chapel, although tradition declares that he has ministered from its pulpit. In Wesley's Journals, under date July 16, 1740, is the following significant entry: "One asked whether they would suffer Mr. Wesley to preach at Fetter Lane. After a short debate, it was answered, 'No; this place is taken for the Germans.'" In this old chapel at Fetter Lane, Peter Böhler preached for the last time on the morning of the day on which he died.

Although Wesley, strictly speaking, was never a member of the Moravian Church, yet he lived in the closest fellowship with them, and was indebted to them for some of the most soul-stirring hymns sung by "the people called Methodists." The familiar hymns commencing with, "Now I have found the ground wherein," "O Thou, to whose all-searching sight," "I thirst, Thou wounded Lamb of God," "O God, of good the unfathomed sea," and several others, are translated from the German hymnody as sung by the Moravians at historic Fetter Lane Chapel.

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

II.—THE UNION QUESTION.

NOT much has been heard lately of the question of union between the Bible Christians and ourselves. The two Churches are presumably awaiting the recommendations of the Joint Committee appointed by the last Conference. This committee has to continue the negotiations, to suggest such modifications in the basis of union as may render it acceptable to the members of both denominations, to prepare and supply the District Committees with such information as will enable them to form a correct judgment of the issues involved, and to present to the next Conference such recommendations as will promote union, with a view of submitting the same to the circuits.

Precisely what is the drift of feeling on this question in the two denominations it is impossible to determine. Widely different statements are made in this regard. The report of the Joint Committee "rejoices to find in both denominations a great and apparently preponderating body of opinion favourable to the principle of organic union." This in some quarters is contradicted. The Conference, however, accepted the findings of the Joint Committee as authoritative on this point, and decided to continue the negotiations and to advance a stage nearer to the consummation of union. Whether the Joint Committee will be able to formulate a basis of union that will be acceptable to the members of both denominations remains to be seen. We hope success will crown their efforts, and that the process of discussion and criticism which will follow will clear the ground for the crucial stage, viz., the submission of the whole question to the circuits.

That alone can settle the question whether there is to be union and whether there ought to be union. Union can only be brought about if there is a really warm desire for it on the part of the two peoples concerned. Hitherto we have had only the expression of official opinion on the subject. That official opinion was no doubt representative, but only to a certain extent. Not till the whole question has been submitted to the circuit Quarterly Meetings can we know the real feeling on it amongst the rank and file of the two denominations. Union could only be a blessing if approved by the great mass of the membership of the two Churches.

In the abstract nearly everybody is in favour of union. On the face of it the union of two denominations with so many points of kinship as the Bible Christians and ourselves seems reasonable and most desirable. We have all of course been struck with the similarity between the circumstances in which the two Churches originated. Born about the same time and in similar conditions, it might be expected many points of affinity would be found between us. The advantages of union, too, are obvious. Where the one denomination is strong, the other is weak, and vice versa. Many of the difficulties which would stand in the way of the union of many of the other Methodist bodies do not exist here, or are reduced to a minimum.

Of course, difficulties are always to be expected, and objections must arise. But statesmanship ought to be able, if there is anything like a reasonable disposition to compromise and concession, to surmount the difficulties, and the question is not whether something cannot be said against union, but whether there is not a balance of advantages in favour of union. Just now the chief difficulty is the composition of the higher courts. It is undeniable that the feeling in our own Church is strongly against any surrender of the proportion of two laymen to one minister in the District Meetings and Conference. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the District Committees, or a majority of them, have pronounced against any surrender of that principle. That, however, does not prove that the Connexion as a whole is of that opinion. The District Committees are far from being representative, and the attendance is uncertain and irregular. Moreover, the question has never been submitted to them for final settlement, but merely as a preliminary with a view to a fuller acquaintance with the subject on the part of the officials, and to elicit opinion and promote discussion. By this procedure it must be admitted there has been revealed a considerable body of opinion opposed to any change in this principle of representation so distinctive of our own Church.

But is this a question on which we ought to take a stand and refuse all concession? Are we not in danger of exalting what is called the two-to-one arrangement into a sort of fetish, and to treat it as something sacred. There are principles involved as between the Wesleyans and ourselves, on which we could understand anyone taking a firm stand, and it would certainly be necessary for them to largely revolutionise their position on these questions ere we could entertain the idea of union in any shape or form. We say that frankly because union between the Wesleyans and any of the other Methodist bodies is not at present within the range of practical ecclesiastical politics. But is this question of the relative numbers of ministers and laymen in the higher courts of the Church one to be regarded as of vital importance? Is it not one essentially for compromise? Is there no via media possible on this question? It will be the business of the Joint Committee to devise one, and we shall be disappointed if both denominations do not recognise its reasonableness.

What that proposal may be we do not know. What we plead for just now is a reasonable disposition of compromise. What we most earnestly deprecate is a determination to maintain our present arrangement intact as a sort of sacred ark of the Covenant, to touch which were sacrilege. The existing arrangement was evidently the outcome of reaction. The makers of our constitution had before their minds an ecclesiastical system in which ministerial influence was supreme. They had suffered and the iron had entered their souls. Under these circumstances it was natural that they should go to the opposite extreme, and devise a constitution in which laymen should be in the overwhelming majority. It is undeniable that the arrangement has worked well, and there is no desire on the part of the ministers for any change for its own sake. Such of them as advocate some compromise in the direction of equality do so not because they are dissatisfied with the present arrangement, but with a view to meeting our Bible Christian friends on this matter, and securing an arrangement that will embody so far as is possible the advantages of both systems.

What is our position on this question of ministers and laymen? Is it not that the distinction is one of convenience, and that we stand on an equality. The priestly idea is absolutely non-existent among us. The authority of the layman to preach is the same as that of the minister. We count no man master in the Church. "One is your Master, and all ye are brethren." On what principle, then, are we to insist that a hard and fast line shall be drawn limiting the ministers to one-third and giving to the laymen two-thirds of the representation in the higher courts of the Church? Were the ministers a separate caste, then it might be argued that since they are so small a proportion of the membership of the Church their representation should be proportionately smaller. But this is not the case, and as a matter of principle, either equality, or a free election of ministers or laymen, would be more consistent than our present arrangement. We are not, however, arguing for either, but for a spirit of reasonable compromise, as opposed to one of unyielding adherence to our present system of representation.

Then there is the question of the future to be considered. Methodist union may not be at hand, nor, indeed, in the near future. But there can be little doubt it will come, and that it will add enormously to the power of Methodism in this country, and contribute materially to the advancement of the Kingdom of God. It is not necessary to assume the role of a prophet to predict the influence of an unbending attitude in regard to the two-to-one principle upon the question of Methodist union. Wherever Methodist union has taken place this arrangement has had to be abandoned. In Canada Methodist union has been an unqualified success, but the new constitution does not provide for two laymen to one minister in the higher courts of the Church. And we are not aware that the rights of the laymen have been in any way endangered, or that the ministry has become a dominant caste. Some will perhaps maintain we are better without Methodist union, and no doubt something can be said in favour of that position; but we had better frankly recognise that so long as we insist on the two-to-one arrangement, an arrangement which so far as we are aware exists in no other denomination, we effectually bar the way to Methodist union.

Let it be distinctly understood we are not for union at any price. There are some distinctive features of our Church polity and life we are bound to maintain at any cost. It were better to remain isolated for ever than to sacrifice them. Union can only be secured on the principle of concession, and a reasonable give and take; but there must be no sacrifice of vital principles, and it is precisely because the two-to-one arrangement involves no vital principle that we so strongly desiderate a spirit of reasonable concession. If we are not prepared for that, it were better never to have entertained the idea of union at all.

JOSEPH RITSON.

Among the Mountains of Basutoland.

BASUTOLAND has been appropriately named "the Switzerland of South Africa," on account of its mountainous character. What the Alps are to Switzerland the Molutis are to Basutoland, though the latter do not attain so lofty an altitude as the former. As one approaches Basutoland from the west, having travelled through the Orange Free State, a land as flat as flat can be, he sees before him a wall of rock, stretching away to the horizon, and the guide points this out to him as the country of the Basuto. The western third of the country, which he enters on crossing the border, is called "the plain," in contradistinction to the eastern portion, which is known as "the mountains." Why the western part should be called a plain is by no means evident to the new-comer, especially to one fresh from the fens and marshes of East Anglia. To his mind the country is very rugged, and as he rides from the border into the interior to his destination at Morija, he has an exhilarating sense of being at last among mountains. But after he has visited "the mountains" he understands the meaning of the word "plain." Compared with the towering heights of the Molutis, running in long continuous ranges, separated by narrow valleys, the western portion of Basutoland is a plain, with a few gigantic mountains scattered about, lesser kopjes more abundant, and extensive stretches of very level country. Or, to express the contrast in a way that will be patent to all: in the plain it is possible to canter for half an hour or more along a fairly level road without drawing rein; among the mountains there are no roads, and one has to walk his horse for hours together, and occasionally himself, too, when the path becomes steeper than usual. In the plain the average pace of a horse is reckoned at seven miles an hour; among the mountains it sinks to four. Standing on the summit of the mountain behind Morija one has a splendid panoramic view of the country. On one hand is the plain stretching away beneath him like a huge mosaic, with its hedgeless fields, some of them newly ploughed, others tinted with various shades of green, as the different crops are springing up after the early rains, while the roads like broad bands pass between the fields, branching in all directions; from our lofty standpoint they appear to be beautifully smooth, whereas in reality they are quite the reverse, as the unlucky post-cart passenger finds to his cost. If one now turns his eyes in the other direction he will see the long rampart of blue mountains rearing its lofty summits aloft far above him. These are "the mountains" which it is the delight of every comer to Basutoland to visit.

This, though you might not think it, is not always an easy thing to do. Basutoland is a rock-bound island in the onward rolling tide of South African civilisation. To drop the figure, it is a black man's territory, where no white person may possess land, the natives while under the protection of Her Majesty, represented by a Resident Commissioner, retaining their own chiefs and form of government. It is one of the few spots in South Africa not overrun by prospectors. The chiefs are very jealous of white men entering their country to survey it; they are afraid that gold or diamonds should be discovered, and they be no longer able to abide in isolation. Adventurers are continually endeavouring to penetrate the country, ostensibly to buy cattle, but really to prospect, but the wily chiefs are more than a match for them. Some time ago a German doctor endeavoured to visit the mountains without obtaining the permission of the chief, and it was in vain that a missionary warned him that his attempt would be futile. "Do you think that I, Dr. Vösch, am going to ask leave from a dirty nigger? Not I!"—was the German's contemptuous answer to all expostulations. He set off on his journey closely followed by a messenger from the chief, who bade him return; but the indefatigable doctor repeated his words of scornful defiance and pursued his way. On the third morning he found that his horses had disappeared, and he was compelled to return on foot, no doubt arriving at his starting place in a most angelic humour.

THE MALUTSUNYANE FALLS : VIEW FROM ABOVE.

tion as this; they can wander whither they please without suspicion. And it often happens that large parties are formed on the mission stations with a view of spending a holiday in the mountains. The objective of these excursions is generally the Falls of the Malutsunyane River, one of the most wonderful phenomena to be seen in the country, and, indeed, in South Africa. In October last it was determined that the whole community at Morija should migrate to the mountains for a week, but lamentable events occurred which rendered it impossible for any but the young men of the station to go. We were thus a bachelor party, consisting of M. Davit, a missionary from the Zambesi, M. Germond, a teacher in the Normal School at Morija, Mr. Walker, a trader, Eric Dyke, son of the Rev. R. H. Dyke, director of the school, and the present chronicler. Certain lugubrious predictions were uttered because there were no ladies accompanying the expedition, but, marvellous to relate, we managed very well without them; indeed, one ungallant member of the party was heard to say that he was "jolly glad" there were no ladies to be looked after. The ladies, however, were indispensable in the preparations beforehand; they were zealous in making the pile of bread we needed, weighing out sugar and coffee, and distributing blankets. The provisions we packed on a spare horse, with our blankets and the various odds and ends that we counted upon needing. We took with us one attendant to see to the horses, and act as guide and general factotum—a genial, ever-smiling Mosuto named Petrose. Early one Monday morning we were astir making the final preparations, and before the sun had become too hot we rode out of Morija, each mounted on his Basuto pony.

All that day we rode, and, as the sun was sinking behind the mountains in our rear, we arrived at an out-station of the French mission. Long before reaching the river that intervened between us and the village we could see the neat little church perched high up on the mountain side, surrounded by a cluster of native huts. After a stiff climb we entered the village and were royally welcomed by the native minister in charge, Mr. John Mohapelo. For our reception he had prepared a native hut of very superior construction, built of clay and neatly thatched, as clean as a new pin. Upon the mud floor he had laid several bags of straw for us to sleep upon. We were duly introduced to his wife and children, and sat down with him to a hearty meal. After prayers we were ready for bed, and were soon stretched on our improvised mattresses. No luxurious featherbed was ever half so comfortable as those bags of straw; we slept the sleep of the weary, and were up with the sun next morning. "Mr. John," as the minister is known by his parishioners, enriched our pack-saddle with a fowl, ready dressed and cooked, and we were soon on the march again. We were now getting beyond the habitations of men; in the morning we passed through one or two native villages, but later on in the day we saw none. The Basuto are great sticklers for etiquette. You are bound when travelling to salute people you meet, and ask and answer many questions that are little short of impudent according to our English ideas. These are some of the questions that were hurled at us when passing through a village: "Where are you going?" "What are you going to do there?" "When you return where are you going?" "What have you got in that bundle?" The natives could not understand the why and wherefore of our journey. "How strange, how very strange," they would say, "that you take all this trouble to go to the Falls simply to see them." The idea of travelling for pleasure, or for the purpose of sight-seeing, is incomprehensible to the native mind.

Solitude has her home among these mountains. For hours we travelled and never saw a human being. The only sounds to be heard were the frequent "caw-caw" of the huge Kaffir crows, and the whistling of a stray bird. The farther we went the more rugged grew the country. There are no roads in the mountains, as I have already said. The only pathways are those made by the herds of cattle that graze on the mountain slopes. These tracks are ubiquitous in Basutoland: they run parallel to each other, about six or so together, each from eighteen inches to two feet wide. Generation after generation of cattle have so worn them that in some places they are three feet in depth. Along these narrow paths we wended our way, now cantering along a beautiful valley with the frowning heights of mountains towering above us on either hand, now filing slowly along a narrow pathway high up on the mountain side with sheer precipices beneath us, now leading the horses down a steep incline along which none but hardy, sure-footed, Basuto ponies could make their way without disaster. Occasionally we would come to a romantic mountain stream, with crystal water leaping down over the rocks, and singing and laughing as it pursued its course. These mountains and valleys are covered with succulent grass and afford unsurpassed pasture for cattle, and until a year or two ago, immense herds grazed here and grew fat. Now, however, there are very few herds to be seen, and those not very large, for the rinderpest has swept through these valleys, destroying the greater part of the cattle. There are still large flocks of goats, for they were not touched by the plague, and these roam everywhere. We saw plenty of them under the care of herd boys (balisana, or little shepherds), and noticed with surprise the agility of the goats; they climb up cliffs that seem quite inaccessible and find food in places that seem utterly barren. Now and then we came across the huts of the balisana; rude hovels built under the shelter of an overhanging rock. These boys stay out in the mountains for weeks and months together, living on roots and small animals which they catch among the rocks.

We reached the Malutsunyane Falls on the Tuesday afternoon about four o'clock, and immediately went to have our first view of them. It is not too much to say that we were struck dumb by the awe-inspiring spectacle, and even now I cannot hope to give you an adequate idea of what I saw. To do that needs the pen of a Dante, or Milton. The first European to visit the Falls, it is said, was a Roman Catholic priest. He was so unnerved by the yawning gulf and the roaring of the waters that he dared not look over the edge of the precipice. "It is hell," he said; and that is the name by which the natives know the Falls. Certainly, one's first impression is that the place is terrible; that it might well be the portico to the "dungeon horrible." The huge chasm, the torrent of water pouring over the precipice into the pool below with a roar like that of the sea beating on a rock-bound coast and sending up clouds of spray, the magnificent rainbow over the cascade, all combined to impress indelibly upon our minds the unspeakable grandeur of the scene. Turning reluctantly away, for the sun was sinking rapidly,

we sought for a place on which to pitch our camp, and fixed upon a site on the side of a hill immediately facing the fall. All were now busy; some collecting firewood, others cutting grass and preparing a place for sleeping, others unpacking the provisions and getting ready the supper. By the time all was ready it had grown dark, and gathering around the blazing fire we waited impatiently for the kettle to boil. For the evening meal we had the fowl Mr. John had given us, and it was hacked to pieces by means of a jack-knife. Each one secured a bone, and with it in one hand and a chunk of bread in the other, and a mug of steaming coffee between his knees, ate his supper with gusto; if you think we envied you your five-course dinner you are greatly mistaken. That over, we drew closer in, for the night was chilly, and spun yarns by the furlong. There was quite a Babel of sounds to be heard in our camp: English, Sesuto, French, with an occasional exclamation or oburgation in Dutch. Then we had prayers, and there was something very fitting in the act of worshipping the Maker of mountains in the midst of His great temple. After this we proceeded to make ourselves comfortable for the night. Grass had been spread over a place cleared of the biggest stones, and on this we laid our waterproofs, and then, each wrapping himself in his two or three blankets, and placing a saddle-bag for a pillow, we lay down and slept. Camping out beneath the broad heavens in this way possesses a peculiar charm. Above us the stars shone with all their wonted Southern brilliancy; we breathed the pure mountain air; from where we lay we could discern the dark outline of the cliffs; for a lullaby we had the continuous music of the Falls. Could anyone desire more than that? The night was cold, for we were 7,500 feet above the sea-level. As the sun was rising next morning, we were up and busy preparing for the day's excursion. We had made up our minds to descend the cliffs and spend the day below. Amidst all our preparations before leaving Morija we forgot one thing: that valuable adjunct of civilisation—soap; fortunately Mr. Walker had brought a small piece with him and we were constrained to share the use of that. But we did not trouble ourselves much about ablutions, for we were told that the best way to avoid being scorched by the sun was to allow the dirt to accumulate on the skin! I believe that is a fact; the only question in my mind is, whether the remedy is not worse than the complaint?

The view of the Fall from our camp was grand: part of it is reproduced in our first illustration. In the foreground is the long line of dark cliffs with the Fall in the centre. Beyond the cliffs rise rounded hills stretching away in undulating continuity and terminating in a range of blue mountains far away in the background. The slopes of the hills are covered with grass which throws the dark cliffs into striking relief.

There are grander falls than these as regards width and the volume of water. The Malutsunyane Falls cannot compare in these respects with Niagara and the Victoria Falls, but there is only one more lofty fall in the world, I believe, and that is devoid of the terror-striking surroundings that are so characteristic of these. The Malut-sunyane Fall is 630 feet in height, the Victoria Falls are about 400 feet, and those of Niagara 162 and 149 feet on the United States and Canadian sides respectively. The river above the Falls flows along peacefully enough, little dreaming of the terrific leap it is about to take. Suddenly it plunges over the precipice, falling sheer down in a continuous stream into the pool below. The torrent is not always, if ever, exactly vertical; the wind catches it and blows it from side to side. The Falls have undoubtedly been formed by a volcanic disturbance. As an imaginative friend of mine would say: Dame Nature turned over in her sleep and yawned, bursting the rocks asunder. A rift was produced at right angles to the course of the river, and another at right angles to this again. The latter is of great length and width, and bends round to the left, continuing in that direction for miles. The illustration shows the character of this chasm. The cliffs descend in a sheer precipice, but the disintegrating action of air and water has so wrought upon them that towards the bottom they slope in what appears from the top to be a gentle decline covered with grass and shrubs, but in reality this decline is steep and the shrubs are trees. What increases the grandeur of the whole scene is its extreme ruggedness. The precipices are broken up into numerous crags, jutting far out into the canon. Many of these are irregular pyramids; others are broad, and it was from one of these near our camp that M. Germond photographed the view of the Falls from above. We had no means of measuring the depth of the canon, but in places it must be a thousand or even twelve hundred feet deep.

We prepared on the Wednesday morning to descend the canon. This is not easy, and is practically impossible except in one place. We accomplished the descent in safety, and the view of the Fall from below amply compensated us for the trouble we had taken. We clambered along the rocks to the foot of the Fall, and sat down by the edge of the pool until we were well-nigh drenched by the spray. The pool is hidden in the picture by the spur of rock jutting out into the centre. This stygian pool is awful to contemplate; the rocks all around it are black, giving the water the appearance of ink, and it required no stretch of our imaginations to picture some horrible monster crawling out of its depths. Leaving the pool, the water flows between a line of huge rocks, and then goes on leaping over stones in ten thousand cascades, each more beautiful than the other. After flowing for some time the river makes a sudden bend to the left, and then falls over a wall of cliff in a pretty Y-shaped cascade. In all, there are six falls of some size, besides many smaller ones, this being the last of the series. At the foot of this fall there is a large pool, and on the edge of this we reclined to eat our lunch. The two natives in the picture are shepherds whom we met at the Falls and brought with us to carry cameras and provisions. Emerging from this pool the river continues its course over a rocky bed, at last emptying itself many miles away into the Orange River.

In the afternoon we climbed up to our camp, finding that it was much harder to climb up than to climb down. It took us an hour and a half of continuous climbing to reach the top. Thinking that it would be easier to climb up along a water-course than to force a way through the brushwood with feet sinking into sand, some of the party went that way. They found that in some places they had to scramble on their hands and knees across slippery rocks, and a single slip would have precipitated them down on to the rocks below—which would not have been pleasant for anybody. They arrived, fairly exhausted, to the surface where the others were awaiting their arrival. The sun not yet having disappeared, we amused ourselves with hurling rocks down the precipices. This is glorious fun. By dint of our united strength and perseverance, a huge boulder is loosened and rolled to the edge and then let go. Over it falls, crashing from point to point, gaining increased velocity as it goes, and carrying numerous satellites in its train, and at last, with a tremendous somersault from a jutting point of rock, smashing into a hundred fragments, each one continuing its course until stopped by some obstacle in its path.

Having seen these Falls, and thus having whetted our appetites, we determined to set out next morning to visit those of the Khetane River, which are but rarely visited by excursionists. So, before the sun was up next morning, we were busily en-had to content ourselves with simply looking at them. Early in the afternoon on Thursday we came upon the Khetane River, a meandering stream which we crossed and re-crossed several times. At last we arrived at the Falls, and encamped on a lofty plateau above them. We could hear the roar of the water, but could see no sign of the Falls. Khetane is modest and hides herself among the crags. After off-saddling, tired as we were, we set off to search for the Falls. After climbing about a long time we reached a point from which we obtained a splendid view of what we sought. A cry of delight escaped us as we saw the Falls, far prettier than those which we had left, though not so grand and terrible. The rocks close round in an irregular semi-circle, and down into this the river falls, a depth of 400 feet. It does not fall sheer down as is the case with the Malutsunyane Fall, but strikes upon the apex of a pyramid of rocks, breaking up into numerous cascades. Then it continues in a number of smaller falls. M. Germond's photograph, taken as it was late in the day, does not give a clear presentation of the bottom of the Fall. Retracing our steps to the camp, we made ready for the night. We could get no shelter from rocks as we had done on previous nights, and as the night was bitterly cold, we huddled close together in the attempt to keep warm. Our camp was in the open, and at a greater altitude than the one at the Malutsunyane. Next morning we determined to have another view of the Falls, and set off as soon as we had swallowed our coffee. The canon of the Khetane is much deeper than that of the Malutsunyane, and much more difficult to descend. It is thickly covered with trees at the bottom, and in this forest, it is said, there roam tigers and other beasts of prey. We had been told that to climb to the bottom was impossible, but if our time had not been so limited we should certainly have made the attempt. As it was, we climbed down a good way, and MM. Germond and Davit reached the summit of the round-headed cliff that can be seen in the picture of the canon, and from that vantage ground obtained several splendid views of the Falls, while the rest of us stayed above and rolled stones over the precipices. In honour of the first one, so far as we know, to climb the rock I have mentioned, we named it "Mont Davit."

Much against our will we had to return to the camp, and after a hasty lunch, the horses were saddled and we began our homeward march. We were thoroughly tired after climbing about so much, and earnestly wished that we could stay another week at the Falls in order to explore them at our leisure; but, alas, we had provisions for barely another day, and therefore were compelled to return. We took a path over the mountains that would bring us straight to Morija by a much shorter way than the one by which we had come, and that night we camped on the banks of the Makhaleng gaged in packing our things, and when he peered over the mountains, he saw us ready to start. We had brought with us a boy from Mr. John's, who said he knew the way to the Khetane, but when we had started we found to our disgust that he knew no more about it than we ourselves did. Relying, therefore, upon our sense of the general direction in which the Falls lay, we struck a beeline across the mountains. The way was steep, and we were changed from horsemen into pedestrians for a great part of the time. We amused ourselves by watching the herds of antelopes sporting on the mountains; but as none of us carried a gun we

River. Next morning, as the first streaks of dawn appeared in the sky, we resumed our journey. We were now back in the haunts of mankind, and came upon several native villages. There is little to distinguish one village from another, save the position in which it is built. They all consist of a collection of round mud huts, each partially surrounded by a stockade of reeds. Generally built around a tree is a palisade of bushes, enclosing the Khotla, or men's court, where the chief of the village dispenses justice, and where the men sit gossiping over their pipes and drinking beer, while the women are in the fields hoeing the soil and caring for the crops. No woman dare approach the Khotla; even European women are warned off from it. Our arrival in a village was the sign for a general stampede among the little black children playing in the dust. They would hide behind their mothers, and then cautiously survey the stranger, just as I have seen a child in England hide itself behind its mother and then peep round to examine a black man that was passing. The women, arrayed in their blankets, would emerge from the huts to salute us, and even the men would drop their pipes and saunter out of the Khotla, to ask us where we were going. At last we struck upon a waggon road, the first we had seen since leaving Morija. As we rode along we speculated on the kind of reception we should receive could we suddenly ride through Cheapside. We presented a most curious appearance, some without coats, for it was a warm day, as the Basuto say, "the sun wept;" all were more or less sunburnt, and some faces were red and peeling; our broad-brimmed hats and reckless attire gave us a romantic appearance. We could imagine the stir that the appearance of our pack-horse, led by Petrose, would create for a moment in the City. We should have been taken for a troupe of mountebanks, or a circus, or a new edition of Buffalo Bill.

As we drew nigh to Morija our horses broke into a canter, and did not stay till we reached home. Through the gateway we galloped, up the slope leading to the houses, shouting a wild war-whoop, which was taken up by the boys of the school who had just returned from their holidays. One might have thought that a horde of Dervishes had arrived from Omdurman. Thus ended an excursion which will long be remembered by us all.

For the photographs accompanying this article I am indebted to my friend M. Germond, who has kindly given permission for them to be reproduced here.

February.

WINTER must yield his sceptre up to Spring;

Sweet as the sound of music far away,
Her voice is heard; now plumes the lark its wing,
And to the barren landscape sings his lay,
Prelude of nature's coming jubilee.

On earth's rough breast, white as the ocean pearl,
The snowdrop hangs, emblem of chastity,
And crocuses their yellow flowers unfurl.

The homely, world-known daisy, to the light,
Turns its bright eye, as at creation's morn
On Eden's plains it bloomed: now glads the sight
The budding violet, and the springing corn;
O'er heath and mead, through wood and forest aisles
Spring's whispers float: even old winter smiles.

JOHN ASKHAM.

The Methodist Minister's Wheel of Fate.

BY REV. S. J. WALLIS.

I.—CHANGING TIME.

WITH the month of July comes that annual turning time of the Primitive Methodist ministers' wheel of fate, causing a tremendous flutter in the ministerial dovecotes, on account of so many parsonic pigeons having to wing their way to new ecclesiastical perches. To such the world is indeed full of change, and many of them wish they could say the same of their pockets, for, as it often happens in this disorderly world, ministers are men with short purses and long families. They are the rolling stones that can gather no moss, except by patrimony, parsimony, or matrimony. We had a dear ministerial friend, who is now no more. He was taken away in the bloom of life, by a very rapid—widow, the owner of many broad acres, and he loved the very ground she trod. It is given to very few of the cloth to marry the hand of a lady that carries a fortune in it. Their treasures are rather cased in leather covers than in iron coffers. Their principal bank is the English language, and tremendously they draw upon it. They began the world with nothing, and have been able to hold their own ever since. The rising sun tips the hills with gold, and when they want to tip with silver some railway porter, the change is so small that they are obliged to hunt it up in their pocket into the corner like a contrary colt before they can lay hold of it all. To some men it is indispensable to be worth money, for without it they would be worth nothing.

Not that the number of poor preachers is as great as the number of preachers that are poor, for, it is no uncommon thing to find among them fullness of mind with emptiness of pocket. If we ever meet a minister of ours who has made a fortune by preaching, we shall advise him never to go by a museum, lest they should catch him for a curiosity. But if the ministry is a somewhat poverty-stricken profession, it is the grandest in the universe, for those who engage in it are doing more to benefit and bless the world than the whole race of heroes and conquerors who have drenched it with tears and manured it with blood, while, to wake even one soul from the sleep of sin is a more glorious work than to have the office of the archangel to awake the dead on the day of judgment.

Our having to change so often (and the more we change the more we are the same thing), is on account of Adam's leaving paradise. Pity Adam was not adamant when Eve pressed the apple upon him. Perhaps the mother of all living, who listened to the Father of all lies, ate the forbidden fruit that she might dress, for like her gardener-husband, who had not yet lost his situation, she wore nothing but—a smile. Certainly a leopard cannot change his spots, but a Methodist minister must. A Scotsman never quits his place, except his native place, but as a Methodist preacher, when the Conference clock strikes the hour, like poor Joe in the novel, he must "move on." Like the sun, moon, and stars, which are God's Travelling Preachers, we must go our appointed rounds, which are not always fairy rings of bliss. We once saw a squirrel in a revolving cage (a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind), and as we watched him climbing his everlasting staircase, we mentally exclaimed, "Poor beggar, he is going the rounds of his circuit."

Some of our ministers, (especially sons of the manse), are wanderers born; local ties sit very lightly on them; they have no ivy-like faculty for clinging, or cat-like affection for any particular spot; the travelling bump monopolises the whole head; they take as instinctively to the itinerancy as ducks to water, and look on a fixed pastorate with the same aversion which an old gipsy feels for a stationary abode. Others love a settled home, and the turning of the great iron wheel crushes their very heart-strings. But every system has its drawbacks, and the itinerancy brings in its train things more or less painful to all. We cannot expect a south wall all round our garden.

One drawback in our whirligig life is the frequent packing, and unpacking, of our goods and chattels. To the young preacher with all his family and estate hidden under the circumference of his hat, and who is anxious to get away from the omnivorous ravages of his landlady's cat, the packing up of his bag and baggage may be a trifle light as air. But to the minister and his wife, with a number of olive branches, it is often worry and anxiety enough to fray the edges of the brain, and becomes more so as the years go by, and grave-yard blossoms whiten on the brow.

From cock-crow to owl-hoot, the parental pair are as busy as a bride on the market day before her marriage, or that old globe-trotter, Sabbathless Satan, who like a bird can be in two places at once. At such a time, home is no longer home-like. It has all the discomforts of a picnic, without any of its pleasures. They have breakfast of bread and butter in the attic, dine off cold mutton in the bedroom, and finish up with a bald-bread-and-cheese supper in the kitchen.

The caged canary no longer shakes floods of delirious music from his little throat, but is as mute as if he were moulting; the kitten no longer plays with her tail,

"Or, in the glass is pleased to find Another cat, and peep behind," but sneaks off in disgust.

Boxes packed with brain preserved in ink—boxes with little fat volumes full of the bloom and marrow of divinity, and with the scent of dead days clinging to their dog-eared pages—dried tongue, in the shape of manuscript sermons, yellow and wrinkled with age, which, perhaps, like the city of London, would fare the better for being burnt, (and what a blaze we should have, if all who cannot put fire into their sermons, would consent to put their sermons into the fire), with other manuscripts, written, perhaps, with an eye to the "Press," but wisely withheld, knowing that it takes many quills to make a goose, but that a man can make himself a goose with one. Books, too, there are in which men have spun out their brain in webs of fun for the amusement of others,—and why not? have we not the blackbird to play his flute of gold, as well as the duck to swim in her own gravy, and roses and lilies as well as potherbs and fruit-bearing trees?—and books of poetry with a glory of words, as well as deep thought, sweet as summer to the heart and ear, besides trunks containing nick-nacks and feminine attire, and sometimes dearer than all beside, a nursery ball, wrapped round with a leaf of the mother's heart, and a little spade, telling of the tiny flower-garden, and of the child-gardener who tilled it,—all of which are piled one upon another, or scattered about waiting for removal.

At such times as these a man without his "better half" would be like a bird with one wing or the left leg of a scissors. A woman may not be able to throw a stone at a hen, but she can pack more articles into an ordinary box than a man can into a one-horse waggon.

But the worry of moving is nothing compared with having to move from a well-to-do circuit to one where the only chance of drawing even the minimum salary, is to draw it with a lead pencil. A Methodist minister, like Enoch, is translated without dying, but sometimes, like Homer, he suffers by translation. For instance, he has a cosy little circuit in the Goshen District, with homes when away from home, in which he is as magnificently lodged as a round-bellied mite in the midst of a Cheshire cheese, and always as welcome as the sun is at a picnic. As a sample of the rest, take one from the life, well known to the cloth as the "Methodist Hotel," whose host is farmer Furrow, a round, ruddy-faced man in gaiters; whose mind has a country flavour, like a book in which when opened you find a sprig of sweetbriar between the leaves; whose heart is as big as his farm, (and that covers considerable ground), whose grip of the hand is like a vice, which is the only vice about him, and who receives the ministers of the Word as did old farmer Abraham, who, when the three angels came to visit him, felt it his first duty to go and hold converse with Sarah as to what there was in the larder.

In our rural circuits we know farmers, members with us, who have a good deal of money and not a good deal of anything else, who take more thrashing than their own corn to get anything out of them, and whose mean, mustard-seed souls would not part with the reek of their porridge if they could help it. Perhaps they intend to leave charitable legacies in their "will," but this is a clumsy way of trying to cheat the devil. "Death-givings" are only good when they are a continuation of "life-givings."

We know others like farmer Furrow, whose lives are as full of kindly deeds as their own fields with ears of wheat in autumn; who part with their money as freely as their own cows do with their milk—a little gentle pressure and the rich stream flows. Such men are diamonds set in veins of gold, rich but sparkling with the glory of God. May their number increase, and may they live till the millennium comes.

In our next we must make our readers better acquainted with Farmer Furrow, and introduce them within the Methodist Hotel, that they may, in imagination at least, share its hospitalities.

Though Changing Time is not at this present, we shall have to roll round with the year to tell of it and what it brings us to.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

II.—IN PRAISE OF CONSTANCY.

HO that knows his Bunyan does not remember the scene at the house of the Interpreter, in which the pilgrim is shown two children, each in his chair? Passion, the eldest is named: Patience the other. Passion is much discontented, but Patience is very quiet. Passion will not wait; he must have his good things now, and when a bag of treasure is brought and poured down at his feet he rejoices therein with unbounded joy, and laughs

Patience to scorn. The interpretation, of course, is of the kind current in Bunyan's day—there is a good spice of "other-worldliness" in it. Passion figures the men of this world, and Patience the men of that which is to come: this world is vilified that the next may be exalted: there is nothing of lasting value here below. But allow for Bunyan's over-absorption with the next life, and you still have two vital and persistent human types—the brilliant and the sober; the vehement and the grave; the tumultuous and the tranquil; the quickly-changing and the constant. How typical, when we think of it, they are of the early ebullient Bunyan become sobered—the roystering, bell-ringing, swearing, card-playing village blade chastened and calmed into the tender and lambent preacher of the Word. But let me now introduce you to a kindred little piece of Wordsworth's, just as personal and autobiographic in its character. The Grasmere poet-philosopher has two birds, where Bunyan has two children, but the contrast is as piquant, and has in Wordsworth's favour, perhaps, the advantage of not carrying off our thoughts at a tangent into another world than this. Here are the stanzas:

O Nightingale! thou surely art
A creature of a "fiery heart":—
These notes of thine—they pierce and pierce;
Tumultuous harmony and fierce!
Thou sing'st as if the god of wine

Had helped thee to a Valentine;
A song in mockery and despite
Of shades, and dews, and silent night:
And steady bliss, and all the loves
Now sleeping in these peaceful groves.

I heard a stock-dove sing or say
His homely tale this very day:
His voice was buried among trees,
Yet to be come at by the breeze:
He did not cease; but cooed—and cooed:
And somewhat pensively he wooed:
He sang of love, with quiet blending,
Slow to begin, and never ending:
Of serious faith and inward glee;
That was the song—the song for me!

No one who knows Wordsworth at all can doubt that this came from the very heart of him—is a piece of self-revelation. He did not wear his soul upon his sleeve. He adds a note to the poem which I must transcribe—it is so natural to the man: "His voice was buried among trees," says he; "a metaphor expressing the love of seclusion by which this bird is marked; and characterising its note as not partaking of the shrill and the piercing, and therefore more easily deadened by the intervening shade; yet a note so peculiar, and withal, so pleasing, that the breeze, gifted with that love of the sound which the poet feels, penetrates the shade in which it is entombed, and conveys it to the ear of the listener." Yes, bird and bard are alike in this: "You must love them ere you find them worthy to be loved." They do not take you captive by sheer brilliance; they have none of the qualities of overpowering passion, but, more than most of those who boast such qualities, they endure and satisfy. As Mr. Myers says: "While there are few poems of Wordsworth's which could be read to a mixed audience with the certainty of producing an immediate impression; yet on the other hand, all the best ones gain in an unusual degree by repeated study." I have no doubt that, in the poem just quoted, Wordsworth was intending, half-consciously at any rate, a contrast between himself and some other poets—Byron and Shelley, for example—poets of fiery heart and feverish passion; but we will not follow him in this. Let our aim be more directly practical,

Who has not been called on again and again to give high place to the virtue of quiet constancy? To have a friend—be it wife or husband or brother or sister or what else—in whose heart you can hide and confide with unfaltering and unfoiled faith; how sweet and strengthening! What of mere brilliance and distracting charm would you not give for the plain grey staidness, which, as its name implies, both stays with you and stays you up! In the heart's hours of tragedy these are the refuges we seek. Who is there that cannot sympathise with Paul when he wrote that gusty letter of his to the Galatians? They had greeted him when he went to them with the "tumultuous harmony and fierce" of the nightingale: they received him as an angel of God, nay, as the Christ Himself; they would have given him their own clear bright eyes in exchange for his weak, disease-reddened ones; but alas! their rosy promise duped the apostle; their eager running speedily slowed down; they were "quick believers," but they lacked the "broad shoulders" which, as George Herbert says, should go with agile faith. Not "slow to begin and never ending"—quite the reverse. They are precisely the sort of people Thierry described in his "History of the Gauls." "They possessed a personal bravery which nothing could match; they were of a frank, free spirit, impetuous, open to all impressions, eminently sprightly and intelligent; but, at the same time, exhibiting an extreme mobility, with little or no constancy, and having a marked repugnance to the ideas of discipline and order." In a word, the nightingale's nature, not the stock-dove's. For naturalists tell us that no sooner has the brood been hatched out than the liquid music ceases, and the notes which entranced all listeners are exchanged for a mere guttural croak. Disturb his nest at once after the young appear, or remove its contents, and the nightingale recovers his voice, but let a week elapse and "his constitution undergoes a change, and no second attempt to rear a family is made."

But one of the most beautiful Bible illustrations of the contrast between Passion and Constancy is given in the story of Ruth. It is on the way from Moab to Bethlehem. Twice the stricken mother had urged her daughters-in-law to return to their own country. She is too generous and disinterested to wish them to accompany her to a strange land to the injury of their prospects in life. She points out the conditions and entreats them to count the cost. At first both resist, but at the second appeal Orpah gives way. "And they lifted up their voice and wept again: and Orpah kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her." How swift a touch that is—and how graphic! Two words really do it all—Orpah kissed: Ruth clave. It is Passion and Patience: Nightingale and Stockdove once more. These two words reveal a whole character in each case. One old divine, perhaps a little harshly, calls

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

Orpah "a blazing meteor falling down out of the air," while Ruth is "that fixed star fairly shining in heaven." Orpah is full of affectionate impulse, "a creature of a fiery heart," her love glows with the fervour of summer. But in comparison with Ruth's, it lacks depth, persistency, firmness. She renounces her former resolve—"Nay, but we will return with thee unto thy people." She shrinks from the sacrifices which must follow. Like most people of her temperament she has "a sensitive hatred to suffering." She will kiss Naomi, but is not willing to become a martyr for her sake. A common type, you say? Yes; but let its very commonness lead us to place more value on those qualities, which, though not so showy and brilliant, have their own mild and steady radiance, a genial and enduring glow. Showers of meteors (to recur to the old divine's figure) visit the earth at certain seasons and startle everybody into staring into the heavens, while the nightly shining of a thousand steady stars scarcely ever attracts a look. Poor Lear was sadly taken in by the warm protestings of his elder daughters, forgetting that, too often, protestings hold an inverse ratio to performances. Cordelia's reserve angered him, but he came to know its worth by and by. She would not "heave her heart into her mouth;" she was conscious of a love that was "richer than her tongue;" well indeed would it have been for the old man had he early known the difference in this case between nightingale and stockdove. You cannot help liking the Orpahs—nay, loving them—they are so bright; so enthusiastic, so winning. They are full of good resolutions, and rich in repentances, but alas! both too soon run to seed. They are full of "fizz," to use a vulgarism—the ginger-beer bottles of the church, soon up and soon down, going off with a loud report, but in a very short while, stale, flat, and unprofitable. "Steadfastly-minded," (see Ruth i. 18)—there you have the great, enduring, conquering quality. It overcomes others. Naomi "left speaking"—she yielded to Ruth's superior strength. It conquers time, compels fame. It is the secret of persistence in history. Ruth's name is embalmed for ever. Orpah's we never hear of again. From the moment when she disappears on the line where sky and desert meet she is seen no more. But Ruth rises to honour, becomes the ancestress of kings, and of the greatest of all men easily moulded, but yet powerfully adhesive, and hardening into a strength and firmness capable of resisting not only the example of Orpah, but the renewed entreaty of Naomi after Orpah had departed.

One more illustration only have I space for, and this time it shall be taken from a little book which Primitive Methodists hardly know enough of, and from which they may be frightened away too readily by the fact that its author was a good deal of a sacerdotalist. I refer to Keble's "Christian Year." The poem I have in mind is called "The Two Rainbows," and there is no trace of sacramentarianism in it, but only pure and deep religious feeling, in which all can share. It is based on the well-known country saying:

A rainbow in the morning,
Is the shepherd's warning;
A rainbow at night,
Is the shepherd's delight.

An image, suggests the poet, of two kinds of souls to be found in all our churches:

E'en so, in hope and trembling
Should watchful shepherd view
His little lambs assembling,
With glance both kind and true:
'Tis not the eye of keenest blaze,
Nor the quick-swelling breast,
That soonest thrills at touch of praise—
These do not please him best.

But voices low and gentle,
And timid glances shy,
That seem for aid parental
To sue all wistfully.
Still pressing, longing to be right,
Yet fearing to be wrong,—
In these the pastor dares delight,
A lamb-like, Christ-like throng.

These in Life's distant even,
Shall shine serenely bright,
As in the autumnal heaven
Mild rainbow tints at night,
When the last shower is stealing down,
And ere they sink to rest,
The sunbeams weave a parting crown
For some sweet woodland nest.

WORDSWORTH'S COTTAGE, RYDAL MOUNT.

—the man Christ Jesus. How the quiet resolved music of her homely words lingers on the ear—it will do you good to hear them again, familiar though they be: "Intreat me not to leave thee, and to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." Death did not kill Ruth. It cannot "part" her from the love and admiration of all the ages. I like that fine old expressive Saxon word, "clave." It means literally to stick or adhere. "Clay" comes from the same root. Compare the Psalmist's word: "I have stuck unto Thy testimonies." If we may be allowed the comparison, Ruth is like clay—soft,

That final word brings us back to our text. It is the nightingale and the stockdove over again: the quiet, the serious, the pensive, rather than the fierce, the fiery, and the tumultuous.

And yet at the risk of weakening all that I have written, my farewell word must be one of compensation and caution. It would be a too prosaic world altogether if there were no nightingales and only stockdoves. We hear of men having the defects of their qualities: have they not also the qualities of their defects? In other words, passion has its place and power, and we could ill do wanting it. Wordsworth may well say: "This is the song, the song for me," but there are other souls whom it never thrills or even touches. Keats, on the contrary, would have uttered the same exclaima-tion, and actually did utter it, of the nightingale. Wordsworth had his limitations, and they had their blessedness for him, but they were limitations notwithstanding. Arnold is right when he says that "Wordsworth's eyes avert their ken from half of human fate," and Myers also when he writes: "there will be many moods in which we shall not retain him as our companion." A friend of mine once criticised the prayers of Jesus as less moving, because less passionate, than those of Paul. The truth is, though the ideal be high, and the task hard, we want both—the fervid, even vehement zeal, that burns and flames, sometimes, too, it may be with no slight volume of smoke, but which when it dies down does so only to settle into a solid abiding body of heat, a store of potential energy, a promise and power of work of which the advancing years shall see the sure and serviceable issue. Pending the time when the perfect individual shall preserve all the fire of youth under the frost of age, it is well to be glad that we have them both, though as yet unreconciled, and that nightingale and stockdove have equally their function in the economy of God.

The Lord's Supper.

BY REV. J. WATSON, D.D.

S Free Churchmen we may well be glad that the movement against sacerdotalism in the Church of England now going on, has brought to the front the significance of the Lord's Supper. It is mainly in this ordinance that it entrenches itself. Were it dislodged from this citadel its other positions would easily be taken. Besides, this movement, in consequence of the interest it is exciting, affords an opportunity for, and is indeed a call to us to endeavour to arrive at, a more distinct and complete conception of the nature and obligations of this ordinance. Nothing more can be desired of us, perhaps, in respect to deep-rooted dislike of the doctrine of the Real Presence, as set forth by Romanists and Ritualists. But have we an adequate positive doctrine, full and clear, as to our Lord's relation to the ordinance to put in its place? Here lies, in my view, the weakness of Nonconformity in general, and of Primitive Methodists in particular. In some of our churches lamentable irregularity and slovenliness in its observance prevail. And as to sacramental doctrine, we have in Nonconformity every variety of teaching, from the negative doctrine of the Society of Friends, through Socinian and Zwinglian views, up to those held by what may be called High Church Nonconformists. When I read in my early days Dr. Halley's book on "The Sacraments," I was very much influenced by his teachings, and for a long time was accustomed to speak of the Sacraments as merely symbolic ordinances and badges of profession, laying special stress on their didactic character, as teaching certain truths through the eye which in the preaching of the Word we teach through the ear. I do not lay less stress now on their representative and didactic aspects, but, in my view, the New Testament connects them more closely than Dr. Halley did with the spiritual life of the individual Christian and the communal life of the Church of Christ. Am I right in supposing that the opinion is gaining ground among Nonconformists that we have undervalued the ordinance of the Lord's Supper as much as most Anglicans have overvalued it? While discarding as completely as ever the Sacerdotal doctrine of the Real Presence, should we not insist more upon a real spiritual presence of Christ at His Supper Table, as Master of the spiritual household, of which the former view is the perversion? Error is usually the understatement or overstatement of some true doctrine. One can hardly understand how the sacramentarian view has gained such vogue and influence, unless there is at the heart of it some precious truth. What is needed at the present time is that we should define and determine more clearly our own position. A distinct and positive enunciation, on our part, of New Testament teaching on this subject would do more for the cause of truth, than all our negative protests against what we believe to be false doctrine.

To deal with this subject as a question of Historical Theology, in order to ascertain how New Testament teaching has been perverted, is an interesting and instructive method. Dr. Fairbairn has shown how this perversion came about, through the carrying over of Judaistic and Pagan elements into Christianity. And, indeed, it is almost impossible, except in this way, to understand how the simple New Testament doctrine could have been transformed into the monstrous dogma of Transubstantiation. Through those influences the sacerdos, or priest, was first developed. This process, through which the simple presbyter of apostolie times became a full-grown priest, is described in Bishop Lightfoot's essay on "The Christian Ministry," and by Dr. Hatch in his interesting book on "The Organisation of the Early Church." But a priest must have something to offer—a priest must have a sacrifice. "But, of course," says Dr. Fairbairn, "the creation of a priesthood involves the institution of a priestly service. . . There was only one rite that could be made to serve that purpose; and so the simple and beautiful institution of the Supper shares the transformation of the ministry. . . . The priests who stand in the place of Christ offer a true and full sacrifice in the Church of God to the Father." The impulse to sacerdotalism came from Paganism, the authority or warrant, from the Hebrew Scriptures. Tertullian represents the heathen tendency; Cyprian the Hebrew. But for our purpose the history of church dogma on this subject is not of importance. As to sacramental doctrine we defer solely to the teaching of the New Testament, and as to the spiritual benefits of the Lord's Supper we attach more value to the testimony of the ordinary Christian consciousness than to the speculations of schoolmen and the dogmatic utterances of the Church.

The New Testament does not give a very large place to this ordinance. Of the first importance are the records of its institution given in the three synoptic gospels, and the account added by St. Paul which he had received by special revelation. In substance these are identical, while differing in details. The term "covenant" is used in all four accounts. The "shedding" or "pouring out" of the Saviour's "blood" is referred to in all the three gospels. "All drink," "blood of the covenant," and "for many" are peculiar to Matthew and Mark; "new covenant" to Luke and Paul. There is also an important didactic passage in 1 Cor. x. 16-21. Besides these, we have mention made, without comment, several times of "the breaking of bread," and a reference to the rite in 1 Cor. xii. 13: "We were all made to drink into one Spirit."

"Such," says Principal Moule, "is the special New Testament material for sacramental doctrine. It will be seen that its bulk is not great. It is ample enough to secure the believing reader's deep and reverent attention. But it is not enough to justify the inference that the holy rites stand in the front, so to speak, of Christianity. If they do stand there, it is a strange paradox that large tracts of the New Testament are as a fact silent about them, just where emphatic mention might be looked for; e.g., the Epistles to the Ephesians and to the Hebrews."

Turning, then, to those passages with "deep and reverent attention," we note that the circumstances of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and many of the terms which our Lord uses, prove that it is the Jewish Passover in a new form. The ordinance of the Lord's Supper is, like the Passover, a Commemorative rite. The one was in commemoration of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt; the other keeps the Church in remembrance of the redemption accomplished for men by the death of Christ. In its nature and extent this is an infinitely greater deliverance than the temporal redemption of Israel, although the Passover might be for the pious Jews the symbol of inward, spiritual salvation. The redemption of Israel was by sacrifice. The lamb was slain and its blood sprinkled on the lintel and door-posts of each family of Israel, so that the Lord in passing through to smite the Egyptians, seeing the blood on the lintel, might pass over the door. Exod. xii. 21-23. Whether the expiatory idea entered into the Passover sacrifices it is difficult to say, but it is clearly implied in the Christian ordinance. It is a commemoration of our redemption by the sacrifice of Christ. "This is My blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins." The bread is the Body under the special and only aspect, as "given," "being given," "offered up in sacrifice for us," just as the blood is to be regarded as shed for us. "His institution of the Supper," says Beyschlag, "the most certain fact we have of Him, attests that He knew all men, even the best and most pious in Israel, to be in need of an atonement and a Mediator, but Himself to be the spotless Lamb who makes atonement for them with His blood." As commemorative of signal benefits, both the Passover and the Lord's Supper were to be seasons of thanksgiving and joy. Hence the eucharistic character of the Christian feast. As meals partaken in common and in memory of common blessings, each feast was a communion. Hence the idea of the Lord's Supper as a "communion of the body," and "the blood of Jesus Christ." In both ordinances bread was to be eaten; in the Christian ordinance the cup also as a symbol of Christ's blood was to be drunk. Hence it represents and offers Jesus Christ as the Sustainer of our spiritual life, on whom we feed with thanksgiving.

There is another reference in the words of institution to the Old Testament, of profoundest significance. The blood of the covenant suggests an analogy between it and the Sinaitic covenant with Israel ratified by sacrifice. The new covenant bears reference to the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxxi. 31-34): "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah." The new covenant, at the time of the institution of the Supper, was about to be ratified and sealed by the Redeemer's blood. "The covenant," exclaims Dr. Bruce, "of course is new. It is Jeremiah's new covenant come at last." In the apostle Paul's two great passages in 1st Corinthians certain points of doctrine, suggested by, or expressed in, the words of institution, are brought out—that of the union in one Body, through their common participation of Christ, of all true believers, and that the ordinance is altogether, in origin, authority and purpose, the Lord's. It was not instituted by the Church in honour of Christ, as an evidence of its love and devotion, having its origin in the will of the Church, just as a grateful nation might by some institution strive to keep in memory, and show its gratitude to, one of its heroes. The ordinance is the Lord's Supper; the Cup and the Table are the Lord's. Desiring to be remembered by His Church, and to keep Himself in direct contact with the life of the Church, He established it. Its members observe it in remembrance of Him. Those who partake of it show, announce, and proclaim the Lord's death, till He come, and this, not of their own initiative, but because He arranged and willed that they should so do. Because of the Lord's proprietorship in all that pertains to this feast it can only be worthily partaken of by men that are spiritual and holy. "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils. Ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of devils." "Wherefore whosoever shall eat the bread or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." He commits a sin which calls down judgment, if in partaking he does not discern the Lord's body. Faith, which discerns the underlying reality, and separation from the sinful, idolatrous practices of the world, are essential to worthy participation in this ordinance.

The sacramental doctrine which evangelical Protestants have deduced from these passages, exhibits many shades of difference. They agree in their views as to the commemorative and symbolic character of the Lord's Supper. The bread and the wine are emblems, or symbols, of the Lord's body, as broken for us, and of His blood, as shed, or poured out, for us. The sacramental actions have also a symbolic meaning, representing, on our Lord's part, the giving of Himself to us for the nourishment of our spiritual life, and, on our part, participation in Him as our life and salvation—as spiritually eating His body and drinking His blood. He says of the bread, when we sit at His table with a humble, believing spirit, as truly as He did at the first supper: "Take, eat; this is My body;" and of the cup: "Drink ye all of it." So do we as really, though spiritually, receive the bread and cup from His hands. But the reality is not what is seen, what appears. We partake of Christ Himself. He is the Living Bread. "My flesh is meat indeed, and My blood is drink indeed." His literal flesh and blood are not in any sense present. We have no altar, no sacrifice for sins offered by priestly hands. We come in contact with Christ in no material sense. The flesh profiteth nothing. But we have something better. Christ is spiritually in our midst through the power of the Holy Spirit, and apprehensible by faith. And how solemn and inspiring the thought that we eat and drink with Jesus Christ Himself! He condescends to sup with us. And more than this; we feast on Christ Himself, on blessings which He alone can impart. He provides the royal dainties; His own hands spread the table. Oh, marvel of love that He permits us to feast with Him!

"Here would I feed upon the Bread of God, Here drink with Thee the royal wine of heaven."

This sacrament is not, however, the exclusive, or even the chief medium through which saving grace comes to the soul of the believer. There is nothing, indeed, in the New Testament to warrant the idea that it conveys more blessing to the individual recipient, or that it promotes in any higher degree the corporate life of the Church than the other means of grace, say, the preaching service, or the prayer-meeting. The spiritual good received depends very much upon the private meditation and prayer of the individual, upon the oral teaching of the presiding minister, and the united prayers of those who communicate. As a means of spiritual blessing in and of itself it is not in some respects of equal value to the other means of grace. Men are saved and blessed by the hearing of the Word, for faith cometh by hearing; and by the prayer of faith, for "whosoever calleth on the name of the Lord shall be saved," apart from this sacrament. But it is inoperative without prayer and faith. Wherein, then, lies its special value? In this. While it has elements in common with other Christian ordinances—being based on the mediation of Christ and effective through the power of the Spirit and the faith of the receiver, as they are—it has elements which differ from them. As a sign the Lord's Supper concentrates our thoughts on Christ as God's sacrifice for sin. "The new covenant in His blood." "Ye do show the Lord's death till He come." His sacrifice is, indeed, our daily trust; we are always feeding on Christ. Our experiences at the Lord's table do not lie apart from our daily life of union with Christ. But this ordinance tends to bring our ideas and feelings in relation to Him as God's sacrifice for sin and our Redeemer into distinct consciousness, to vivify our memories of Him and His redeeming work. It recalls the scenes of Gethsemane, the judgment seat, and the cross. Here, for the help of memory and imagination, are the emblems of His broken body and shed blood. Him we have not seen as His disciples saw Him. But we have read of Him in the Gospels—of His cross and passion—until our hearts have been filled with a great love to Him. We do not see Him now, risen and glorified, yet bearing still in His body the marks of His mortal agony. But we have personal memories of Him, notwithstanding all this. Spiritually we have more than once beheld Him. Did we not see Him on the cross, as Christian did, when the burden of our guilt rolled away? Have we not often gazed upon Him since then when the Spirit has taken us up into the mount of vision? Had we never seen Christ in the Word; if it had not pleased God to reveal His Son in us, of what value would this sacrament be? A magical rite, and nothing more. But furnished as our minds are with memories or ideas of Him, this ordinance, received in faith, revives them with intensified power. They may have become dim and inoperative through the influence of the world, but at the table of the Lord they are revived and re-strengthened. Our Lord knew what was in man—the laws of mental association, the power of mental suggestion, and He made use of them. We all know how a pictorial representation or sign or a symbol, tends to bring up associated ideas—how by a picture or photograph, we keep before us the image of an absent or a departed friend. Now that He might be remembered, that we might keep in mind how He yielded up His life for us, in the double form of His body and His blood, our Lord instituted this ordinance. "Do this, in remembrance of Me."

"This cup is the new covenant in My blood." Do not these words indicate that this ordinance is more than symbolic, that it is a federal transaction—not only a sign but a seal? At this point some may refuse to go along with me. In a recent number of "The Christian World Pulpit" there is a sermon by Dr. Horton on the Sacraments, which opens with a quotation from the late Dr. Reynolds, in which these words occur. "But apart from their intellectual and emotional effect, apart from their appeal and response to our spiritual nature, it seems to me unchristian and unpauline and unspiritual and ungodly to treat them as means or seals of grace. What we have to do is to feel the real presence of the Master always and everywhere, and then we are above the unspeakable meanness of impaling Him in bread and water and wine." Dr. Horton endorses this view. For he says of the Lord's Supper that our Lord "gave no indication that He meant anything more than a beautiful memorial of His life and death." In the same number of "The Christian World Pulpit," Dr. Guinness Rogers says: "My beloved friend Dr. Dale attached a value to the Lord's Supper, and found in it a meaning which for myself I could never discover." . . . "For myself, I am in sympathy with the plain principle of Zwingli's interpretation." In passing, however, I may be permitted to say that Dr. Pope finds in Zwingli's doctrine more than the mere commemorative sense. While tending towards that view, "his doctrine," Dr. Pope says, "went beyond it; Christ, to the contemplation of faith, is not only subjectively, but objectively present; and that spiritual eating of His heavenly body, which is the appropriation of His atoning grace, is a sacramental eating or receiving of the signs and seals of a present Saviour." Were I to have regard to any human authority on this matter I should rather attach myself to Dr. Dale than to Dr. Horton or Dr. Rogers. Dr. Rogers says, "that he (Dr. Dale) found a world of deeper meaning in the Sacraments than most of his associates." And he did this, in my view, because there was in him such a remarkable combination of genuine spiritual mysticism with the highest intellectual power. I do not wish to dogmatise on this matter, when so many able men hold a contrary view to mine. But I regard the Sacraments as not only signs, but seals and vouchers of the covenant promises. Some regard this as the most significant view of the Sacraments. Professor Banks says: "The covenant character of the ordinances must be kept in the foreground." "From the beginning onward," says Principal Moule, "the Covenantal Idea appears, and everywhere, at its side, the Sacramental Institution." Paul speaks of the rite of circumcision as a sign and seal. "And he (Abraham) received the sign (semeion) of circumcision, a seal (sphagida) of the righteousness of faith." (Rom. iv. 11.) A deed signed and sealed confirms an engagement. Circumcision was a token and seal of the covenant between God and Abraham. The same idea appears in the words of Institution of the Lord's Supper. "This cup is the new covenant in My blood." The new covenant is that which was first proclaimed by Jeremiah, with its promises of forgiveness, of inward purity and love. The Old Covenant was limited in range, and largely temporal in blessing. The New Covenant is individual, spiritual and universal. By this ordinance our Lord seals for us the promises of this new and better covenant. The elements are the tokens and pledges of His love. Our Lord is not "impaled" in the sacrament; the sacrament does not by any power inherent in itself confer and apply the blessings of the covenant. But it is intended to show that the covenant is ordered in all things and sure—that Christ does really and truly give us, in a spiritual manner, His flesh to eat and His blood to drink; and we, engaging ourselves to be His people, seal our side of the covenant by partaking of the emblems of His body and blood. And as we sit at the Lord's Table our Lord often reassures us of His forgiving love. His Spirit writes afresh His law of love in our hearts in firmer, deeper lines; He puts it in the centre of our being, that it may become increasingly the authoritative law of our life and its inspiring motive.

The Lord's Supper is of deep significance for the Church as a whole. Paul makes a great deal of the idea of it as a communion of the faithful. "The Cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? seeing that we, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread." (1 Cor. x. 16, 17.) It is the symbol of our brotherly fellowship and of our common union with Jesus Christ. As an institution for the whole community, and to be observed, when they meet in one place, it seals God's promises to His Church: it is an assurance that God's kindness will not depart from her, and that the covenant of His peace will not be removed. Notwithstanding the outward divisions which the Church presents, its continued and universal observance of this ordinance is the symbol, and the only symbol, of its catholicity and historic unity. Sitting together at the Lord's Table we think of men who have witnessed for Christ since the first meeting in the Upper Room. We are in a line with the apostles, and with the martyrs and saints of all ages and of every church. Some of us remember those with whom we have sat down in Africa and Australia, in India and China, with black men and yellow men, as well as with men of our own race. More tenderly we think of those who have passed before us into the heavenly world, and are drinking of the fruit of the vine fresh with their Redeemer in His Father's kingdom. As we meditate, the distinctions of time and space, of race and colour, disappear, even the dark separating line we call death passes out of sight. As there is but one Spiritual Table, one Bread, and one Cup, so is the true Church but one household, under the headship of Him who is Lord both of the dead and the living.

"One family we dwell in Him,
One Church above, beneath;
Though now divided by the stream
The narrow stream of death."

Browsings in My Library.

I call it the book-room, but that is because we are modest. Our friends call it the library. As a matter of strict fact, it is not a very large room, but it has shelves round two sides of it, and the books in these tightly packed, and they overflow on to the mantelpiece and tables and chairs, and into cupboards, and, indeed, on to the tops of cupboards. Delia, who is the personification of neatness, is in daily despair, and declares "it is really impossible to keep the room tidy. It is simply heartbreaking. It is no use trying." I gently suggest that she should leave off trying, as it is immaterial to me whether the room is tidy or not; in fact, if I must confess it, a library "all in a litter" is a delight to my bookwormish eye. It shows that the books are the companions of the owner, and not merely articles of wall furniture.

"And that is just like a man," replies my domestic tyrant. "Have I no feelings to be considered? How am I to bring anybody in here while the room is in such a disgraceful state?"

And so the dear creature sets to work, and puts the loose books back on to the shelves, not without drily satirical comment as to their external appearance and their internal contents. And it must be admitted that there is some superficial justification for some of her remarks. South's "Sermons," with half the title torn off the back, and Whately "On Some of the Peculiarities of the Christian Religion" with one cover missing, and that Greek "Herodotus" with no cover at all, and that ragged row of "Works of the Puritan Divines," and the dog-eared volumes of "The Spectator" and "The Rambler," and the unbound paper-covered volumes of French and German classics looking the worse for wear—well, between you and me, they do present a rather disreputable appearance.

"Where did you pick up this treasure?" Delia asks, holding up the dingiest of little volumes. "I suppose it was an immense bargain!" and she gives a scornful little sniff. Well, it happens to be Defoe's "Religious Courtship," and it cost me twopence outside a bookshop in Hull. I had never met with it before. It is not a great treasure, perhaps, for it is not a very early edition, but it was a good investment any way. Delia had not seen the title, but when I called her attention to it, she was interested, and said, "Well, I've no doubt it reads better than it looks. Some day I'll try to struggle through it."

"Struggle through" a book of Daniel Defoe! But there—

I insist grimly on Delia sitting down in the easy-chair, while I give her an outline of "Religious Courtship." The full title is "Religious Courtship: being Historical Discourses on the Necessity of Marrying Religious Husbands and Wives Only; as also, of Husbands and Wives being of the same opinions in Religion with One Another. With an Appendix showing the Necessity of Taking None but Religious Servants; and a Proposal for the Better Managing of Servants."

A LIBRARY TO BROWSE IN.

"And does he really do all that?" asks incredulous Delia.

It is not for me to say how far we have agreed on matters of religion, but she has had some servants who have not been excessively religious, or readily manageable.

The book gives us a gloomy picture of the religious state of the upper classes in the beginning of the last century. It tells a story, or rather two or three slightly connected stories, in a series of dialogues. A well-to-do retired London merchant, a widower, has three marriageable daughters, and "a gentleman of a very good estate courted the youngest of these daughters." The girls had promised their dying mother that they would not marry any man who did not, at least, profess to be a religious man. They take different views, however, of the binding force of this promise. The youngest, a truly pious girl, is determined to abide by it. The two elders laugh at the idea of refusing a good match for such a scruple. The young man is handsome, and in every way agreeable, but he never indicates in conversation or otherwise whether he believes in or practises religion. The youngest girl likes him, and the liking grows into love, and she is deeply pained when he fences with every indirect attempt to ascertain whether he is a believer or a fashionable unbeliever. At last she refuses him, on his being forced to admit that he had never troubled about religion. The gentleman goes away crestfallen, but with an assurance that if he finds religion he may return. He is partly angry at his dismissal, but partly impressed with the deep religious earnestness of the young lady, which sets him thinking.

"It often ran in his mind that she had said she could expect no blessing with him; and that if she married him she should think she had renounced God, and declared war against heaven; so that, to be sure, 'I am a dreadful fellow,' says he, 'that she dares not take me, lest she should appear to be a confederate with one of God's enemies.'"

Not long afterwards, while walking over his large estate, the gentleman lost his way in the darkness, and came to the door of a poor labouring man. He heard a noise "and stepping up close to the door, he perceived that the poor, good old man was praying to God with his family. As he said afterwards, his heart sprung in his breast for joy at the occasion, and he listened eagerly to hear what he said. The poor man was, it seems, giving God thanks for his condition, and that of his family, which he did with great affection: repeating how comfortably they lived; how plentifully they were provided for; how God had distinguished them in His goodness; that they were alive, when others were snatched away by diseases and disasters; in health, when others languished with pain and sickness; had food, when others were in want; at liberty, when others were in prison; were clothed and covered, when others were naked and without habitation: concluding with admiring and adoring the wonders of God's Providence and mercy to them who had deserved nothing."

"Why, he might have been one of our Primitive village locals," said Delia.

"Yes, and as a matter of fact, the gentleman was so struck with the joyful thankfulness the labourer got out of his religion, that after he had walked away a little distance, 'I'll go back,' says he, 'and poor William (for he knew his name), he shall teach me to be a Christian, for I am sure I know nothing of it yet.'"

And so William does teach him, his master bidding him, "William, be plain, and speak freely. Do not 'Worship' me and 'sir' me now; talk to me as if I were your neighbour or comrade. These are not things to talk of with cringes and bows. I am a wretched, contemptible, poor, rich man; thou art a poor, rich, happy Christian."

The squire has to confess that there is not a Bible in the manor house. So William lends him one, and is commissioned to buy him one from the market town. Of course, the gentleman returns to his lady, who marries him, and they live happy ever after; William being promoted to an honourable position on the estate. And this story is by the author of "Robinson Crusoe." The eldest sister, I should say, because she will make no inquiry as to the religion of her lover, marries a Roman Catholic unawares, and is very unhappy, for the children are brought up in the father's religion.

"And about the servants?" Delia inquires.

"The married sisters have conversations with a religious aunt on the subject, comparing notes as to their servants. The aunt sums up the result in the opinion that 'a girl may be a good servant, who is not a good Christian; but I must acknowledge it is very seldom that it proves so; but when a good servant is a good Christian too, such a one is ten times the more valuable for a servant, as well as for her religion.' It is agreed that where the mistress and master are not themselves religious, they can scarcely expect the servant to be so. A good mistress helps to make a good servant. The aunt is strong on mistresses being honest with each other, and giving 'fair, bold, and just characters of them, and if it once came to be the custom or general usage among mistresses, servants would quickly carry it after another manner; at least, they would take care to part upon as good terms as they could with their mistresses.'"

Delia clapped her hands, and said, "Well done, Daniel Defoe! I shall certainly read your book. But why didn't you tell me before you had such useful books among this lot of dry-looking things?"

"My dear, you should judge books from the inside rather than from the outside. Now here is another book with a long title—"

But Delia was gone, intent on preparations for dinner. However, there's no reason why I should not dip into George Wither's "Hallelujah," picked up for sixpence one day on a stall in Farringdon Road. It is an 1857 reprint, in a "Library of Old Authors," of a book that appeared in 1641. Here is the original title, printed in facsimile: "Hallelujah, or Britan's Second Remembrancer; bringing to Remembrance (in praisefull and penitential Hymns, Spirituell Songs, and Morall-Odes), Meditations, advancing the Glory of God, in the Practise of Pietie and Vertue; and applied to easie Tunes, to be sung in Families, etc. Composed in a Three-fold Volume by George Wither. The first contains Hymns Occasionall. The second, Hymns Temporary. The third, Hymns Personall. That all Persons, according to their Degrees and Qualities, may at all times, and upon all eminent Occasions, be remembered to praise GOD; and to be mindfull of their Duties.

One woe is past, the second, passing on;
Beware the third, if this, in vain be gone."

A frontispiece of the author in his 21st year, shows us a jolly-looking Cavalier, with a beautiful broad lace ruffle that will enchant Delia when I show it her, and a handsome doublet apparently of velvet and ermine. A sash crosses the doublet from the shoulder, and the left hand rests on the heavy hilt of a sword. Around the portrait runs the punning motto: "I grow and Wither both together." When the Civil War broke out the gallant George, who had fought in the war against the Scots, sold his estate and raised a troop of horse for the Parliament. The "Remembrancer" shows that he had little in common with the ribald Cavaliers, whose company and whose cause he deserted. He combined the Cavalier love of poetry with the piety of the Puritan. In the "Hallelujah," his lyrical devotion pours itself out on every incident and occasion of life, often with results that provoke smiles. Each "hymn" has prefixed to it a quaint explanation. Here, for instance, is a hymn to be sung "When we put off our apparel," and one on "Sheep-shearing," in order to improve the occasions.

I really must read to Delia the verses from—

A ROCKING HYMN.

Nurses usually sing their children asleep, and, through want of pertinent matter, they oft make use of unprofitable, if not worse, songs. This was, therefore, prepared that it might help acquaint them and their nurse children with the loving care and kindness of their Heavenly Father.

Sweet baby, sleep, what ails my dear;
What ails my darling thus to cry?
Be still, my child, and lend thine ear,
To hear me sing thy lullaby.
My pretty lamb, forbear to weep;
Be still, my babe; sweet baby, sleep.

When God with us was dwelling here,
 In little babes He took delight ;
 Such innocents as thou, my dear,
 Are ever precious in His sight.
 Sweet baby, then forbear to weep ;
 Be still, my babe ; sweet baby, sleep.

Within a manger lodged thy Lord !
 Where oxen lay and asses fed ;
 Warm rooms we do to thee afford,
 An easy cradle or a bed.
 Sweet baby, then forbear to weep ;
 Be still, my babe ; sweet baby, sleep.

Is not that really charming? But here is a verse of a hymn from the "Hymns Personall" that falls in well with the closing part of "Religious Courtship":—

FOR A MASTER OR MISTRESS.

It is a great happiness to have good servants to ease our labours ; we are hereby, therefore, put in remembrance to be thankful for that blessing when we have it, and how to behave ourselves toward our servants. If a woman sing it, let her change the word master into mistress.

Sing this as the 100th Psalm.
 In that a master I was made,
 God's favour doth to me appear,
 And sure this grace I never had,
 Injuringly to domineer ;
 But rather that with better ease
 I might my calling undergo,
 And thankfully Him seek to please
 By whom I am befriended so.

A couple of hymns illustrate Wither's anxiety to leave no possible occasion unprovided for. I quote a specimen from each:—

FOR A WIDOWER OR A WIDOW DEPRIVED OF A LOVING YOKE-FELLOW.

That such as be deprived of their most dear companions may not be swallowed up in excessive grief, and so forget their Christian hopes and duties, this Hymn teacheth a moderate expressing of their natural passions, and remembers them of things not to be forgotten in their sorrow.

Sing this as "I loved thee once."

The voice which I did more esteem
 Than music in her sweetest key,
 Those eyes which unto me did seem
 More comfortable than the day ;
 Those now by me, as they have been,
 Shall never more be heard or seen ;
 But what I once enjoy'd in them
 Shall seem hereafter as a dream.

The next is—

FOR A WIDOWER OR A WIDOW DELIVERED FROM A TROUBLESOME YOKE-FELLOW.

Because deliverance from a troublesome yoke-fellow is a benefit neither to be despised or indiscreetly rejoiced in, this Hymn teacheth with what moderation, with what tenderness of heart, and with what desire we should be affected in such cases.

Sing this as the Lamentation.
 Unto the soul departed, Lord !
 Although it often hath transgress'd,
 I hope Thy mercy doth afford
 Well-being in a place of rest.
 And for each wrong sustained by me,
 Whilst in the flesh it did remain,
 As also for my wrongs to Thee,
 I beg Thy pardon to obtain.
 And that I may conclude my race
 With less offence and more content,
 Vouchsafe me Thy assisting grace,
 Ensuing errors to prevent.
 And if Thy providence allows
 Another helper unto me,
 Lord ! keep us faithful in our vows
 Both to each other and to Thee.

Delia enters as I am reading this aloud, to tell me to come down to dinner.

"What a horrid man!" she says. But when, after dinner, I read to her the Rocking Hymn, she says enthusiastically, "It is the sweetest poetry I have heard for a long time. Who is it by?"

"By the author of the Widower's Prayer."

"O-o-oh!" is her sole comment.

Primitive Methodism and the Temperance Reformation in England.

II.—EARLY MODERATION SOCIETIES.

IT is difficult, if not impossible, to say with certainty when the first aggressive Temperance Society was formed in modern times. There appears to have been considerable thought and feeling in regard to the necessity of dealing with intemperance in some way wherever the influence of the Methodist revival was felt. It seems that the Americans were somewhat before the English in concerted action. The Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Churches of the state of Virginia in 1797 passed the following resolution—"Resolved that we, the ministers of this Conference, do pledge our honour, as well as our word, as Christians, not only to abandon entirely the use of ardent spirits ourselves, except as medicines, but also to use our influence to induce others to do the same." That was a vow of loyalty to Wesley's Society Rule issued more than half a century before.

The Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance was formed on the 5th of February, 1813. The aim of the promoters was to discountenance and suppress the too frequent use of ardent spirits, and its kindred vices of profaneness and gambling, and to promote temperance and general morality. But not much progress was made until after the establishment of the American Temperance Society towards the close of 1825. A general interest in the work became manifest during 1826, and so rapid was the progress that in three years over 1,000 societies had been created, 100,000 pledges taken, 1,200 drunkards reclaimed, 50 distilleries stopped, and 400 merchants had given up the traffic. The first Temperance Society in the United Kingdom was formed at New Ross, County of Wexford, Ireland, on August 20th, 1829, chiefly through the efforts of the Rev. G. W. Carr, whose thoughts had been turned to the subject by a letter which Professor Edgar had printed in the News-Letter, on August 14th. (The editor of the Belfast Guardian refused to print the letter, assigning as his reason that he thought the writer demented.) Dr. John Edgar, of the Irish Presbyterian Church, and Professor of Theology, threw himself into the work in Belfast. He began his crusade by opening his parlour window and pouring into the court below the remaining portion of a gallon of whisky which had been purchased some time before for home consumption. The movement spread, and adherents multiplied beyond the most sanguine expectations. One of the earliest friends of the cause in Ireland when it developed into a total abstinence movement was the late Mr. Alexander Riddell, an energetic and much-loved member and official of our Melbourne Street Church, Belfast. The Alliance News of August 16th, 1866, referring to his death, said: "Truly we may say that a great man has fallen asleep, and we can scarcely realise what a loss our cause has sustained. He was one of the oldest and most consistent members of the Temperance Society, a thorough abstainer, and a warm and devoted advocate of legislative prohibition. Upwards of thirty years ago he joined with others in forming the Belfast Total Abstinence Society, and continued to the last its most prominent supporter. He aided in establishing the Irish Temperance League, and was always considered one of its best members, and last year he was elected High Chief Ruler of the Rechabites. Thus he occupied a most important position in our movement. He had also been for years the leading member in Belfast of the Primitive Methodist Church, a church that more than any other stands by our principles, and which by his death has sustained an almost irreparable loss. He was a public benefactor with a heart large enough to embrace the world. He yearned and prayed while he wrought for the good of mankind."

While the friends of sobriety were on the move in Ireland, Mr. John Dunlop, of Greenock, was calling public attention to the extent and danger of intemperance north of the Tweed, and Scotland took up the question with some vigour. A society was originated at Maryhill, near Glasgow, on October 1st, 1829, by two benevolent ladies, Miss Graham and Miss Allan, who had been moved to take up the work by Mr. Dunlop. Glasgow, Greenock, and numerous other places hoisted the temperance standard, and many gathered round it.

The first society in England was established at Bradford, Yorkshire, on February 2nd, 1830, by Mr. Henry Forbes, a manufacturer in the town, who had been converted to temperance at a meeting in Glasgow some months before. Nine persons took the moderation pledge and became members of the society. The same year societies sprang up at Warrington, Manchester, Salford, Leeds, London, Liverpool, and many other places, and before the year closed, 300,000 tracts had been distributed, and 10,000 members enrolled. These societies were not based on total abstinence, but on abstinence from spirituous liquors, except as medicines. There was no total abstinence society up to this date.

We have reason to believe that the late Hugh Bourne, one of the founders of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, introduced the question to the Conference of 1831, and spoke of its bearing on the economic, social, and moral life of the people; but with what result we have not been able to ascertain. It was a bold thing, and probably a unique thing, to do at that time, and indicates that the young denomination was awake to the evils of intemperance.

Preston and Moderation.

Preston, Lancashire, has been called the birth-place of the modern temperance movement. That is true in an important sense; for while there were several societies before the Preston Society was formed, it is generally admitted by those who have carefully examined the subject that the honour of placing the temperance movement on a sound and permanent basis belongs to "Proud Preston." We shall see that the Preston Society at the beginning was not at all in advance of societies already in existence in other parts of England, in Ireland, in Scotland, and in America. The first attempt at a temperance organisation in Preston was made on New Year's day, 1832, in connection with Mr. Joseph Livesey's Adult Sunday School, but it was absorbed by the Preston Temperance Society which was formed on March 22nd, 1832. The pledge which the members signed was—"We do voluntarily agree that we will totally abstain from all ardent spirits ourselves, and will not give or offer them to others, except as medicines; and if we use other liquors it shall be with great moderation, and will endeavour to discountenance the causes and practices of intemperance." A committee was appointed and held its first meeting on April 13th. We have copied the following from the old minute book which we have been permitted to examine—"That a public meeting of the society be held in the large schoolroom, Lord Street, on Friday evening next, to commence at half-past seven o'clock, and that the Rev. Mr. Bastow be requested to conduct the meeting."

"That a second meeting be held on Thursday, the 3rd of May, at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, and that notice of the same be given at the conclusion of the meeting by Rev. Mr. Bastow."

The Rev. Mr. Bastow who was appointed to conduct the first public meeting of the Society was the Rev. James Austin Bastow, Primitive Methodist minister. Mr. Bastow was a scholarly man, and wrote one of the best Biblical Dictionaries ever published. While stationed at Preston he went to Wigan and preached in the open-air, and was put into jail. He had for a cell-companion an Irishman, who asked him why he had been locked up. Mr. Bastow answered, "For preaching the Gospel, sir. And pray, why have they brought you here?" The Irishman replied, "For not practising the Gospel." He died at Southport, April 7th, 1894, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and the sixty-second of his ministry.

The second public meeting was held as per minute quoted in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Lawson Street, Preston, and is memorable in the annals of temperance. Mr. James Teare, who was present, thus speaks of it:—"It was crowded to overflowing in every part, and many went away that could not find admittance. Moses Holden, Esq., was voted to the chair, who opened the meeting by a very powerful address on the evils of intemperance and the benefits of sobriety. . . Afterwards, the chairman called upon James Teare to address the meeting, which he did for about half an hour. In the course of his address he attacked the beer-shops and beer-house system, and the wickedness of opening such vile and wretched establishments in a Christian country."

The late George Toulmin, Esq., J.P., the proprietor of the Preston Guardian, was at the meeting, and afterwards wrote—"At that meeting both Mr. Livesey and Mr. Swindlehurst spoke, Mr. Livesey at considerable length; and that speech, in my opinion, was the real commencement of the total abstinence movement. Mr. Livesey said that in canvassing for signatures they were frequently met with the remark, that as they were calling upon people to give up the use of ardent spirits, they ought to supply them with a substitute, and the best thing they could do to wean the working-men off their use and keep them from the public-houses and beer-shops, would be to supply them with a recipe for making good home-brewed beer. Mr. Livesey went on to say that was not possible for them consistently to do; that their pledge required them to discountenance the causes and practices of intemperance; that beer drinking was the greatest cause of drunkenness in Lancashire; for working-men in these districts got drunk, not with gin, or rum, or brandy, but with ale; that the article which intoxicated was the same in each, and the form in which it was usually drunk depended chiefly upon the liking of individuals, or their ability to purchase the cheaper or the dearer liquors; and he instanced his own abstinence from all intoxicating liquors of every kind, etc. We cannot find any record of beer-shops and beer-drinking being publicly condemned, and total abstinence being publicly commended prior to this meeting; therefore we endorse the opinion of Mr. Toulmin, that this meeting, especially the speech of Mr. Livesey, "was the real commencement of the total abstinence movement." This infant cause, which was probably first commended to the public in one of our chapels, was to a considerable extent cradled and nursed in our chapels and schoolrooms. Mr. Thomas Whittaker, J.P., of Scarborough, who signed the pledge in March, 1835, and was set apart as agent in September of the same year, (probably the first man wholly set apart for temperance work), told our Conference in 1877 that in his early career, when friends were few, and places in which to hold meetings were difficult to obtain, the Primitives generally placed their chapels and schools at his disposal, and that while some Christian people sneered, and many more looked coldly on, they manifested a sympathy and gave co-operation to a wonderful extent, considering the public prejudice against the movement."

Mr. Dearden, in his "History of Teetotalism," says:—"To prevent young people of both sexes from going to public-houses and beer-shops, tea-parties were encouraged. The first tea party on a large scale held at Preston, was on Wednesday, July 11, 1832." The late Rev. Samuel Smith, Primitive Methodist minister, was one of the speakers at the public meeting which followed the tea, and thus refers to it in his private journal:—"I attended the first tea party of the Temperance Society—beautiful sight: 574 sat down to tea in the Corn Exchange; pleasure beamed on every face; all sects united, and seemed determined to put down drunkenness. Mr. Livesey, myself, and several working men of Preston, spoke boldly and to the point." The next day the first open-air meeting was held on the Moor, and continued for hours. We quote Mr. Smith's journal again. "Field meeting of the Temperance Society held on the Moor; the object was to catch some race-going drunkard, and, if possible, to reclaim him from drink and the immorality of the racecourse. These objects were clearly kept in view by every speaker. Myself, Mr. Livesey, Mr. Teare, etc., etc., spoke freely on the two objects of the meeting." The Rev. S. Smith was a member of the first committee, and one of the first, if not the first minister of the Gospel in England, who signed the total abstinence pledge, and publicly advocated its principles, and to the end of his life was an earnest and consistent temperance reformer. He died at Stockport, January 11th, 1877, full of years and full of honour. It is evident from the forementioned facts, that the Primitives were to the fore in the very earliest stages of the Preston Temperance movement, and in this respect they were true to the traditions of John Wesley in his antagonism to the use of spirituous liquors as beverages.

JAMES TRAVIS.

Men Worth Remembering.

II.—REV. WILLIAM JEFFERSON.

BY REV. J. WENN.

N seeking to recall to the recollection of those who knew him, and to present to those who did not some faint picture of this remarkable man, is the object of this paper. The material to hand for this purpose comes partly from the sources named in the article on Rev. W. Carthy; but chiefly from the son (Rev. N. Jefferson), Revs. W. R. Widowson and T. H. Richards. My friend Mr. Richards, will expect me to say, however, that the only aid I have received from him has come through Mr. N. Jefferson, and consists of a cutting from the "Primitive Methodist." This contains an "In Memoriam" article so appreciative and so just, that it has been of considerable service to me in this task.

In the month of March, 1862, five months after we entered the Nottingham District, I first saw William Jefferson. The Nottingham District Ministers' Association held its half-yearly sessions in that month in Hockley Chapel, Nottingham Second Station. I went and met on the Nottingham railway platform the late Dr. S. Antliff. With him I walked to Hockley Chapel. The first person we saw after entering the schoolroom was the late Rev. W. Watts, (Dr. Watts, as he was familiarly called). Mr. Antliff—for he was not

Dr. then—shook hands with the slim, mercurial-looking old man, who never seemed to stand still upon his feet but kept swaying or rocking from side to side as if he stood upon "a restless rolling stone." "Well, Mr. Watts; how did you come?" "Oh, I just ran over." (Voice, deep baritone, which surprised me). "But you don't mean to say that you have walked the distance?" "Yes; the train is late, and it is a long way round by Syston, so I got an early breakfast, and came on." The "run over" from Melton Mowbray, where Mr. Watts was then stationed, was about twenty miles! But Primitive Methodist ministers were travelling preachers in those days!

Next to Mr. Watts sat Jefferson. He smiled as he caught sight of us. I remember that smile well because it contrasted so strikingly with another which, at the public meeting the following evening, I was doomed to see occasionally for a couple of hours. This smiling brother sat on the platform and smiled at every person that came into the meeting, and at the back-parts of every one who went out. Occasionally he raised his head and smiled at the front of the gallery, then higher, and smiled at the people who sat on the gallery; highest, and smiled at the ceiling of the chapel. The smile appeared to be fixed, permanent. Nothing kindled or extinguished it. Like the sun, which shines impartially on barren sand and fruitful field, this smile beamed steadily on through grave and gay. Wotton says that; "No man marks the narrow space

'twixt a prison and a smile;" but he had not seen this minister, or he would have altered his opinion. As I sat in the body of the chapel and sunned myself now and again in that smile, I remembered that Shakespeare had made somebody tell us that a man "may smile and smile, and be a villain." But I hoped then, and know now that behind that beaming face there lay a heart as good and as honest as Christian hearts ordinarily are. In the case of Jefferson, on the other hand, I saw the smile kindle, expand, gleam, and die down into an expression of serious cheerfulness. Total stranger as I was to him—and perhaps all the more readily on that account—he rose, grasped my hand, and threw out another, so heart-warming and heart-winning a smile as placed me en rapport with him in a moment.

That was,—ah, me!—thirty-seven years ago nearly. In that space of time one's memory gets sadly out of repair. Hence, I should not have been able to recall with any degree of vividness the features of my beloved friend, but for a "photo" kindly sent me by his son. Aided by this, I will first endeavour to depict in some faint way the kind of man he outwardly was. In stature, about the middle height and in the later years of his life inclining to corpulency. In dress, unclerical and rather careless. On the day I first saw him he wore a rusty black frock-coat, an open vest, and grey pantaloons. The neck-tie was a compromise between the present fashionable dog-collar and the unstarched wisp of linen which used then to encircle the elderly ministerial throat. Face, not handsome in form, but beautiful in expression. It was a speaking, mobile face, capable of reflecting the finest shades of feeling. Two deep lines, one on either side the nose, ran from a point a little below the inner corners of the eyes down to the jaws, diverging as they descended like a pair of half-opened joiner's compasses. Head, massive, with perceptive and reflective organs pretty evenly balanced. Hair, silken in texture, scanty in front, and rather long behind—the hair of an artist. The eyes generally beamed forth a mild light, but occasionally shot out lightnings. For when those grey orbs dilated to their utmost, slander slunk abashed, and hypocrisy ashamed, from their convicting and confounding stare!

I thought it best to begin in the middle of my subject and so introduce Mr. Jefferson to my readers as he was when introduced to me. We must now retrace our steps to the point where our subject commenced his life's journey.

The infant, named William Jefferson, was born in Cowper Square, Blyth, on April 17th, 1806. This event occurred at a time when, owing to Continental wars and other (home-bred) causes, the conditions of labour were at their worst. In that very year my own father, then a boy of seven years of age, was eating black rye bread as wheaten was too dear for poor people to buy. One writer observes of this period: "You have to admit that the working body of this rich English nation has sunk, or is fast sinking into a state to which, all sides of it considered, there was literally never any parallel." And of the next decade or two the same writer remarks: "Out of twenty millions of persons—the number in England and Wales at that date—no fewer than two millions sit idly in workhouses, or have outdoor relief flung to them over the wall." Labour, clearly, had reached its nadir. Hence, the early years of this miner's child could not but be hard. "He completed (!) his education when he reached his ninth birthday," we are told; and was then taken down into the coalpit. Remaining there for sixteen hours at a stretch, he saw daylight in the winter season only on Sundays. His feet, immersed in cold water most of the day—for modern mines are models of comfort compared with those of that day—were chilblained to such a degree that his mother had to dress them every night on his return home. This operation was so painful that, though overdone with weariness, the poor child often cried himself to sleep under it. In speaking to me of this period of his life, Mr. Jefferson said that he was occasionally so overpowered with sleep that, though ravenously hungry, he would roll off his stool at supper into a slumber so profound as to be scarcely distinguishable from its twin-brother, death. For to wake him was an impossibility, and he had to be laid on his bed unwashed and undressed to sleep on for three or four short hours.

But labour's darkest hour was that which immediately preceded the dawn. For just then, when poor little Willie Jefferson was crying himself to sleep with pain, or falling off his stool at supper with his mouth full of unmasticated food, the long, dreary night of serfdom, suppression, and oppression was ending, and the day of freedom and of equal opportunity for all was about to burst upon the world. There were many signs of its approach. Forces,—angelic and demonic, a combination sure to operate in all revolutions—were taking the field. The "dreadful note of preparation" none could mistake. For, on the one hand the awful echoes of the French Revolution had not died away before those of "Lyons Revolutions," "Warsaw Insurrections," "Paris Barricades," "Peterloo Massacres," and Luddite outbreaks, reverberated through the land and shook society to its base. Then, on the other hand, there was Methodism—a great social as well as moral force—percolating, more or less, through every stratum of society; there was sacred and secular education lighting its lamp and holding it up in order both to reveal and banish the almost brutal ignorance of the poorer classes. There was the Reform Movement, "Factory and Agricultural inquiries;" "Revenue returns;" and "Labour Committees." All these conflicting and clashing movements showed that Labour was struggling in the throes of a new birth to a brighter lot and a richer reward.

But our little Willie was not to share that ameliorated condition of things; at all events not as a miner. Mining, like every other honest calling honestly pursued, is a worthy one. But "there are diversities of gifts," and those with which this youth was endowed, marked him out for a different, if not a higher sphere. Besides, if all were miners, where were the ministers? For the Primitive Methodist ministry, at all events, numbers in its ranks not a few bright and effective preachers who were "brought up from the horrible pit" in more senses than one.

There was, it appears, a strain of natural nobleness in the Jefferson family. Two of William's brothers lost their lives in attempting to save those of others. And if William escaped that fate, yet, like a lever, he raised others without (socially) exalting himself. He might both have raised and enriched himself. For there is a moral certainty that had he not forsaken the mine for the ministry, he would have done it for music. For William was a born musician. He early learned to play on the violin and became so efficient an executant thereon, that his services were in great request at all surrounding convivial gatherings. At this period of his life, I picture William to myself as a youth so full of fun and frolic that even the heavy and protracted labours of the mine could not make a "dull boy" of him. As a musician, possibly also as a singer, for he excelled both vocally and instrumentally, he attracted the notice of a professor of music, a gentleman who generously offered to defray the expense of a thorough musical education for him. But, providentially, William was, just then, brought under religious impressions, and these inclined him in another direction. Had he chosen the musical profession, that might have brought him pounds where the ministry only afforded him pence; but he was too high-souled and unworldly to allow gain even a feather's weight among the considerations which finally decided him. Still, music had a wonderful charm for him to the last: but it had to be good music. Defects in "time," "expression," and other technicalities of the art by choirs caused his tuneful nature to suffer a slow martyrdom. Jefferson had the same difficulty with his choirs that Juan experienced with Senora Hilda—he could not make them understand that the music must be in them before it could be put into their instruments. Jefferson was so enamoured of good music that if anything could have induced him to neglect his work, it would have been the "concord of sweet sounds." Clutching my arm one evening as we were passing through a marketplace, where a band was playing, on our way to a missionary meeting, he exclaimed: "Stay; listen to that!" We did stay till I began to be apprehensive that we should be late for the meeting. I expressed my fear to him. "Oh," he replied, "wait till this charming piece is finished; for we are like the man that was going to be hung; they can't begin till we get there."

Mr. Jefferson was, what may without offence be termed, a sacred ballad maker. Several of his effusions appeared on the "plans" of his stations, and were sung by the people with effect. But the most popular and effective of these was that styled the "Lion of Judah," which is numbered thirty-eight in the new Mission Hymnal. As the history of this piece is peculiar, I may, perhaps, be permitted—though it appeared in print a few years ago—to reproduce it here in my friend, Rev. W. R. Widdowson's words. "At the time he wrote it, Jefferson was travelling at Nottingham, with Thomas Morgan for superintendent. The circuit was experiencing a great revival of religion. But just then the Chartist movement was captivating the attention of the Nottingham people. Crowds of them walked in procession through the streets singing a spirited ballad in praise of Feargus O'Connor. Morgan and Jefferson were concerned for their young converts; fearing lest they should be swept by the Chartist current into that political vortex and so be (religiously) lost. Filled with this apprehension, Jefferson cast about in his mind how he might seize and turn the weapon of the enemy against that enemy's self. This was accomplished by composing the hymn above mentioned, and setting it to the Chartist tune. The hymn was printed on the circuit plan, caught up by our people, who, as they swept through the streets in procession singing it, were taken for Chartists. On this account, crowds, who otherwise would not have budged a yard, turned into the streets, followed the procession, and heard words uttered which led to the conversion of some of them."

Young Jefferson joined our Blyth choir, and was thus brought under the influence of the Gospel. But his conversion "came not with observation." It was neither sudden nor startling. This will surprise no one who knows that the emotional in him was overlorded by reason and conscience. His mind gradually opened to the Light, and his heart to the Love of his Saviour, as the flower slowly unfolds its petals to the warm wooing of the sun. But if his friends did not perceive when and whence the change in him came, they soon "heard the sound thereof." For the young disciple began to pray in public; became a diligent student of the Bible and other good books; and a zealous worker. He filled successively the office of Sunday School teacher, Sunday School superintendent, and class-leader. "Purchasing to himself a good degree" in these posts, he was proposed and accepted for the plan. In the pulpit, as at the desk and in the class-room, his "profiting appeared to all;" so that the fame of him reached the ears of the late Rev. Geo. Herod, then stationed at North Shields. Now Geo. Herod was a man of keen perceptions, and once put upon the trail of anything good or bad, never lost the scent. So, on his removal to Leicester, and finding that this circuit needed an additional minister, Mr. Herod proposed to "call out" young Jefferson. The circuit agreed to the proposal; the call was given, and after some prayerful thought—for Jefferson did then and all through his life hold his own great abilities at a discount—accepted. Hence, it was at Leicester, and (apparently) in the year 1834, that Mr. Jefferson commenced his regular ministry.

And now having seen Mr. Jefferson introduced to the sphere in which his after life and labours were to be spent, it will be in place to canvas his qualifications for it.

As to his piety—his moral and spiritual fitness—there never was the slightest doubt. Here are one or two testimonies from competent persons on this head. "His moral character was never tarnished; never suspected. He walked circumspectly without seeming to do so. He was simple, truthful, and unpretending. He never affected superior sanctity; but was never otherwise than sincerely and honestly religious." "As a Christian man and minister, he exhibited an utter absence of anything mean, sordid, or selfish; he had a large heart as well as a capacious mind,—a heart full of kindness and sympathy. He was the soul of honour." No marvel that he was esteemed, loved, and trusted by his brethren.

Physically, the gifts of an orator were either denied to Mr. Jefferson, or, except in brief seasons of exceptional health, were so fettered by constitutional drawbacks as to render their free exercise an impossibility. Had he possessed the fine physique and splendid health of, say, Dr. Robert Newton, he might have equalled Newton in oratory, and surpassed him in depth of thought and wealth of illustration. But Jefferson was a man of moods. He often occupied either the garret or the cellar, and but rarely the middle rooms of feeling. He experienced, we are informed, "long seasons of depression;" apparently created, or at least aggravated, by a sluggish liver. Considering this fact, it seems marvellous how he could assume a cheerfulness he did not feel. But as poets "learn in suffering what they teach in song," so preachers would fail in sympathy with the afflictions and temptations of others, were they not afflicted and tempted themselves. Had Jefferson, e.g., been entirely free from physical infirmity and other humiliations, it is doubtful if he could or would have become the "son of consolation" to the sick and sorrowful that we know he was. Whether our subject in his earlier preaching days attempted the rôle of the orator, I do not know. But if he did, he had abandoned it ere I knew him, and had sunk or risen, which the reader pleases, into that of teacher. And as a teacher, in depth of thought, lucidity of expression, and beauty of illustration, he may have had equals, but few, if any, superiors.

In intellect, our subject was a giant. "His mind was of kingly cast." Behind "that lofty and capacious brow" there lay endowments large and rare. As I once heard him put it, his "upper rooms were spacious enough if only they had been more suitably furnished." This lack of "furniture;" in other words, an early education, he constantly deplored. But we had no colleges in those days, and what was perhaps more unfortunate even than that, young preachers had, as a rule, no private preceptors. They had to "make their own way," as the phrase ran then, both educationally and ministerially—or retire. They did moderately well, perhaps; but who shall deny that with some training for their work, they might not have conserved their health, prolonged their lives, and done more credit to themselves and the Connexion had they possessed the scholastic advantages which modern candidates for the ministry enjoy. I suppose that the prejudice against "college-bred men" is dying out. Prejudice, however, is scarcely the fit word by which to express the conclusion arrived at by some thoughtful men after fair comparison between those who had and those who had not the advantage of a collegiate course. In some minds the feeling is that as tall men can reach higher than short ones, so a trained should be a more effective than an untrained, or self-trained minister. No one can reasonably complain of that. But it is well to bear in mind that if, in some cases, reasonable expectations have been disappointed, that is to be attributed, perhaps, not to the college, but to the collegian. Let us put the saddle on the right horse. Real polish is brought out of the wood, and not brought to and laid on it. And just as some kinds of wood, (willow, e.g.) are incapable of real polish, so the mental and moral fibres of some students are too soft and coarse for any tutor to do justice to. It is by drawing comparisons between such ministers as Jefferson, who had no education except what he picked up, and those whose sound elementary schooling has been supplemented by a college course, that unfair deductions have been made. Comparisons, to be just, should be instituted between average men. Jefferson was not an average man, but one far above the average; and hence should not be regarded as a standard below which none should fall. But if, notwithstanding all that can be said in favour of college training, the ghosts of dead languages do still "squeak and gibber" in dark corners of the land, I commend to the alarmed the following anecdote: Robert Hall was once discussing a point in theology with a ministerial brother, and in support of his view quoted a New Testament text in Greek. "I thank God," exclaimed the other, "that I never learned Greek." "What," rejoined Hall, "thank God for your ignorance?" "Yes, I do." "Well, then, I must say that you have a great deal to be thankful for!"

It has been said that Jefferson was far above the average man in intellect. This, in the judgment of all who knew him well, is true. And yet his best friends felt that he did not make the most of his great powers. "I suppose he did study and write, though I never saw him at it. He used to sit and think, and think as he walked to his appointments." Again; "with all his mental alertness there seemed, (I scarcely know how to express it), a constitutional sluggishness." So writes one who, perhaps more than any living man, was conversant with the habits of our subject. Certain it is that his great gifts had to be summoned forth to exercise—spurred, so to say, into action. But when the spur was applied, there was generally an instant response. It needed only that some one should say, "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson," and the strong man would arise, and do exploits!

Mr. Jefferson once underwent a phrenological examination. The result was shortly this. "Capable, intellectually, of excelling in any branch of study, especially that of theology; analytical powers so abnormally developed that he can not only split hairs, but split the splits." It was, doubtless, owing to this latter faculty that he would never quit a subject till he believed every one in his congregations understood it. Labouring a point once at Emley, where he was greatly beloved, and turning all its facets to the light of illustration after illustration, a woman in the congregation at length exclaimed, "Why, why, man; we understand it." "Very well, then," rejoined the preacher, "we will proceed."

Paradoxical as it may seem, Mr. Jefferson, as a preacher, was both popular and unpopular; popular with the good and thoughtful, unpopular with the other sort. Indeed, how could he be popular with the masses who studied matter more than manner, and conception rather than expression. Some one, the author of "Ecce Homo," perhaps, or it may be Goethe, has said: "The thing is to believe; what is believed is of quite secondary importance." Similarly, one has been often tempted to say, "The thing is to speak; to rattle along; to say something and keep on saying it as rapidly as possible; what is said is of but quite secondary concern." But Jefferson could not have done that if he would, nor would have done it if he could. For, as Mr. Richards justly observes, "he never strove after rhetorical embellishment, but trusted more to the truth itself than to the style of its dress; yet there was a grace and a beauty in many of his sermons that few could equal, and perhaps none surpass. The general tendency of his preaching was not so much to rouse the passions as to awaken and stimulate thought. He would frequently say: 'I care not to make people weep; my purpose is to make them think.' Good; but one can, nevertheless, conceive it possible that had the rich and beautiful thoughts which he threw out occasionally in such profusion naked, been suitably arrayed, they might not have been less acceptable to the more thoughtful of his hearers, and would certainly have been more appreciated by the rest. A nugget may intrinsically be worth much more than a sovereign, but not so much to a person who has neither time nor skill to mint it. Jefferson had some hearers, to be sure, who could do their own minting, and would walk miles to get the requisite gold. But these were comparatively few. Still, remembering that the "praise of some is dispraise," he had his reward in the veneration and love of "Babes," in the Saviour's sense of the word. When I was at Sheffield the first time, Mr. Jefferson came to preach some special sermons. He preached at Princes Street Chapel (given place now to Peter Street), in the morning of Sunday. A local preacher took his little boy to the service, and on leaving, the father asked, "How did you like Mr. Jefferson's sermon?" The child replied, "Sermon, father; Mr. Jefferson does not preach sermons, he only tells us things." On this coming to the ear of the preacher, he remarked, "that it was the finest compliment ever paid to him as a preacher."

Mr. Jefferson was a born preacher, I repeat. His alacrity in sermonising was surprising. Nor could he understand how it should be otherwise with any fairly well-read minister. To one who was revealing to him his difficulties (except in moments of inspiration) in this respect, and what a slave he was to the pen, the facile preacher remarked: "Nonsense; with the share of analytical faculty you possess, and your extensive reading; a pen, half a sheet of note paper, and half an hour of time, should be sufficient to draw up an outline which you could easily fill up in the pulpit as you proceeded." But Jefferson was there measuring the other's corn by his own bushel. As illustrative of the facility with which he prepared for even special services, a correspondent tells how he met with him one day in a train. He was going somewhere to open a chapel. "What's your subject?" "'Be opened;' and I am making the sermon as the train rattles along."

Only once was it my privilege to hear Mr. Jefferson preach a sermon. This was in the evening of the day on which I first saw him at Nottingham, as recorded above. His subject on that occasion was, "Reconciliation." The sermon was masterly in conception, and would have been better in enunciation than it was, had the preacher not been suffering from what was then called "pulpit fever." This fever was of the recurrent sort, and usually came on, so the preacher told us the following morning when replying to the discussion on his sermon, when he had to preach to a large or a select congregation. The only point in the sermon that I remember now was involved in a question which the preacher raised. "Does reconciliation mean the reconciling of man to God only; or of man to God, and of God to man?" Both, replied the preacher, and the proof of his affirmation on which he chiefly relied lay in the Intercessory office of Jesus Christ. If God, argued the preacher, be already reconciled to all men in Christ Jesus, whatever their attitude to Him, the necessity for that office totally disappears. The Fatherhood of God, pushed to that extreme, would, he thought, render much of the New Testament perplexing, if not misleading.

From Mr. Jefferson's cast of mind and style of preaching, it will doubtless be inferred that he was reverent in spirit, a lover of order, and that he shrank from anything savouring of the bizarre. This judgment would be just. He never lightly quoted Scripture, nor allowed it to be so quoted in his hearing without a corrective remark. Nor had he much opinion of thunder in a service which was not the evident result of lightning. Preaching once at B——, in the C—— Circuit, the people demonstrated their feelings rather noisily. The preacher cried, "Order, order," but his audience heard not; or, if they heard, did not heed. The noise continued and increased, and then the preacher stood and looked on, presently remarking, "It is the power of God!" Whether that was the power of God or not, this that I am about to speak of undoubtedly was. And it also reveals Jefferson's repugnance to oddities. He was stationed at L—— with two colleagues. These two had been holding a week's special services at R—— L——. But, as both had other and prior engagements for the Friday evening, they asked their superintendent to take that service. This he consented to do; so on the Thursday evening, in announcing Jefferson's service for the morrow, the preacher said: "I don't know what sort of a service you'll have; we'll call it a 'come and see' service." When they informed the superintendent of this, he glared at them in his mild, rebuking way, and said to the transgressor: "You are a nice fellow; you know I can't do anything of that sort." But he took the service, and his text was: "They said unto Him: Rabbi, where dwellest Thou? He saith unto them, Come and see." After descanting upon Christ having dwelt from all Eternity in the bosom of the Father, of His coming to dwell in flesh; of His death, resurrection, and ascension to the Father's right hand as our Mediator, he proceeded to speak of Him as dwelling in the heart of every true believer. Up to this point a gracious influence had pervaded the service, but the people were restrained and calm. But now a woman was heard to say in a quiet and subdued tone, "Bless the Lord; all pride and shame and fear are gone." The fire thus kindled in that woman's heart did not for some moments spread, but when those persons sitting near her realised that just there and then that woman had been emptied of self and sin and filled with the Spirit of Jesus, the flame caught on, and such an overwhelming sense of the Divine Presence was felt, that the whole place was in a blaze of glory. The preacher could not be heard; so he stopped speaking and began to sing, and in this way gradually reduced the congregation to a condition of quiet.

As a superintendent our subject shone less brilliantly than as a preacher. "The business part of circuit management had no attractions for him. What he did of it was simply what his sense of duty compelled him to. . . I have known others far inferior to him in most respects to surpass him in this." So writes one who knew him well, and in that judgment I fully concur. He was not an equal match for astute officials who had less of the harmlessness of the dove and more of the wisdom of the serpent than he possessed. Hence, he was sometimes imposed upon, and allowed a resolution to slip by without detecting its true character and tendency. In this connection, I picture him to myself in a certain Quarterly Meeting. An official there has a resolution to propose which seems on the face of it to embrace the whole circuit in its benevolent intention, but whose incidence in reality bears upon the fortunes of one church only. The resolution is proposed in terms of studied moderation and with an expression of countenance which could not be surpassed in disinterestedness. The mover, personally, is neutral in the matter, but as there is a feeling in the circuit generally for it, he shall vote in its favour. The resolution is put and carried, and the discovery soon afterwards made that the said "feeling" began and ended in a certain shop in B—— Street. Such things would grieve his sensitive spirit as not being according to "the simplicity of Christ." Whatever approached him, and was recognised as something that threatened to dim his eye, to soil his hand, or to twist his aim, was warned off by a look and gesture which spoke vastly louder than words.

On the whole, my feeling for, and judgment of my departed friend, may be appropriately and honestly summed up in the following beautiful lines, of which I regret that I have no metrical translation:—

"Te mihi junxerunt nivei sine crimine mores,
Simplicitasque sagax, ingenuusque pudor,
Et bene nota fides et candor frontis honestæ,
Et studia a studiis non aliena meis."

With a couple of obiter dicta this paper shall end.

Being appointed to a "round" of Missionary Services in the upper part of the county of D—— at a time when there were no railway facilities in that part of the country, and having to walk a good number of miles to the place, Mr. Jefferson arrived at his host's on the Saturday for dinner. The hostess had cooked a joint of mutton. The remains of this were brought on to the table cold for five successive days. On the seventh day it duly appeared again, and the preacher was requested, as usual, to ask a blessing. "No," said he, "I decline; I have blessed that mutton six times already, and that surely should be enough." The reply was, on the face of it, rude; but it was given with all that charm of manner for which our subject was remarkable, and so excited the risibilities of the lady that she burst into a hearty laugh, in which her visitor joined.

Mr. Jefferson joined to his more solid gifts a light and playful fancy. This often unexpectedly showed itself, and scintillated amid the prosy affairs of life.

He was a born raconteur. One story he used to tell of how the Tory Government of the day introduced an act making tobacco a government monopoly, and the consuming of it in some form or other obligatory upon all His Majesty's subjects. This story, set off by that inimitable action, and that expression of eye which accompanied its recital, was so irresistibly comic that one brother who was listening to it rolled off his chair in a fit of uncontrollable laughter.

Well do I remember the day (I was at Chesterfield at some special services) when the news of my friend's sudden and lamented death arrived there. He had, we learned, been resting on the couch after dinner, and appeared to his son, who was in the room, to be in communion with the unseen, when he rose, went into the yard, fell down and died. Accompanied by some attached Chesterfield friends of the deceased, I went to the funeral, which took place at Ripley, where he died. About twenty of his ministerial brethren came to pay their respects to departed worth at the grave-side; besides whom, there was a large number of officials and friends from every part of the "district." As I looked at the tear-dimmed eyes and quivering chins of scores of these, I said to myself, "Behold how they loved him!"

UNDER the shadow of Roseberry, sleepy little Newton reposes, unchanged and unchanging. It has apparently struck the happy balance in life of an all-round self-contentment. Its possessions and desires accord. It, too, had its famous spring, but, unlike its neighbour up the hill, its powers were used to prolong life and not destroy it. Agues, ophthalmias, and a variety of other diseases were cured by the use of its waters. England was once blessed with many such places, but they are now either dried up or have lost their virtue. They seem to have fled to Ireland and the Continent. If we could only bring back the days of ignorance, knavery, and monkery, we should doubtless see a return of the healing waters to the springs. Perhaps such things, also, have been jostled out of life by the multitude of clever doctors and patent medicines that are everywhere obtainable nowadays.

A short distance beyond Newton is Nunthorpe, (Nun-thorpe, the homestead or hamlet of the nuns). A small Cistercian nunnery once existed here, hence the name. Spite Hall, near Pinchingthorpe (the home of the Pincins, who long ago owned the estate) was built and so named as the result of a family feud. The name, let us hope, has now lost its sting, but it is still a warning to our poor, fretful nature. The satisfaction derived from retaliation is but another name for the deepening of the bitterness and misery of our hearts. How often, too, others, quite innocent, are sucked into the vortex created by hate and the desire to injure another! Two little Indian children quarrelled about a grasshopper; their mothers fought about it; then the fathers, and finally the two tribes to which they belonged. One of them was exterminated, and the other nearly so. Ah me! how many Spite Halls have we erected in life! If such a one still stands let us have sufficient grace of humility and nobleness of mind to remove and for ever bury the hideous thing out of sight.

What a glorious view it is to-day looking over the Stokesley plain! None of your pretty little mile-and-a-half bits of prospect, but one that is capacious, bountiful with its largess of miles of dark hills, quiet cornfields and meadows, sea, river, and busy towns. The eye travels over the great level land until the fields fade into little patches' and the black lines of the hedgerows almost touch each other. Out there, broken off from the main body of hills, and between them and the deep, Eston Hill and Marske Hill stand with a grim watchfulness as if on sentry duty, eternally gazing out over the wild North Sea for the foe that never comes. Exposed and storm-beaten, these northern outposts of the Cleveland Hills truly are, yet on their lower slopes they are not by any means lacking in homely spots of idyllic tenderness and grace. It is a bit of typical English scenery, peaceful homesteads and fertile lands sheltered and protected by the massive might of these immutable hills. What a beautiful analogue of human life! When our righteousness is as the great mountains for steadfastness, then shall our life be filled with peace and plenty. No evil can really injure us. Blessed, for ever, be the Word, and our heavenly Father who hath given it, which in clear unhesitating tones speaks this divine truth to all men.

"He that worketh righteousness shall never be moved."

"Righteousness tendeth to life."

"He that walketh righteously and speaketh up-rightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from looking upon evil; he shall dwell on high: his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks; his bread shall be given him; his water shall be sure. Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty; they shall behold a far-stretching land." Surely Isaiah had a similar landscape to this before him when he wrote these words. The rocks and hills shield the land; righteousness saves the man.

On that fine, "far-stretching" plain the Britons hunted, feasted, fought, and worshipped. What frightful scenes of battle and human sacrifices in the name of religion it must have witnessed. Old Time has, however, kindly and mercifully buried them, and allows us only a faint whisper now and then of those far away years. They lived on these hills in great numbers. The locality resembles a huge palimpsest—a twice written book—wherein the words of the first writing are dimly and confusedly traced under the more conspicuous and legible inscriptions of later times. Thinking of these things up in this silent spot with the noble expanse of sea and land before me has brought a wonderful feeling of repose. It scarcely seems possible that such a sense of tranquillity can be known in the eager, bustling life of towns. Those who are not able to retire for a time into the great solitudes and mountains of God are to be pitied and prayed for.

"I stand upon the mount of God,
With sunlight in my soul;
I hear the storms in vales beneath,
I hear the thunders roll.

But I am calm with Thee, my God,
Beneath these glorious skies;
And to the height on which I stand,
Nor storms, nor clouds can rise.

O this is life! O this is joy!
My God, to find Thee so!

Thy face to see, Thy voice to hear,
And all Thy love to know."

Dickens relates that the first and most abiding state of his mind upon seeing Niagara from below the Falls was one of absolute peace. It appeared strange to us at first that such an awful, tumultuous rush of water should awaken a feeling of this kind; but he explains it by reminding us that this stupendous manifestation of power at once made him conscious of the mightier power of God who directed it all. So amid the contrasting sights and sounds of nature, if right with God, we shall have tokens of peace. Mrs. Ormiston Chant tells how when she and others thought she was at the point of death, there came to her a glimpse of the other world, and she affirms that whatever else heaven may reveal to us she knows it to be a place of unspeakable peace. These moods must have some kinship with a better world, they are its faint reflection. And yet how many cry as Goethe cried,

"Peace, sweet peace, Come thou in my heart to reign," and vainly think to find it out of God.

Prayer is sometimes a very, very difficult matter, but up here it seems to come spontaneously. This is the altar of a great temple, and without uttering a word the soul is calmly conscious of the nearness of God,—not the nearness of pantheism, which really destroys both the soul and God, nor of a vague mysticism which is often little better than a weak and unscriptural sentimentalising about the divine—but as clear a conviction of the Holy Presence as had Moses when "The Lord passed by before him and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord, a God full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy and truth."

At this distance life in those plains seems to be a slow, easy, uneventful thing; but is it? The farmer is eternally on the rack about his stock and crops; now the weather is wrong; anon a swift and fatal disease breaks out among his sheep or cows; and finally the markets get ruinously low; indeed, it is a mystery how we manage to worry along and live decently. In all directions are to be seen the silent signs—no sound of their toil is heard up here—of man's struggle with nature. The, to us, confused drama of life is being played out under our eyes by the field labourer, road-mender, quarryman, miner, shepherd, navvy, sailor, ironworker, and a thousand and one other callings and crafts which a hungry humanity has invented to earn its bread and cheese. Life is emphatically not an easy, uneventful matter to these toiling myriads. Heavy work and poor pay, sickness, poverty, miserable homes, and the wretched follies of the working man in drinking and gambling beyond his strength and means—these inevitably end in discontent, remorse and despair. But what of the homes where plenty reigns? If the love of Christ is not there in some form or other, less said of them the better; they, too, have their skeleton in the cupboard. Truly God's creation is fair and beautiful to look upon here, but there is a dark and forbidding moral background. The trail of the serpent is everywhere.

"A worm is found in every rose,
Each drop of honey hides a sting."

The sight of Stokesley reminds me of a story an old Yorkshireite preacher once told. It had many embellishments, asides, and applications as he told it to a delighted audience. Here is the bare tale. Let us suppose the incident took place say one hundred years ago in order to avoid indignant repudiations. The devil, he said, opened out a special mission in Cleveland to recruit his wasted ranks, and having achieved a reasonable amount of success in various places, he came at last to Roseberry Topping, whereupon he wiped the perspiration from his grimy face, saying with an air of satisfaction, as he sat down and lit his pipe, "Ah sall nut trubble to gan te Stowsley, ez it's maan alriddy." This, kindly reader, is not told out of malice prepense, but simply, as Swedenborg used to say of what he saw and heard, "a true relation" of what the writer heard. We cannot boast at the present time, I'm afraid, of such a particular knowledge of Satan's goings forth as some of the old preachers displayed. It, no doubt, was all spoken and received in good faith. Perhaps he is driven further afield nowadays, or is more wily and secret in his movements, or it is just as probable we, like the Stokesley folk of bygone days, are so easily his that he gives us no trouble with grim wrestlings for our soul. Those realistic stories of the old preachers, begotten of their earnestness and faith, in spite of what appear to us as crudities, are parables containing precious kernels of truth did we but seek them out.

"We can gather honey from a nettle,
An' make a moral of the devil himself."

I cannot think, however, the Stokesley folk were so hopeless as our old friend described, for just about that time they produced a man of whom every Englishman ought to be proud, and no doubt will be when he hears the tale of his prowess. Boys especially, I think, will like to hear of him. He was a genuine old sea-dog, with the hot, salt blood of the Vikings racing through his veins, who must have loved fighting a Frenchman for its own dear sake as well as for the honour of the old country. Here is Ord's description of the fight:—

"Richard Hornby, of Stokesley, then master of the merchant-ship Isabella, of Sunderland, sailing for the Hague, with three smaller vessels in tow, was suddenly attacked when near his destination, by a large French privateer, which had lain among some Dutch fishing boats. The Isabella mounted four guns, two swivels, with five men and three boys; the De Brancas (Capt. André) had ten carriage guns, eight swivels, 300 small arms, and seventy-five men. Hornby, nothing daunted, hoisted the British flag—

'The flag that braved, a thousand years,
The battle and the breeze.'

and with his two swivel guns returned an answer of defiance. At two o'clock, when the action had lasted an hour, Captain André shouted in a menacing tone, 'You English dog, strike!' but the undaunted Hornby merely answered him by a challenge to come on board. The Frenchman took him at his word, and poured in twenty men, who made a fierce attack on the close quarters with hatchets and poleaxes, with which they had nearly cut their way in three places, but at length were repulsed, with heavy loss. Captain Hornby then seeing a number of Frenchmen crowding behind their mainmast, aimed a blunderbuss at them, which, containing twenty-four balls, burst in his hands and greatly bruised him; while the enemy, among whom he had made dreadful havoc, disengaged themselves from the Isabella, to which they had been lashed an hour and a quarter, and sheered off with precipitation. On this, the gallant Hornby fired his two starboard guns into the enemy's stern, which so enraged the French captain that he resumed the combat with great fury. By this time both vessels had driven so near the shore that immense crowds had assembled to witness the action. After a hot engagement of nearly two hours more, Captain André, who was not deficient in bravery, having disabled the Isabella by five terrible broadsides, once more summoned Hornby, with dreadful menaces, to strike. Hornby, whose brave 'heart of oak' was sound and vigorous as the timbers of his own ship, was not so easily daunted: 'Behold,' said he, addressing his comrades; 'behold the witnesses of your valour this day!' Thus encouraged, the English fought more desperately than ever, and at length forced the Frenchman to give way. Hornby now resolved on giving a parting salute; and this shot, fired into the stern of the De Brancas, reached the magazine, which blew up with a tremendous explosion, and the ship immediately foundered. Out of seventy-five men, thirty-six were killed or wounded in the action (which lasted seven hours), and all the rest, except three, perished in the deep."

The only criticism we have to pass upon this desperate battle is that the French must have been very poor shots, and the English very good ones; perhaps our countrymen, knowing their value, did not so recklessly expose themselves as did the enemy to them. It certainly behoved lion-hearted Hornby to preserve his men, for to every one of his, lads included, there were at least nine of the enemy. Who knows but what he might have been Nelson's equal in naval warfare if occasion had presented itself? Let not his name, however, at least, be forgotten by his native district.

PART II.

HE volume which Dr. Gregory has given to the public is not only interesting for what it contains, but for the rich mine of information which it suggests lies still in the Journals of Mr. Fowler; and it is difficult to repress a desire for a further instalment of the inner history of Methodism during the second quarter of this century. Much that Dr. Gregory quotes from the Journals is of value simply because it reveals the spirit which at that time was dominant in Methodism, and we frankly confess it was a spirit which does not command our admiration, and which we are thankful could not in this day exercise the power and influence it did then. Wesleyan Methodism has made great progress in the direction of greater liberty of thought and speech, and in the fuller recognition of the rights of the laity in ecclesiastical administration, and this progress may be regarded as prophetic of what the coming years will bring, and hasten on the closer co-operation of the several sections of Methodism, if not their organic unity.

In 1832, the Legislature of that time introduced a measure dealing with elementary education in Ireland. Ireland was then, as now, the difficulty of all Governments whatever the shade of their politics. This Bill was regarded as a necessary sequence to certain measures affecting the Roman Catholic population which had been passed previously. It provided for the support of secular instruction by the State, leaving the various religious communities to supply the religious element in accordance with their several creeds. In the Wes-

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for that year, in the "Christian Retrospect," there appeared three articles favourable to the Government measure. They did not in an unqualified way approve of the Bill and its provisions, but in the circumstances of the case simply deemed it better than the continuance of things as they were, and as they were likely to continue unless some such measure was adopted. The magazine was at the time under the editorial care of the Rev. Thomas Jackson, but the articles were from the pen of the Rev. Richard Watson. No objection was taken to these articles at the time of their publication, but an attack was made upon them in the Book Committee preparatory to Conference, and in the Conference itself. In his "Recollections" Mr. Jackson makes considerable reference to this question, and states that the severest things that were said fell from the lips of Dr. Bunting, who took the lead in the censures that were passed upon him; and in this he is sustained by what Mr. Fowler records in his Journal. Dr. Bunting's opposition was based upon the political character of the articles; but dealing as they did with proposed legislation, it is difficult to see how politics could be entirely avoided. It is true the Bill was distinctly in favour of denominational education, but it was not this so much that provoked the opposition as the privileges it gave to the Roman Catholics. The main principles of the Bill are in operation in this country at present, and with them we confess to little sympathy. But to object to the articles on the ground of their political complexion, and especially by Dr. Bunting, reveals one of the gravest defects of absolutism upon personal character—the refusal to others of a liberty we claim for ourselves. When Dr. Bunting had charge of the magazine he did not hesitate to introduce in the "Christian Retrospect," as Dr. Gregory points out, such subjects as, "The Re-opening of Parliament," "The Way of Liberation of Greece," "The State of Turkey," "The State of Ireland," "Agriculture," to say the least, as political as any reference to elementary education in Ireland. Yet while having claimed and exercised freedom for himself, he leads in the attack upon Mr. Jackson for having judiciously exercised a like liberty. This is a phase of Dr. Bunting's character that appears again and again in these "Sidelights," and shows how the possession of power practically absolute can deflect from judicial calmness and consistent action a man endowed as Dr. Bunting was, and as devotional in spirit and in general as disinterested in labour for the Church. There was no more strenuous advocate of procedure by question in Conference in relation to ministerial action and conduct than Dr. Bunting, a procedure that more than once or twice was pressed to disastrous issues, and which, carried into the minor courts of Methodism, was in more than one crisis the cause of wide-spread separation from the community.

Men scarcely care, and ought hardly to be required to criminate themselves. And yet, as these "Sidelights" testify, this test was frequently applied, and that, too, when serious issues were pending. It might have been supposed that this method when applied to himself would have been at once accepted by so ardent an advocate of it as Dr. Bunting; but no, rather than be questioned himself in relation to his official action, he silenced his questioners by giving notice of resigning all his offices; a prospect that could not be contemplated, for at that time the Conference was plastic to his touch. More than once, as these Journals reveal, the absence of Dr. Bunting's potent personality necessitated an adjournment of the Session. Nothing is so clear under these "Sidelights" as the danger in which a man stands who becomes possessed of such a power as Dr. Bunting possessed for a quarter of a century. Freedom of utterance upon many public questions was prohibited on the ground that such utterances were contrary to Wesleyan principles, when, so far as these "Sidelights" reveal, they simply collided with the churchy and Tory views of the dominant spirit in the Conference. Take such a case as occurred in Leeds in connection with the Church-rate agitation. Some Wesleyan ministers, and laymen too, had supported Church-rates, and had gone the length of maintaining that no Wesleyan Methodist could consistently oppose them. Dr. Hook, at that time Vicar of Leeds, fastened upon these statements, and used them in support of the rates. Now, the Rev. Thomas Galland, a fine-spirited, scholarly man, who was stationed in Leeds, thought he had as much right to oppose the payment of these rates as others had to advocate their penal enforcement, and so he published a letter in the Leeds Mercury rebutting the arguments of the vicar and his supporters. When the question was asked in Conference, "Any objection against Thomas Galland?" Dr. Bunting at once rose and said, "I wish to ask if Mr. Galland is the author of the incendiary letter?" referring to the letter Mr. Galland had written. Mr. Galland objected to this offensive characterisation of any letter of his, as he had not written anything that could be so described, and he requested that the letter to which Dr. Bunting referred should be read and submitted to the judgment of the Conference. The President ruled that Mr. Galland should have the letter placed in his hands, say if it was his, and have it read if he chose. But the real President of the Conference would have no such thing, and paid as little regard to the ruling of the occupant of the chair as he did to Mr. Galland's request, but proceeded to express more fully his views on the matter, and to move that: "That no brother shall circulate a political pamphlet," which seemed to have little connection with the question. Dr. Beaumont moved that the words, "or write a political letter to a newspaper" be added. This was a fine stroke on the part of the doctor, for it was the very thing Dr. Bunting had been doing a short time previously, and thus would include him in the same condemnation with Mr. Galland. The addition was not accepted, and the resolution passed, though Rev. W. M. Bunting opposed it as an abridgment of rights to which Mr. Galland had claim. Mr. Galland, however, was condemned, though parties who advocated the rates, and whose advocacy was as much political as Mr. Galland's opposition to them, were not called to account at all. Advocacy in harmony with the ruling spirit of Methodism was all right, it was only advocacy opposed to it that was wrong. It cannot be wondered at that this arbitrary exercise of power led to discontent, and produced more than one grave crisis in the history of Wesleyan Methodism.

These "Sidelights" reveal the deeper causes which led to the disruption connected with the name of Dr. Warren. Popularly and generally, this crisis is associated with the establishment of a Theological Institute for the education of the ministry. That evidently is an incomplete and imperfect representation of the case. That Dr. Warren was not favourable to the establishment of an Institute for this purpose is beyond question, and so were many others whose names were by no means the least in Wesleyan Methodism. Many of them, however, acquiesced in proceedings that did not command their entire approval; and it is probable Dr. Warren might have also acquiesced had not certain procedure provoked his antagonism, in consequence of which he became the victim of arbitrary power. Had the committee appointed by the Conference of 1833 confined its action within the limits of its instructions, Dr. Warren, in all probability, would never have taken up the position he did. At least, that is the conclusion to which a consideration of the whole of this painful case by aid of these "Sidelights" leads us. That Dr. Warren's action was in some respects unwise goes without question, especially in one particular which Dr. Gregory points out; but that his main position at the Conference of 1834 was unassailable is equally beyond question. The committee appointed by the Conference was appointed to arrange a plan for the better education of junior preachers. This was its business, and so far as the real work of the committee was concerned, it was done with as much unanimity as could be expected. Dr. Warren, who was a member of the committee, agreed to the plan which was drafted. But that done, the committee proceeded to nominate the men to fill the various offices connected with the proposed Theological Institute, thus exceeding its instructions. It was this action which led to Dr. Warren's opposition, especially as Dr. Bunting, who was already senior Missionary Secretary, was nominated for General Superintendent of the Institute and Theological Tutor. It was this attempted centralisation of office and authority which constituted the main ground of Dr. Warren's opposition in the Conference of 1834, and which, as a matter of course, strengthened him in the view he held that this Institution might be hurtful rather than helpful to Methodism. Had Dr. Warren insisted upon the report of the committee being accepted so far as it related to its proper work, and the rest rejected, Dr. Gregory thinks his position would have been invulnerable, but it is a moot point whether even then the Conference would have heard him calmly and patiently. Though an able man, Dr. Warren was not strong in logical faculty, and, irritated by what had been done, he opposed the whole report amid much interruption and manifestation of hostile feeling. The Conference ultimately ignored the superfluous work of the committee—accepted the plan of education proposed, and appointed another committee to deal with the nominations to office. But while the committee's action was so far ignored, the influence of it remained, and though a House Superintendent and Theological Tutor were nominated, yet the control of the Institute was practically placed in Dr. Bunting's hands, who was made President of the Institute, and left really to determine the functions of the office. Dr. Warren, to whom the Conference had practically refused a hearing, then proceeded in other ways to agitate the question of the Institute and its appointments, which in all probability he would not have done but for the unfortunate action of the committee of 1833 in exceeding its instructions, and the subsequent action of the Conference in relation to the report. He published a pamphlet setting forth his views. For this he was summoned to a special District Meeting and suspended. He unwisely appealed to the Civil Court, and was worsted, as it was a matter in which the court could not interfere. The case then came up in the Conference of 1835. But prior to this Conference a course had been taken by the London ministers which practically prejudged the case. "A Declaration" was drawn up and sent to every minister with a request that he would sign it. The Declaration was to the effect that there was not any predominant personality or party in the Conference, and repudiating somewhat indignantly a main contention of Dr. Warren's, thus practically closing the case against him. Several leading ministers of the Connexion refused to sign and had to suffer for it—an evidence in itself that what the Declaration denied was but too true. Dr. Warren attended the Conference, but his judges had, with few exceptions, committed themselves to the contents of the Declaration, and there could be, under the circumstances, only one result—expulsion. The doctor's action cannot, in all respects, be approved, but had there been less of arbitrary power and more brotherly consideration, it is evident the disastrous consequences which followed the Conference of 1835 might have been avoided. These "Sidelights" do not present the Conference and its action in this case of Dr. Warren's under a very favourable aspect any more than the action of the doctor himself. There was much truth evidently in the statement of the Rev. Jacob Stanley, who said that he refused to sign the "Declaration" because he thought the influence of Dr. Bunting was greater than the document recognised, and this opinion is amply sustained by all that Dr. Gregory deems it prudent to publish from Mr. Fowler's journals. It was not the establishment of a Theological Institute that caused the disruption of 1835 and the following year, but the arbitrary action connected with the establishment of that Institution. As in the organ agitation in Leeds, so in this question of a Theological Institute, the unconstitutional action of the predominant party brought on the crisis and rent the Church.

The causes which led to the still more serious disruption in 1849 and the years following appear from these "Sidelights" to have been very similar. The writer of the "Fly-Sheets" has been very much blamed, and we do not justify his method. But then it is just such a method as an absolutist rule produces, and clearly, from the reports contained in these Journals of Mr. Fowler's, men who in any way openly opposed the predominant authority in Methodism had to pay the penalty in one form or another, and it is just such a state of things as this that leads to anonymous writing and secret associations. It is true it would have been far better to have avowedly attacked the absolutist authority that was supposed to exist, but the courage to take a stand like this is not given to all men; and though the writer, whose name has long been an open secret, and who was but poorly concealed at the time, had boldness enough, yet he did not deem it prudent to venture into the open. But the method of dealing with him and others in relation to the matter cannot be justified. The method of purgation requiring men to say whether or not they were the authors of these "Fly-Sheets"—without any direct charge of authorship being laid against them—was, to say the least of it, an unfair method. It was designated a brotherly inquiry, but these "Sidelights" do not reveal the brotherliness of it. And beside that, this brotherly inquiry, as Dr. Gregory's volume shows, was confined to what was regarded as attacks upon the ruling party in the Connexion. For at that time not only were the "Fly-Sheets" in circulation, and the Wesleyan Times in course of publication, but the Watchman was also appearing as a weekly. Now, in the columns of the Watchman there appeared articles equal both in spirit and language to the "Fly-Sheets," or to anything that was published in the Wesleyan Times, and there was also issued a series of "Papers on Wesleyan Matters" that even outdid the "Fly-Sheets" in their attacks upon certain ministers, and they were published anonymously, and sold by the Wesleyan Book Room. There was, however, this difference, that the Watchman and the "Papers on Wesleyan Matters" attacked those who were supposed to be more or less unfavourable to the party in power, while the "Fly-Sheets" and the Wesleyan Times were against the powers that were. When matters came to a crisis in the Conference of 1849, the one party suspected was arraigned at the bar and required by a method of interrogation to admit or deny the authorship of the articles in question, but the other party suspected of equally questionable conduct was not called to account at all. Here, in the very initial action of the Conference was an injustice. It had been a two-sided controversy, but the one side only was called to account. Such action was sure to evoke resentment. The Rev. James Everett, who was suspected of writing the "Fly-Sheets," was required to say categorically whether he did write them or not. He refused to do this, replying that if he was the most suspected, then there must be the most evidence against him; and he demanded the name of his accuser, and a statement of the charge against him in writing so that he might defend himself in a constitutional way. Reasonable requests all. He was met by refusal, and the question, "Are you the writer or author of the 'Fly-Sheets?'" He declined to answer, and for refusing to thus either criminate or exculpate himself he was expelled. Now it is worth noting that more than once Dr. Bunting, when thus pressed by question, made similar demands to those made by Mr. Everett, and refused to be catechised—but in his case the Conference took no further action, but a very different measure was meted out to Mr. Everett. It was not then proved that he was the author of the "Fly-Sheets;" he was strongly suspected, and because he refused to purge himself, though no charge had been preferred against him, he was at once expelled. Rather arbitrary! Dr. Beaumont and some others protested against the whole of this procedure, though they had no sympathy with the anonymous publications on either side, and they had to bear the penalty of placing themselves in this antagonism to the predominant party. The cases of the Revs. W. Griffith and S. Dunn were dealt with even more unjustly than that of Mr. Everett. Both these men had been more or less obnoxious to the ruling power in the Conference for years, and had been called to the bar perhaps more than any other members of the assembly for disregard of authority in some form or other. Mr. Griffith had contributed various articles to the Wesleyan Times, and he did not disclaim them. Mr. Dunn had started a small monthly called the Wesley Banner and Revival Record. It was, however, connected with the Conference minority. Mr. Griffith was asked if he was or was not the author of the "Fly-Sheets." To this question he refused to answer barely yes or no, but was prepared to answer if the Conference would hear his reasons for not replying categorically. This was refused. He was further asked if he would engage not to report for the Wesleyan Times. To this he was prepared to pledge himself if other members of the Conference would pledge themselves not to communicate with the Watchman. Mr. Dunn was next questioned respecting the "Fly-Sheets," but like Mr. Griffith, he refused to answer unless allowed to make some explanatory observations. He was not permitted to do this, and so retired from the bar of Conference. It was finally decided that unless Mr. Griffith would pledge himself not to send any further communications to the Wesleyan Times, and Mr. Dunn would agree to discontinue the Wesley Banner, they should be expelled. Mr. Griffith declined to do this save on the conditions previously named, and Mr. Dunn was not prepared to give up the "Banner," and consequently they were cut off from the fellowship of the Church to which the strength of their youth and the prime of their manhood had been devoted. Dr. Gregory carefully points out that these two ministers were expelled because they refused to give a pledge such as was not required to be given by members of the Conference who had written in the interests of the party in power, and he attributes the strength of the agitation which followed to their expulsion. The Connexion as a whole had no sympathy with anonymous articles such as had appeared in the "Fly-Sheets," "The Papers on Wesleyan Matters," and in the columns of the Watchman and Wesleyan Times; but it did possess a sense of justice, and the partiality shown in the action of Conference at once awakened a wide-spread sympathy with the expelled ministers. The expulsion of Mr. Everett alone might not have produced any great effect; but the summary and unfair procedure by which Mr. Griffith and Mr. Dunn were meted out the same fate troubled large numbers in the Wesleyan Church, and led to the adoption of measures to compensate them to some extent for the loss they had sustained by the action of Conference.

The sympathy manifested with the expelled ministers was interpreted by the Conference majority as disloyalty to the Connexion, and they proceeded to deal with it by the method which the Conference had adopted in dealing with the ministers. Nothing can be more evident than that had the manifested sympathy been judiciously dealt with the crisis would have passed without any very serious consequences. But the temper displayed by the Conference was unfortunately carried into the circuits, and without anything approaching the semblance of a trial or hearing, officials by the score were summarily cut off from Church fellowship for no other reason than that in some way or other they had shown sympathy with the ministers who had been expelled. Officials were asked if they had attended meetings convened by the expelled ministers, or if they had subscribed to any fund for their maintenance; if they answered in the affirmative, or if they refused to answer, they were at once excluded from the fellowship of the Church. It was no uncommon occurrence at the renewal of the tickets for the minister to deprive one or two or more leaders of their class books, and so break up their classes. A similar course was taken with other officials, the interrogatory method was applied, and if the answer was unsatisfactory to the ministerial questioner, expulsion at once followed, and so in course of two or three years one hundred thousand persons were expelled from the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion, or anticipated expulsion by voluntarily separating themselves from it. Dr. Gregory shows most clearly that by kindly and judicious action, most of these one hundred thousand might have been retained in the Wesleyan Church. But the dominant spirit was such that any indication of disagreement with the ruling authority was visited at once by the heaviest penalty that could be inflicted, excision from the Church by which they had been led to Christ and spiritually nurtured, to find pasture and shelter elsewhere.

The state of things that followed this exercise of arbitrary power opened the eyes of all save the most bigoted, and made it clear that something would have to be done to give the laity some place in the administration of Connexional affairs, and a committee was appointed by the Conference of 1851 to consider the distracted state of the Connexion, and devise measures of pacification. This committee, though it held several sessions, somewhat grudgingly yielded a few points in relation to the constitution of the minor Church courts, but stuck resolutely to pastoral prerogatives, and the Conference did not, in its liberalising action, adopt all the proposals of the committee. This led to the resignation of the Rev. George Steward, one of the most cultured ministers the Connexion possessed. In his letter of resignation addressed to the Conference of 1852, he says: "I have been unable to hold to the doctrine of the Pastorate on which the polity of the body is founded, and to which the Conference has so strongly and so frequently committed itself in times of disturbance and popular pressure;" and he pathetically describes the "sore travail" and "anguish" through which he reached this conclusion. Dr. Beaumont remained in the Connexion till his death in January 1855, casting his influence in favour of every liberalising proposal, and he, with Dr. Gregory and some others, did yeoman service in mitigating the disastrous influence which arbitrary action shed upon Methodism during 1849 and the years following. His end was sudden, for he died in the pulpit of the Waltham Street Chapel, Hull, when conducting a service on the morning of January 21st, 1855, and his biographer does not hesitate to say that "the constant and deep anxieties to which he was exposed" during the disruption years aggravated the disease that carried him off if they did not really cause it. They were sad years to many, but they have not been without beneficial result. From them date the liberalising influences that have given Wesleyan laymen an increasing power in the administration of Connexional affairs. No such years can occur again. The high doctrine of the pastorate is still held in Wesleyan Methodism, but it is modified in its application to ecclesiastical affairs by influences that Dr. Bunting and his contemporaries would not tolerate, and this modification will go on till the laity of Methodism take their proper place in the management of Church affairs.

No graver indictment against class government in the Church which the high doctrine of the Pastorate involves, can be presented than is contained in this volume. It is shown to be evil in its influence on the class that governs, and unhappy in its effects upon those governed. Rulers as created by the doctrine of the Pastorate which George Steward repudiated, have no place in the Church of Jesus Christ. Leadership there must be, but it is a leadership created otherwise than by official ordination. This volume of Dr. Gregory's should be read by all Methodists, for it teaches much in relation to Church administration, and the brotherly action needed to give it effect.

Connexional Biography.

REV. MILES DICKENSON.

THE late Miles Dickenson was born at Tarporley, a village near Chester, on July 15th, 1824, and died at his residence in Southport on May 19th, 1898, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

His conversion took place when he was about thirteen years old. He then became a member of our Connexion, joining the society at his native village, which was then in the Burland Circuit. In about two or three years after his conversion, the Quarterly Meeting appointed him to be an exhorter, and he soon became popular—as the "boy preacher." After labouring as a local preacher for three years, the circuit recommended him for the more important work of the itinerancy, and hence he commenced in this sphere of labour in the Chester Circuit, and subsequently he travelled in the following circuits:—New Mills, Preston Brook, Haslingden (twice), Liverpool, Ramsey, Oldham, Stalybridge, Chorley, Bolton, Northwich, Glossop, Southport, Knowlwood, Middleton, Chester Second, Earlstown and Skelmersdale.

After forty-two years of ministerial labours and toil, spent on the above stations, he reluctantly sought and obtained superannuation—a rest well deserved. His last circuit was Skelmersdale. Here a sad and painful incident occurred. His dear wife died very suddenly, which so affected and unmanned him, as to render it necessary for him to retire from further active ministerial labours, otherwise he had intended to remain a few years longer in the Master's vineyard.

After being superannuated by the Conference, and preaching his last sermon before removing from the circuit, he expressed his great sorrow in having to retire from the work, which, to him, had been a labour of love. I am informed that both he and all present at this farewell service were deeply affected. We know from experience how painful it is to leave the regular work of the ministry, even though superannuation does not shut the door absolutely against any further work—as far as health and strength will allow. In our brother's case, superannuation appears to have been really necessary, as I judge it is in most cases. If, however, I may be allowed to speak a word to my brethren who are still in the active ministerial work, I would say, don't give up till compelled by the loss of health, infirmity, or old age. There is a glory, a grandeur, and a blessedness in the work of a minister of the Gospel of Christ.

During the somewhat short illness of our deceased brother, Dr. Wilshaw, son of Rev. T. Wilshaw, was his medical attendant, and did all he could which skill and kindness could do for him. We were at his bedside every day all through his affliction, and found him peacefully trusting in Christ, and only a short time before the end came, having commended him to God in prayer, I said, "Your old friend Mr. Gladstone has passed away this morning, you will soon meet together on the other side." Speech had left him, but he smiled an assent as if he had said, "Yes, we shall." Shortly after, his spirit was absent from the body but present with the Lord. He fell asleep in Jesus.

On June 24th he was interred at the cemetery, St. Helens, preceded by a beautiful and impressive service in our Derby Road Church, Southport, conducted by our pastor, Rev. H. J. Taylor. Several ministerial brethren took part in the services here and at the place of interment. The Rev. J. Travis delivered a touching and appropriate address, and bore testimony to the noble work he had accomplished. His funeral was largely attended, and many ministers and friends unable to attend sent letters of condolence, and expressed great esteem for the deceased.

We knew him for about thirty years, and after he came to reside at Southport our mutual intimacy and friendship were intensified, and the last several years he met in my class. Hence our fellowship and intimacy. His best, and indeed, all his life and talents from boyhood up to death were consecrated to Christ and His cause. "His all was, on the altar laid." His ministry was a success all along the line of his upwards of forty years' labours—success crowned his work. In his circuits he was well received, and did good work for Christ and His Church, and he has left a good name behind him. He stood well with his ministerial brethren in the District, as well as with the laymen. The Derby Road Paper, in speaking of him, says: "His ministry was confined, to this side of the country. He did splendid work. The District Meeting, upon his retirement, took the unusual course of presenting him with an illuminated address in gilt frame, setting forth the Connexion's indebtedness to his long and faithful labours."

He was strongly attached to the Connexion. He loved its doctrines and polity. He had no sympathy with new-fangled notions, or new lights and new doctrines, especially in so far as they were not in harmony with what he believed to be the true Gospel of Christ. He lived to see the Connexion rise to its present greatness and power. We remember our people at their camp-meetings, etc., singing—about the time he was converted—"More than two and sixty thousand, Jesus Christ has set them free"; now the Connexion numbers about two hundred thousand. He helped on this good work in his day.

THOS. BENNETT.

MRS. L. STAFFORD.

MRS. STAFFORD, wife of the Rev. L. Stafford, died at Wellingboro' Nov. 5th, 1896. She was born at Lane Ends, Romily, Cheshire, in the year 1833, confessed her love to the Saviour 1848, and was a member of the Wesleyan Church until her marriage in 1860. During her married life her husband laboured on the following stations:—Preston, Stalybridge, Ramsgate, Newry, Penrith, Spennymoor, Helmsley, Knaresborough, York Second, Southampton Second, Baldock, and Wellingboro', in all of which he found her to be a true helpmeet.

By nature she was of a retiring disposition. This prevented her making many friends, but those she made became intimates, who clung to her as long as she lived, and when she died testified to their high appreciation of her character, and to the great good they had received from her friendship.

Her sense of duty was very high. This was seen in her labours for the churches over which her husband was placed. In 1863—the year of the cotton famine—he was stationed at Stalybridge, and was brought into relation with the want and suffering caused by the famine. Our sister helped him in his arduous labours, especially among the women and children. When stationed in York, he felt the debt on Victoria Bar Chapel to be a heavy burden, but she cheerfully helped him to bear it both by word and deed. Her sense of duty was also seen in her devotion to her family. In 1864 her husband's health gave way, and he found it necessary to withdraw for a time from the ministry. For eight years he was out of the ministry, during which she had to be the bread-winner, both for herself, her husband, and their young family. They lived at Hyde, where Mr. Stafford had laboured three years, and though the friends there were exceedingly kind to them, yet the struggle was severe. Our sister commenced a small business which she afterwards supplemented by means of a stall in the market-place on a Saturday night. The labours of those years told heavily on her, and probably helped to lay the foundations of the disease which carried her to the grave.

She had an eye for the spiritual. To her, God and Christ, and the other world were undoubted realities. Like Moses, "she endured as seeing Him who is invisible," and the thought of God and His continued interest in her was the support of her soul.

She was patient in tribulation. Her sufferings were long and, during the latter part of her life, very severe. About three years ago it became known that she was suffering from cancer, and the local doctor advised that she should go through an operation. Her husband took her to St. Thomas' Hospital, London, where the operation was performed, July 5th, 1894. When able, she left the hospital and went with her husband to Baldock, and in July, 1895, left Baldock for Wellingboro'. But change of residence did not improve her condition. She gradually got weaker, and about a fortnight before her death fell a victim to the influenza. Everything that loving hearts and willing hands could do for her was done, but it was evident that her stay in this world could not be long. On Thursday, Nov. 5th, 1896, after much tribulation, she entered the Kingdom.

She was interred in the Wellingboro' cemetery. All the ministers of the town were present, and the following took part in the service:—Rev. T. Stephens, B.A., Congregationalist; Rev. T. V. Tyas, Wesleyan; Rev. J. Hand, Baptist; and the Rev. G. Parkin, B.D., of Northampton. The day was stormy, but there was a large company, many having come a great distance to show their respect for the departed, and their sympathy with the bereaved. Our sister has left behind her a sorrowing husband, a son, and two daughters to whom she is an inspiring memory. From many letters testifying to her worth, we select the following:—

Rev. A. Johnson says: "I know you have lost a model wife, and the children a most devoted mother. Ah, how true and real was the love between you! How sweet and tender the affection that bound you to each other! What beautiful simplicity there was in her manner, conversation and methods." Mr. James Bell, B.A., Headmaster of The Literary Institute, Stockport, says: "We are pleased to think now, that we had the pleasure so recently of receiving your dear wife in our home, and we shall always remember with joy the kindly nature, the sympathetic words, the deeds of love which have marked her intercourse with us, ever since we first knew her." Rev. J. Tweddle says: "We knew her long enough to respect her and to find that she possessed qualities of a high order, though she did not figure prominently as some do." One friend in Southampton says: "Oh, how you must miss her sweet smile." Another: "We all respected your dear wife;" and another, "We all remember your dear wife's kindly disposition and loving nature." T. Beeley, Esq., J.P., says: "Permit me to express my sympathy with you in your great bereavement, and hope that Providence may arrange that all things may work together for good for yourself and family. My wife joins me in sincere condolences."

G. PARKIN.

MRS. ANNIE ALLEN SCRIMSHAW.

ANNIE ALLEN SCRIMSHAW, the subject of this memoir, was the only daughter of Mr. D. Ward, of Arnold, near Nottingham, and was born on July 12th, 1859. She was naturally good and spiritually-minded from her childhood. At the age of fourteen years she consciously yielded to the claims of Christ, and entered into His service. Previous to becoming the wife of Rev. Thomas Scrimshaw, which event took place on Dec. 13th, 1881, she was a Sunday School teacher and communicant of the Established Church. But her entirely new environment never seemed to her a difficult transition, for the simple reason that she gave her heart and hand to the Connexion as well as to her husband, making herself acquainted with all its operations, movements, and institutions, and thinking no work too hard or tedious that promised to advance its interests. She became not the least in that noble sisterhood, whose story of self-denial, arduous toil and unflagging devotion will never be written, but who have contributed so largely to the efficiency and varied service of the Primitive Methodist ministry. Mr. Scrimshaw received in the gift of his wife, not a genial, cheerful companion, and faithful confidant only, but a true, thorough helpmeet. She entered with much zest into all the joys and anxieties of her husband's ministry. Mr.

Scrimshaw's past usefulness and success are due not in little measure to the very hearty co-operation he received from his departed wife.

In the Rotherham Circuit to which she came as a fair and attractive bride, she quickly drew to her side a wide circle of friends, and especially in the Parkgate and Rawmarsh Societies, made her presence felt for good.

In Melton Mowbray they were instrumental in building a beautiful church and raising £1,000 towards the cost; during their sojourn in Ashby-de-la-Zouch, one of the finest manses in the Connexion was erected, and at Ripley Mrs. Scrimshaw had organised the ladies of the church into a weekly-effort for debt reduction. She worked prominently on the committee of the British Women's Temperance Association, and in addition to the cares of a large household, entered heartily into all kinds of good and useful work.

Mrs. Scrimshaw will be remembered with gratitude, and her memory treasured in all the circuits in which she lived and laboured with her husband.

In public she was always genial and bright, but never obtrusive. She was emphatically "a doer of the Word."

In the home she was kind and devoted, and to all who came to their home as temporary guests, she extended the utmost hospitality.

That such services as had already adorned the life of our sister were not, in the Providence of God, permitted to continue and multiply, is a mystery which our time-bound vision cannot penetrate. Only a few days before our dear sister's decease there was not the slightest presentiment of the irreparable loss which her loving husband and six tender children were about to sustain.

Her illness, both suddenly acute and swiftly fatal, commenced about Monday, Nov. 23rd. On the Thursday her medical attendant realised that the complaint was acute peritonitis, but counting upon a strong and sound constitution, had no fear about her recovery. So free from apprehension was our dear sister that at midnight on Saturday, Nov. 28th, when being left to the care of the nurse, she expressed the hope that they would have a good night's rest. Nothing happened to thwart this hope until six o'clock on Sunday morning, when some rapid change took place in her condition. The nurse called for Mr. Scrimshaw, but the moment he entered the sick chamber he saw, alas! it would soon be converted into a chamber of death. In ten minutes the spirit of his dear wife had left the earthly tenement and passed into the enjoyment of a "longer rest" of endless day.

She died from syncope, without apparently either struggle or pain. The mournful intelligence spread very quickly throughout the town and district, evoking universal sympathy. Touching references were made to the unexpected bereavement from most of the pulpits of the various places of worship in the town. The interment took place on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 2nd, 1896, in the General Cemetery, Ripley, at the close of a very impressive and solemn service in the Nottingham Road Church, of which the deceased was so useful and valuable a member. The service was conducted by resident ministers of the town, Revs. G. Dorey, G. Lord, and S. Allsop, assisted by Mr. J. Piper, Circuit Evangelist. At the grave-side the service was conducted by Rev. Giffard Dorey, and notwithstanding an incessant downpour of rain all the afternoon, crowds gathered to pay the last token of respect and love to the memory of our departed sister. Numerous beautiful wreaths testified to the profound sympathy which the sad event had awakened, as well as to the sincere esteem for the character of her whose service had been so untiring and conspicuous.

To the writer, who, in addition to the Rev. R. Bryant, was a colleague of her husband's in the first circuit to which she came after their marriage, and who had enjoyed their unbroken friendship, the sudden death of one so young and so apparently full of days and energy, is an event to which it is hard to give credence.

But we have unshaken confidence in Him whose promise is the bright rift in the sky of sorrow; "What thou knowest not now, thou shalt know hereafter."

Meanwhile, we ask for the grace of patience that waits the promised explanation.

CHRISTOPHER TINN.

MR. CHARLES FROST.

BROTHER CHARLES FROST, of the Docking Circuit, died in the peace of Christ and passed to the better home, on Friday, Nov. 20th, at the ripe age of eighty years. He became a member of our Church when about twenty-eight years of age, and for fifty-two years he has been with our people, as a devoted Christian, a loyal Primitive Methodist. For some time he was a local preacher, and held this position until his secular calling of Farm Steward prevented him from fulfilling his duties. Some time later he was society steward and class-leader in our Brancaster Staithe Society.

Some years ago he lost his dear wife, and by her death the Connexion lost a devoted, kind-hearted, Christian member. The house was ever open for all preachers; she joined with her husband in welcoming them and giving them their best comforts. Her death was singularly triumphant; she died exulting in her Saviour. After her death, Brother Frost lived successively with his three daughters, and ended his days with his youngest one at Burnham Market. Latterly he held no office, but his Christian character and the quiet influence of his pious life, had their usefulness for the Church.

Some few days before he died he had severe conflicts with doubt, but as the end drew near his faith became strong and his hopes bright. The day before he died he gave evidence of this in frequent ejaculations of praise: "I am washed whiter than snow," "Praise the Lord!" "Bless His Holy Name!" "I am firm on the Rock," "Christ is my refuge," "Come, Jesus!" "I am waiting." Jesus came and took His servant home.

"Home at last, thy labour done,
The battle fought, the victory won."

He was interred by the writer on the following Wednesday, amidst sorrowing and sympathising friends.

Mr. McCreedy, an old friend, preached a memorial sermon on Sunday, Nov. 29th, to an appreciative audience.

WILLIAM COX.

MR. EDWARD LONG.

EDWARD LONG was born in Reading in Dec. 1808. He was in early life brought into association with Primitive Methodism. He was one of the few who linked the church of to-day with the mission of John Ride and other pioneers. Mr. Long was present at the first service held by these godly men in the streets of Reading, and for a period of sixty years was intimately associated with all the movements and developments of Primitive Methodism in Reading and the district. He watched with increasing interest and delight the growth of the Church he loved so well, and for which, in its earlier struggles, he suffered so severely. It has been my pleasure to hear him speak occasionally—for he was very reticent—of the beginning of Primitive Methodism in Reading and the County of Berkshire. It was no easy task these men of God undertook. They had to meet fearful opposition. But in God's name they faced it heroically and successfully. On one occasion his head was broken open, again and again he was pelted with rotten eggs, stones, and dirt. But he and his coadjutors did not shrink from the work, which, in the name of the Divine and loving Master, they had undertaken.

Our late brother during his lengthy career in our Church, occupied many positions of trust. He was a class-leader, local preacher, trustee and circuit steward.

As a class-leader he was very punctual in his attendance, and was always ready to give such advice and help as the members of his class required. He paid considerable attention to the visitation of his members. As a lay preacher he laboured earnestly, long and successfully. He was physically qualified for the work, as he was blest with a strong constitution, which was very necessary at that time as the journeys to appointments were much longer than at present. It was no uncommon thing for Mr. Long, if he feared an appointment might be neglected, walking many miles to take the service. He was occasionally a little long in his preaching.

There was nothing of the orator about him. He preached earnest, practical discourses, argumentative and sound in doctrine.

To speak in general terms of our late brother: he was one of the most active and useful members of the Church. He set a very high value on all the means of grace, and was regular in his attendance. He was a strict disciplinarian, and believed in doing everything in harmony with Connexional rule.

He never talked of the business matters of the Church out of doors. Questions debated in Circuit Committees and Quarterly Meetings were never divulged by him. Inquisitive busybodies and scandal-mongers received short shrift from him.

In the summer of 1871 he lost by death his devoted and loving wife, and immediately afterwards he was joined in the home by his daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Garratt. From that time until his decease his daughter was his constant companion and helper, and during the last few months of his life—during a most painful and distressing illness—his most devoted and patient nurse.

His last days were marked by much physical and mental affliction. There was no rest for his friends in the house day nor night. He had seven children. Two only survive the father, Mrs. Garratt and Mrs. Burnett (wife of the Rev. R. W. Burnett).

A memorial service was held in London Street Chapel on Sunday evening, July 19th, 1896, and was conducted by the superintendent of the Reading Circuit. A large congregation was present to show their regard to his memory.

J. A. CHEESEMAN.

MRS. BETTY WILSON.

MRS. WILSON, the beloved wife of Mr. Aaron Wilson, was born at Accrington, May 10, 1834, and departed this life at Chorley, December 14, 1896, in the sixty-second year of her age.

From her earliest days she was the subject of deep religious impressions, and was converted to God in the twenty-second year of her age, after hearing a sermon preached in the Park Road Chapel, Chorley, by the Rev. Thos. Kent, on the following text: "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom; would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" and at once she joined our society at Chorley.

As a girl she was gentle, loving, obedient and true, and was greatly beloved by all who knew her. She was modest, sweet, and generous in disposition, like the violet in the shade revealing itself in its sweetness, and these graces of the Divine Spirit increased with her growing years. She was so humble and truly unselfish that her whole life was a thing of rare beauty and purity. There was nothing boisterous or demonstrative in her religion; but she possessed the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price. She exemplified at all times, in deeds of loving sympathy, the spirit of her Divine Lord and Master. She had an intense love for the Word of God, the ministers of Christ, the ordinances of religion, and the House of Prayer. She was rarely absent from her class or the sanctuary before her health began to fail some years ago. But of all places her Christian life was seen at its best in her home. Here her love, which enriched and beautified her whole life, was poured out without restraint or hindrance. Here she was queen of all the graces: her influence was supreme for Christ. Here Miss Havergal's words were realised:

"Take my love, my Lord, I pour
At Thy feet its treasure-store.
Take myself, and I will be Ever, only, all for Thee."

All she was, and had, or could be, was consecrated to the Lord Jesus in her home and church life.

She was mother of ten children; three have gone to heaven, and seven remain, three sons and four daughters, six of whom are married, and all are members of the Church.

Her home has been the resort of preachers of the Gospel, both ministerial and lay, for the last forty years. There was always a smile at the door and a hearty "Come in" to the servant of Jesus Christ. She delighted to entertain them with the best her home could command. Indeed, she counted nothing too much to do for the Saviour, and it may be said of her, "She hath done what she could."

During the last few years she suffered severely from heart disease, which occasionally quite prostrated her. But the end came suddenly and unexpectedly. While she was about her daily work, the last enemy threw his fatal shaft. She fell, and in spite of medical skill, and all that loving hearts and hands could do, she gradually sank into the repose of death, full of hope and full of peace, as all her family knelt around her. "We thought her dying when she slept, and sleeping when she died." She only saw death, she did not taste it.

"Sleep on, beloved, sleep, and take thy rest;
Lay down thy weary head upon My breast;
We loved thee well, but Jesus loves thee best,
Good-night! good-night! good-night!"

Only good-night, beloved, not farewell:
A little while, and all His shall dwell
In hallowed union indivisible,
Good-night! good-night! good-night!"

Death is not the last sleep; it is rather the last final awaking.

She has left to her sorrowing husband and her seven sons and daughters, and all her friends, the example of a sweet, tender, loving life. The influence of her life will remain in the home and Church as ointment poured forth, sweet, comforting, refreshing. Her departure creates a loss in our circle of friendships; but we are comforted with the thought,

"There's another gem in the Saviour's crown,
And another saint in heaven," and we shall meet again.

Mrs. Aaron Wilson was one of the most lovable souls it has been our joy to know during a ministry of thirty-five years.

The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. James Travis and the writer. Mr. Travis gave a touching address at the grave. The many friends who assembled, and the wreaths which covered the coffin, testified to the love and esteem in which she was held.

The writer preached her funeral sermon in Cunliffe Street Chapel, Chorley, on Sunday evening, Jan. 10, to a large congregation. It was a service long to be remembered. May we all meet her in heaven! Amen!

WILSON BARRETT.

MRS. J. JARVIS.

MRS. J. JARVIS, of Wormington, Banbury Circuit, passed to the higher service of heaven on January 8, 1897. She was converted to God and became a member of our Church at Hornton in 1882. She at once took up the service of Sunday School teacher, and devoted herself assiduously to the interests of the Church. Her quiet and unostentatious manner was most striking. Her regular attendance at the house of God, and her undivided attention to the ministration of the word was an evidence of the soul-hunger within.

On Oct. 8, she gave birth to her firstborn, and in a short time was graciously restored to her usual health. But a relapse took place, and on Jan. 8th she passed away. She expressed no fear of death, and almost the only words she uttered during the last few days of her life were, "Jesus Only." Her funeral sermon was preached on Feb. 14, by the Rev. W. Fidoe, an esteemed friend of the deceased. May the memory of her saintly life be cherished by her sorrowing friends, and prove to all who knew her an inspiration to active service and holy living.

Literary Notices.

"DALE OF BIRMINGHAM."

The Life of R. W. Dale, of Birmingham. By his Son, A. W. W. DALE. (14s.) London: Hodder and Stoughton.

FOR at least two generations Carr's Lane, Birmingham, has been a familiar name to English Nonconformists; first, as the scene of the powerful ministry of John Angell James, and then of the greater and more varied ministry of R. W. Dale. The earlier Nonconformists were a sturdy race, including such men as Jay, of Bath, Wardlaw, Binney, Raffles, Pye Smith, John Angell James. The writings of the last named had a large constituency of readers; his "Lectures to Young Men and Young Women," his "Earnest Ministry," and his "Earnest Church" had a very wide circulation, while his "Anxious Inquirer," overlaid as it was with details, was the useful spiritual guide to thousands. A consuming fervour came from him when he preached that fell upon the congregation and enchaind it. His long ministerial life was lived at a high level. His considerable gifts, as an organiser, ruler, pastor, preacher, as well as his kindly, strong hand upon the young, were seen in the upbuilding and prosperity of the Church. Not a scientific theologian, nor a profound thinker or scholar, yet he was well versed in the best theological literature of his time. His one aim was the conversion of sinners. "My ministerial life," he said, "would be almost a lost adventure if this blessed result were not in some measure realised."

Into this wide and well-tilled field of labour young Dale entered in 1854, first as an assistant for a year, then as co-pastor till 1859, when Mr. James "was not, for God took him," and then for over thirty years the burden of responsibility rested upon his own shoulders. The current designation had been—"John Angell James of Birmingham," but it gradually changed into "Dale of Birmingham." The fame of the first has faded, but much of the work of the latter has in it the elements of vital persistence, if not of immortality. His work on "The Atonement," his "Ultimate Principle of Protestantism," an expanded "Exeter Hall Lecture," his "Living Christ and the Four Gospels," and some of his doctrinal sermons, will be read and consulted in coming times.

Of this Life by his son, we have nothing but good to say. It is a goodly volume of 730 pages, but not a page too many; it is an adequate presentation of a great life; it is further enriched by an excellent portrait. The materials are abundant and well digested, while the proportion of parts is well observed, and the interest sustained all through. As for the style, it is free and flowing. As the story unfolds there comes into view the figure of a man so virile, so many-sided, so rich in intellectual resource, a heart so tender, and a spirit so courageous, a life of such varied service, that we know not where to seek his like. His personal force, when he chose to put it forth, was simply overpowering. We once saw him sway a meeting as we never saw any other do. Not many things in this volume afforded us such gratification as the view we get of the relations between the venerable pastor and his young colleague. Unions of this kind have too frequently been pitiful exhibitions of jealousy and ill-will. It was known, for instance, that the relations between old William Jay and the accomplished young Robert Vaughan (author of "Hours with the Mystics"), were anything but cordial. Here, however, the relations between two men so divided in years, and so diverse in prevailing temperament, reflected infinite credit upon both. We have little space for quotation, but the scene of the Church Meeting at which it was decided whether, after a year's assistantship, he should be appointed co-pastor, is so unique that we must give Mr. James' description:—"I put the resolution, in an instant up flew a little forest of hands and arms, as if the brethren were not content with lifting up the former, but to give emphatic expression to their suffrages lifted up their arms and seemed to me to give their hands a shake, as if to say, 'Let that be taken as the lifting up of our hearts, our whole hearts.' Then came the call for the negative, if any. I looked around, and not a hand was to be seen. I could not refrain from saying, 'God be thanked, not a hand,' after an audible utterance of thanksgiving to God, I sat down mastered by my feeling."

Dale's college course does not seem to have been exceptionally brilliant, though he took the London M.A. degree in a brilliant fashion. Dr. Paton said that his gift of extemporaneous speech was the most rich and vigorous of any young man he ever knew, and his power of application and concentration was astonishing. But a reserved manner cut him off from free fellowship with his brother students, who, little knowing the man, dubbed him "the Jesuit." Nor, strange to say, did the deservedly popular preaching of John Angell James attract him; he preferred and frequented the ministry of George Dawson, at the Church of the Saviour. Dawson spent his week nights in lecturing up and down the kingdom, on literary and historic men, and on social questions, in his original, satirical, and often caustic way, and his Sundays in preaching to his own congregation upon religious, ethical, and social subjects. He threw a spell over the ardent young student, which gave a bent to his thinking and action through life. But another influence was working in him, that of his tutor, Henry Rogers, the head of Springhill College. Readers whose memories stretch back forty years will recall his "Eclipse of Faith," which effectually "shut up" Professor Newman; nor will they forget his "Edinburgh Review" Essays, nor his playful book, "The Letters of Henry Greyson;" least of all will they forget his "Superhuman Origin of the Bible," a book to get and read even yet. Dale owed to his tutor much of his distinction as a writer. His fervent "revivalism" he owed (under the motions of the Divine Spirit) to John Angell James. Christian Apologist, Reformer, Educationist, and Politician as he was, his abiding passion was the conversion of sinful men to Christ; he was ever insisting upon immediate decision for God and eternal life; his earnestness was all-absorbing; his appeals passionate. Moody and Sankey, when they were evangelising in England, had no stouter defender than he; he stood by their side and wished he could emulate them; their methods were not his, but their object was all his own. A sentence from a New Year's Address will show how intent, and even intense, he was upon the conversion of souls—"I should tremble to have to meet you before the Judgment Seat of Christ on the last great Day, if to-night I did not endeavour with all gravity and with an agony of earnestness, to rescue some of you from the sins which in your hearts you despise and loathe even while you commit them, and from the awful danger of eternal damnation, at the thought of which you sometimes tremble." His son says: "He never stormed; but his wrath, as it grew, glowed with passion at a white heat. It swept on in waves of living fire; it seemed to scorch, to shrivel, to consume."

Yet this strenuous soul-saving preacher held and propagated, with almost equal earnestness, what the biographer calls "a municipal gospel" of sanitation, sewage, libraries, art-galleries, public parks, etc.; great measures of municipal statesmanship, the seed of which was sown in his mind by George Dawson. What Dawson preached Dale practised; it was, to him, applied Christianity; the whole life Christianised. Not a few of his friends were alarmed at his "secularising himself." Canon O'Sullivan, a local Roman dignitary, was wont to say, "Dale, when do you mean to quit politics and look after your own soul?" In substance, his answer was, "I have given my soul to Christ to look after. He can do it better than I can; my duty is to do His will and leave the rest to Him." One good friend wrote, "There are no politics in heaven; there is where your heart should be." To all these good people he said: "God's commandments are much broader than many imagine; they cover all your life, and no devoutness can be an excuse for not paying your rates, neither can it be an excuse for keeping away from the polling-booth at the time of an election." By his mastery of public questions, and his gift of eloquent speech, he was a prime favourite at the huge gatherings in the Town Hall. His full and exact knowledge lent a statesman's authority to his public utterances. His doctrine was, "Service to the country and to the community is a part of a man's religion."

This is not the place to go into his line of action in the Home Rule agitation, which led to the disastrous break-up of the Liberal party in Birmingham, till then the headquarters of Radical and Liberal politics. Dale "discovered" Chamberlain, who was taunted as "representing Dale." His reply was, "Well, if that be so, then there is not a member of the House of Commons who will have a better, wiser, or nobler constituency." Nor can we stay to make more than a reference to the Education Controversy from the early seventies onward. Into this agitation he threw a giant's energy; it was to him a matter of vital concern. He was scarcely less absorbed in the Disestablishment agitation. From the very nature of the Church any legal union with the State, whatever its terms and conditions, is, and must be, wrong. In all his Disestablishment warfare he stood on this New Testament ground. It must be said that in handling these thorny and delicate subjects, Mr. Alfred Dale has shown an admirable fairness and moderation.

It was inevitable that in such an outstanding personality, idiosyncrasies and little peculiarities should crop up. He never assumed the usual "clerical garb," not even the white tie. In addition to this, he took some pains to let it be known that he disliked the title "Reverend," it savoured too much of priestly assumption; a similar objection existed in his mind against the designation, D.D. Yale, one of the oldest colleges in America, conferred this distinction upon him, but he declined to use it, which generated some little feeling, inasmuch as they concluded that Dale would not wear it because it was American. When, however, Glasgow University gave him its LL.D. he consented to accept it, though it was known that he cared little about titles of any kind, he preferred to be known simply as "Dale of Birmingham." Another singularity was his not using the Lord's Prayer either in public or family worship, contending that it belonged to neither the Christian nor Judaic dispensation, but was between the two. For many modern hymns he had a strong distaste; they were mawkishly sentimental. "They are," he was wont to say, "miserably sentimental. They are women's hymns rather than men's hymns, and they are the hymns of very weak, hysterical women too." In the mass of the old classic hymns he revelled. One comes with some surprise upon his passionate admiration of the early Tractarians, such as Newman and Pusey, saying that "the blessing of God was in the movement. . . in the lives and devotion of these men a new endowment of the Holy Spirit came into the life of England." It appears to us that if these Sacramentarians and Ritualists are right, we are all wrong, and altogether wrong, and the sooner we all go over to them the better for our consistency as well as our salvation. As far back as 1875 he declared himself in favour of what is called the High Church view—"the objective reality of the sacraments." One of the finest features of the book is Dr. Fairbairn's estimate of Dale as a theologian, which is followed by Dr. Guinness Rogers' appraisal of him as a public man. We would fain have dwelt upon the beautiful picture of his home-life, shadowed by dark bereavements; we would also have followed him on his varied journeys to Palestine and Egypt for rest and change; to America and Australia, where was change but not rest; we would again see him on the Education Commission, or going through England with Dr. Rogers on a Disestablishment Crusade. But he was greatest at home; he was best in Birmingham, and they knew it, and whenever it was asked who were their best men, Dale's name would be sure to come first.

Strong as he had been, the last few years sickness invaded his once robust frame. At the beginning of 1895 he had hoped to return to work, but the return of health was more apparent than real. He preached on February 10th for the last time. Then came the final break-down, and the going Home on March 13th. On his desk was a half written sermon, ending with the words—"The full assurance that, after our mortal years are spent, there is a larger, fuller, richer life in—" This he went to prove and enjoy. We lay down our pen with quoting the words of a writer in a weekly paper—"For ourselves, the two words which best describe 'Dale of Birmingham' are those in which Ignatius addresses Polycarp as Θεοῦ ἀθλητής, 'God's athlete.'"

Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? A Study on the Credibility of St. Luke. By W. M. RAMSAY, M.A., D.C.L. (5s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

WE have here Professor Ramsay's mature views as to the claims of St. Luke to be regarded as a careful and reliable historian. The claim is submitted to the most severe test possible, viz., whether Luke's reference to the enrolment that took place in Syria when Quirinius administered that province, B.C. 8-7, can be accepted as historically credible. Professor Ramsay argues strongly for the affirmative view, and shows how recent discoveries in Egypt prove that the system of periodic enrolments had been in vogue from the days of Augustus. The Professor has not always held, as he holds now, that Luke must be ranked as a great "historian." Once he felt the pressure of certain difficulties and the bias created by traditional misconceptions, and he was even disposed to accept the idea of duplicate authorship. But deeper and more prolonged study has brought about a change of view. The outcome is—this carefully written and convincing book. We feel that whether Luke is describing the circumstances of the birth of Christ, or alluding to the political divisions, the historical personages and events of his time, he is equally to be trusted. To him who inspires such a conviction as this our gratitude is due. All difficulties may not have been removed, but some have gone, and those that still remain sit lightly on us in comparison.

Social and Political Economy. Essays and Letters, by THOS. JUDGE. Edited by his son, T. Geo. Judge. (3s. 6d.) Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., Ltd.

SOME of the letters included in the present volume attracted attention and gave rise to considerable controversy when they first appeared in the public press. Such was the case especially with the letters on "the Engineers' Dispute." What is new in this book, and what makes up the larger part of its contents, are the three Essays on "Workmen's Dwellings in their relation to Political Economy," "Labour Strikes," and "China, Present and Future." The Housing Question is always with us; but the falling in of leases in the Whitechapel district has brought the question to the front in a very pressing and disagreeable form. Mr. Judge's Essay on this subject is therefore very timely, and it is as able as it is timely. He shows how great is the relative disproportion between the rents of workmen's dwellings and those of the upper classes. In many cases forty or fifty per cent. of the wages received is paid for confined and unsanitary rooms in bad repair. This leads workmen to seek to find compensation in the demand for higher wages; so that the evil of exorbitant rental for workmen's dwellings is shared by the employer, who is often hampered and impoverished by strikes. An adjustment of the difference between a fair rental and an exorbitant one would lead to the distribution of the money or its investment—a result much more advantageous to the general community than is any exclusive advantage to the owner of workmen's dwellings who now pockets his ten per cent. How far this state of things can be remedied; by whom the remedy should be initiated, and what form it should take are questions on which Mr. Judge can throw some light, and readers are advised to acquaint themselves with his views as given in this able book.

The Story of Phil Enderby. By ADELINE SERGEANT. (3s. 6d.) James Bowden, 10, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

WE always turn with a relish to Adeline Sergeant's stories and seldom meet with disappointment. We have not been disappointed with "The Story of Phil Enderby." It is a thoroughly healthy, human, and not too gloomy a story. Phil fared something like Joseph. He was beloved of his grandfather and hated by his uncle. A passionate blow from the latter led to Phil's mind becoming a total blank as regards the period between receiving the blow and his recovery in hospital. Much turns on this, and we should like to know what physiologists and psychologists would have to say to it. Phil becomes an artist, and ultimately reconnects his sundered consciousness, and marries his cousin, daughter of the man who struck him. One slip we notice in this book. Mrs. Vansittart lived in Lincolnshire, and yet once or twice a week she drove into Hull! How did she manage to do this, we wonder? No, no; it could not be done.

Christ Foreshown. Short Chapters on the Golden Types of the Messiah. By REV. ROBERT J. GOLDING-BIRD, D.D. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE author naively tells us that he has been called by those who are accustomed to hear him "type mad." We would not venture to go so far as this; but, clearly, Dr. Golding-Bird, like the late Andrew Jukes, sees "a shadow of the good things to come" in every part of the Old Testament. His book consists of fifty-two short chapters, in which some of these types are laid open. We have the Gospel according to the tree of life; the Gospel according to the dove; the Gospel according to the furniture of the tabernacle, and so on to the end. It is clear that such a method of exposition as this requires for its justification a certain view of the origin and purpose of Holy Scripture. That granted, all the rest is reasonable. As we cannot accept our author's fundamental view, neither does he carry us along with him in details, though we freely grant that he teaches much wholesome truth.

Handbook for Literary and Debating Societies.

By LAURENCE M. GIBSON, M.A. (3s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row.

A BOOK like this should do something to put new life into the old Debating Societies. There can, one thinks, be no complaint of lack of subjects for discussion, with such a number and variety of topics as are here suggested to the young debater. Nor need any one thinking of taking part in a public disputation be short of arguments or ideas. He will find handy arguments on both sides, and the chief difficulty experienced may be to know which side to take. The ample bibliographical references subjoined to each topic form a very valuable feature of a book which we have no doubt will prove useful and popular, as it meets a felt want. The book, it should be added, is a model of typographical excellence.

According to the Pattern. By J. GREGORY

MANTLE. (2s. 6d.) Marshall Brothers, Keswick House, Paternoster Row, E.C.

It is easy to tell that the writer of this book has intense convictions concerning the obligation and privilege of Christian holiness. That is patent in every discourse and on every page. Mr. Mantle has furnished us with a very noteworthy addition to the literature that is helpful to the devout life, and we wish that any words of ours might induce some of our readers, who have grown dissatisfied with mean ideals and mediocre attainments, to read this thoroughly good book.

Depth and Power of the Christian Faith. By the REV. ARTHUR HOYLE. (1s. 6d.) The Wesley Guild Library. Charles H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

MR. HOYLE has given this title to twelve sermons on such independent and apparently little related subjects as Heredity and Sin; Christ and Augustus; The Method of Paul; Sanctification; Thinking; Nature, etc. The sermons are thoughtful and vigorous; but the style is if anything too colloquial for the printed page.

Visions of Sin. By JAMES HOPE MOULTON, M.A. (2s.) "Helps Heavenward" Series. Charles H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

THE author has here undertaken "to study forms of Sin in the picture-gallery of Scripture." After an introductory chapter on "Sin—Whence and Whither," there follow studies of Achan, Saul, Judas, Caiaphas, Herod Antipas. The last four might be called "Four Bad Men," and as the author remarks, "give a strangely complex picture of the many-sidedness of human sin." Alike in conception and execution, this little volume merits commendation.

Across Three Oceans; and Through Many Lands with Pen and Camera. By FRED REYNOLDS. (3s. 6d.) Charles H. Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C.

A NEW and interesting book of travels, describing a journey round the world. Leaving London, Mr. Reynolds sailed through the Straits of Gibraltar, down the Mediterranean, through the Suez Canal to India, where a considerable stay was made. He brings graphically before our minds many of the varied phases of Indian life, and starts us thinking on the many problems which our vast dependency, with its three hundred million inhabitants, raises in the mind of every thoughtful Englishman. After India, Australia and New Zealand, Canada and the United States were visited. Mr. Reynolds speaks very highly of the work of the many devoted missionaries whom he encountered in his travels. Quoting from Miss Cumming, he says: "I wish that some of the cavillers who are ever sneering at Christian missions could see something of their results in the Fijian Isles. Ten years ago every man's hand was against his neighbour, and cannibalism was the order of the day; now every village of eighty inhabited Isles has built for itself a tidy church and a good home for its native teacher or minister, for whom the village also provides food and clothing. Can you realise that there are nine hundred Wesleyan churches in Fiji, at every one of which the frequent services are crowded by devout congregations?" This volume would be especially suitable for a Sunday School prize; it is well bound and printed, and copiously illustrated from photographs taken by the author himself.

Hiram Golf's Religion; or, The "Shoemaker by the Grace of God." By GEORGE H. HEPPWORTH. (1s.) Richard D. Dickinson, 89, Farringdon Street.

A SERIES of plain talks on practical Christianity between Hiram Golf, shoemaker, and his pastor. The quaint and original thoughts of Hiram cannot fail to be a source of inspiration to the reader, as they were to his young pastor. Hiram had great ideas on the dignity of labour. "There ain't no such thing as a humble vocation," he said to his pastor. "I am a shoemaker by the grace of God. If I make good shoes I shall get just as much credit in the hereafter as you will for being a faithful pastor. All work is noble and honourable, and it'll take a good deal of argyment to show me that all work isn't about equally important. You'll carry up to the judgment-seat a fair sample of the sermons you have preached, and I'll carry up a fair sample of the shoes I've been making. Your sermons will settle your future, and my shoes will settle mine. That's the difference between the Lord and us folks. If your sermon is good, and my shoes is good, He'll say, 'John and Hiram, you've used your talents about equally well. Go up there and sit in the front bench side by side, and jine in the general Hallelujah.'"

The Rev. J. G. Smith deserves a word of commendation for his A Non-Political Treatise of, and Tribute to the late William Ewart Gladstone, etc., as read first before the Bristol and South Wales District Association of Primitive Methodist Ministers. (6d.) T. Mitchell, 48-50, Aldersgate Street, E.C. It is brightly written, and in the compass of some forty-five well-printed pages gives an outline of the late statesman's career, and a discriminating sketch of his character. Good portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone render the brochure more attractive. It should be said that any profits arising from the sale of the book will be devoted to the Newport Primitive Methodist Station Street Church.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

—Few things can be more commendable in the life of a Church than care for the welfare of its poor, and especially of its poor and aged workers. Hence it is gratifying to find that the Aged and Necessitous Local Preachers' Fund is commanding a widening sympathy and support. There ought not to be much difficulty in securing £1,000 or £2,000 a year for this purpose in a Church with a membership approaching 200,000, and congregations which on an average number more than half a million at one Sabbath service. At present some 200 poor and aged local preachers are receiving aid. Hitherto it has been the rule not to make any grant to the same applicant oftener than once in six months. A new departure is now inaugurated, and a quarterly list is being formed. No applicant can be placed on this list as the Fund stands at present till the age of seventy-five is reached. This is, of course, a high figure, but we suppose the condition of the Fund renders it necessary. Then these cases are to be amongst the most needy. The allowance to these very aged and needy brethren and sisters will range from 7s. 6d. to 12s. a month. Here, again, the condition of the Fund imposes limitations. Eight persons have been placed on this list. The aid rendered may be small, but it means much to these aged people even in respect to money value, and it means much more to them as an evidence that the Church to which they have given years of labour remembers them kindly and sympathetically, and shows a disposition to brighten a little their eventide. We look to the churches for a growing support of this Fund.

—There is, however, another project to which the attention of the March Quarterly Meetings will be called, that certainly deserves careful consideration—that is the formation of a Friendly or Mutual Help Society among our Church workers, which may possibly in time cover a wider range, and by which some aid may be afforded to those who need it in times of sickness, and when age disables them from taking part in the active work of life. A scheme has been drafted by a Conference Committee, and will be submitted to the stations in March. Such a society will enable comparatively young men to provide for a time of need, and will afford a splendid opportunity for kindly ministry to those whose circumstances are so favourable that such a time does not seem likely to happen in their case. It is intended at first to embrace in this society Church workers such as local preachers, class-leaders, stewards, and possibly, Sunday School teachers of a certain standing. The allowances will include sickness benefit and old age annuity. Of course, in neither case can the allowance be any considerable sum, but it will be an aid to those who may need it. We need not say more, as the whole project will be placed before the March Quarterly Meetings—beyond, that it seems feasible, and is certainly desirable, and if it can be established and judiciously conducted, will be a boon and blessing to many. Arrangements, we understand, will be made to meet the cases of those who are already aged, without requiring a heavy contribution as a condition of benefit. And perhaps it may be found prudent to merge the present tentative fund in this more permanent project, and secure considerable annual support from the stations. We bespeak for this project a sympathetic consideration.

—It is always pleasant to come across any really aggressive work in connection with our Church, and more especially to come across it where we least expect to find it. We have known the Baldock Station in the London First District for some years, but this knowledge never led to the anticipation of aggressive work by it, but it is said that it is the unexpected which frequently happens, and in this case we sincerely rejoice that it is so. Just beyond the limits of this station, as these have been fixed for years, stands the town of Hitchin, with a population of 11,000; and a little further southward stands the town of Stevenage, with a population of 5,000. In neither of these towns has Primitive Methodism had any position, though there was both room and need for it. The authorities of Baldock Station recognised the need, but with their limited means, and many liabilities, and only one minister they feared to venture. Under the guidance of the Rev. W. Suttle they have, however, decided to mission these towns, and have inaugurated services in Hitchin. A church of twenty members has been formed of persons who had removed to this town from other parts of the Connexion; a room has been taken in the Town Hall, and there appears to be a very promising future before our Church in this place. Connexional premises will be needed, and to secure these, Connexional aid will be required, and we trust forthcoming. Service will be shortly commenced in Stevenage, and in these efforts to extend the influence and usefulness of the Connexion, this somewhat poor station ought to meet with substantial encouragement, for it is for a few poor and burdened churches a heavy undertaking.

—The Christmas examinations at the Manchester College appear to have been, on the whole, satisfactory. Some of the students have gained exceptionally good positions, and only in one case has there been failure to reach the minimum number of marks, and probably, in that case, were the circumstances known, there might not be much failure after all. The examiners have only, we presume, to deal with the curriculum of study, but it would be interesting and informing if, along with the results of the theological and scholastic examination, something was added respecting the evangelistic and preaching work in which the students are engaged. They are extensively engaged in work of this kind, and it forms no unimportant part of their preparation for the ministry of the Church, and a little information respecting it would show the Connexion that the future ministry may not only be expected to be to some extent a cultured and scholarly ministry, but earnestly evangelical in spirit, possessing the qualities of successful preachers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. This information might be gained by the College authorities from the churches served by the students and appended to the examiners' report of the position taken by the students in the several subjects included in the College course.

—We have received a copy of the Brisbane Courier for November 12, 1898, from which it appears there is still a Primitive Methodist Connexion in Queensland. It was thought that Methodist Union was an accomplished fact in this colony; but it seems this is not the case, for in the paper named an advertisement appeared, headed, Primitive Methodist Connexion; ministers, Revs. T. Thatcher and J. Buckle, and announcing Sabbath services at three separate places. These three small churches, with the ministers named and officials connected with them, stand aloof from the general movement for union. The wisdom of this may be questioned, and since the great majority of the churches have accepted the union, it does seem neither wise nor prudent for so small a minority to stand out. As a matter of fact this Brisbane First Station, which is the station standing aloof, was, along with the rest of the Queensland District, separated from the British Conference last June. The station has no place in the Minutes of Conference. It does not appear in any Connexional regulations for the year, nor are the members included in the Connexional report of membership. The brethren on this station may deplore the step that has been taken, and regard the action as hasty and ill-considered; but it has been taken, and the most prudent thing to do is to accept the situation and make the best of it. Few people can have all their own way in everything in this world, and when they cannot have what they wish, the next best thing is to put up as well as they can with what is to be had. At present this station does not belong to the Methodist Church of Queensland, nor does it stand connected with the British Primitive Methodist Conference. Its position is like that which tradition assigns to Mohammed's coffin, suspended between two realms somewhat wide apart and directly connected with neither. The sooner these brethren abandon this position and take as kindly as they can to the inevitable, the better, we judge, for them and the Church interests of which they have charge.

—We have frequently called attention to the social work of the Connexion in the Metropolis at the three principal centres where special attention is given to it—Clapton, Surrey Chapel, and Trinity Chapel. This work is now in full operation and funds are greatly needed. A recent incident in connection with Clapton work has greatly interested us. Most of our readers will be aware that the Rev. Thomas Jackson has for some time been in poor health consequent upon the years of arduous labour he has spent in the midst of the poverty and wretchedness of East London. Last Christmas a gentleman called upon Mr. Jackson who had the appearance of a prosperous business man. He introduced himself by the inquiry, "Do you remember me?" Mr. Jackson had to admit that he did not. He soon proceeded to explain. He and his family some few years ago were in circumstances of great need, in fact, were starving. Mr. Jackson visited them, relieved their need, and opened for them a way to better conditions of life. The man had seen an account of Mr. Jackson's illness, and as soon as circumstances permitted, he journeyed to London to see his benefactor of past years, and to do more than this, to make such offering as his improved position in life enabled him to do, so that the man who had helped him in his need might, by means of his gift, be able to afford a like Christly service to some of the poverty-stricken who were still down and suffering in life's sharp rivalries. As he tendered his gift to Mr. Jackson, with tear-filled eyes, he said: "You were God's angel that drove the wolf from my door when I and my family were starving, and I can never forget you." This incident, we judge, would brighten Mr. Jackson's Christmas-tide; at any rate, had the case been ours it would have made for us a happy Christmas indeed. Now, it is work like this, producing effects so beneficial both for time and eternity, that our brethren are carrying on in the great world-city.

—We are somewhat concerned relative to the Home Mission Fund. There is, as every one giving attention to the matter knows, great need for aggressive evangelistic work in this country. To meet this need the General Missionary Committee have made several new departures, adding materially to their financial obligations. The Sustentation Fund formed by the last Conference, and which it is desirable should accomplish all it was designed to effect, will also increase these obligations. To what extent increase in this direction will take place cannot yet be known, and it will probably be a year or two yet before the extent of this increase is fully seen. So far as we have noticed published statement relative to this Fund, there is not much promise of increase in the income, and unless a substantial increase is realised the probability is that the position of the Fund will be less favourable at the end of the year than it was at the beginning. This, we are sure, will be a result generally deplored, but if it has to be avoided, and the Fund made commensurate with its growing obligations, greater attention will have to be given to the raising of revenue in the stations. The treasurer does not receive as much for Home evangelisation by £5,000 a year or more as he did twenty-three years ago. A great deal more might be raised if the collecting work in the stations was organised and worked as it was prior to 1876. And surely now, with a Sustentation Fund at work, it is not too much to expect that considerable improvement in this direction will be made. The feebler portions of the Connexion need help, and openings for aggressive evangelistic work abound. Surely the Connexion will prove equal to the need, and maintain the best traditions of its past for personal service, proportionate liberality, and earnest evangelism.

—The legacy of £1,000 bequeathed to the General Missionary Committee under the will of the late Mrs. Howard, of Blackpool, has been paid over to the General Treasurer by the executors. This is a timely help and will enable the committee to discharge some of the obligations they have incurred.

—The reports from many of the December Quarterly Meetings have been of a very encouraging character. The Lancaster Station has realised considerable prosperity. Two new classes have been formed in connection with the town church, and a Sister of the People has to be engaged for domiciliary visitation and other forms of evangelistic work. The revival in the Moor Lane Church still continues, and as many as eight or more are found seeking the Lord at the Sunday evening services. The Motherwell Station is reported to be in a healthy and vigorous condition. The quarter closed had been one of continuous success, souls being saved Sabbath after Sabbath. The saying that Methodism is not suited to Scotland is a fiction. "Christianity in earnest" is suitable anywhere. Spiritually, financially, and in other respects, this station was never more prosperous than it is now. At the Tredegar Quarterly Meeting it was reported that many conversions had taken place, and notwithstanding the adverse circumstances of the strike during the summer and autumn months, the station had been able to meet all demands. The Alfreton Station is reported in a healthy condition. Chapels have been crowded, conversions have been numerous, and the Quarterly Meeting was a joyous time. These are but samples of the reports that have come under our notice, and there is promise of a year of progress in the Connexion.

—The ever helpful friend of the Connexion, Mr. W. P. Hartley, J.P., has made an excellent offer to the Metropolitan Chapel and School Extension Fund Committee. He will provide £5,000 free of interest for three years for the purchase of sites in growing suburban districts when land is at the cheapest, and the greatest choice of position is possible. The only condition he imposes is that when any part of the £5,000 is taken for the purpose stated, a similar sum on like conditions shall be provided locally. This means that £10,000 may be available for purchase of sites during three years free of interest, during which time it is presumed effort will be made to raise the cost of a site and so prepare the way for building a place of worship. The offer may to some extent tax the energies of the committee, but we greatly misjudge them if they do not make strenuous efforts to take up the whole £5,000. Nothing is said as to the rate of interest upon any portion of this money after the three years are expired, but of one thing we are sure, that Mr. Hartley will be reasonable in relation to this matter. He has also offered £1,500 on similar terms for three years to the Hull Free Church Council, and the Hull friends are not likely to allow the offer to remain unused.

—The Hartlepool and West Hartlepool Stations have received very substantial sums from Councillor W. C. Gray, J.P., for the reduction of their chapel liabilities. The Hartlepool Station received a cheque for £749. This sum was intended to pay the whole debt upon the recently erected chapel on the Central Estate, £326, and to reduce the debt upon the splendid premises in Brougham Street by £423. These premises are second to none in the locality, and by this timely gift will be placed in very easy circumstances, as the debt was not large for so fine a property. The West Hartlepool Station received cheque for £1,218. Of this sum £300 goes to the Whitby Street Chapel, which will clear off the entire debt. Milton Road trustees get £303, which means the extinction of their debt. To Hart Road, £200 is devoted. The building in this part of the town is an iron structure, but a new church will be proceeded with in a few months. The trustees of the new chapel in Elwick Road receive £415, which places them in a very easy position. Some years ago, Councillor Gray's father, Sir William Gray, did a similar thing, but the development of the towns necessitated further outlay on the part of the churches, and now the son follows the father's example, and devotes part of his wealth to reduce these subsequent liabilities; for Mr. Gray's liberality has been shared by all the churches, Nonconformist and Episcopal alike. In all, he has presented some £10,000 to the various churches in the two towns with which he is connected.

The Wider Outlook.

—With the Wesleyans the idea of a Twentieth Century Fund started, but its operation is not to be confined to that Church. The Baptists have adopted the proposal, though they are not ambitious enough to fix the sum to be raised at a million guineas, they are content with naming half a million pounds; and now the Congregationalists are resolving upon raising a sum equal to that proposed by the Baptists. It is proposed to devote a couple of years to the raising of these funds; and we believe that in each case there has to be the historic roll upon which the names of subscribers will be engrossed. The Baptists propose to devote their fund to home evangelisation and church extension; the augmentation of ministerial stipends where these stipends are small; and the erection of a Baptist Church House. Nothing definite is yet determined as to what purposes the Congregationalist Fund will be devoted; though such objects have been named as the London Missionary Society's work; church extension at home; aid to churches in large towns, which by reason of straitened circumstances, need special help; and probably church settlements in poor and densely populated localities. Neither scheme is as yet definitely before the churches, but in the course of a short time the initial steps will be taken. There can be little doubt but both these Churches are equal to the task proposed and more. If the stewardship of wealth, and the responsibility attaching to all temporal resources under the control of Church members, were better understood and realised, funds for all good work would be amply provided. The doctrine that what I have is my own, to be disposed of as I please, for my own personal or family use, without any particular reference to any obligation reaching beyond, is widely held and practised. The disclaimer of Cain represents too truly the mood of this mammon-loving age, and finds a very distinct articulation even in church life. It is only here and there that we find persons whose practice conforms to Paul's teaching relative to the use of temporal possessions, or who have caught and endeavour to express the spirit of the Master as expressed in 2 Cor. vii. 9, and context. Were this teaching made the rule of life in the churches, there would be no need for Twentieth Century Funds, for all church work and all Christ-like service for man would be liberally sustained, not only by gifts of money, but by what is far more valuable, direct personal effort to lessen human woe, and bless and brighten human life.

—Dr. Fairbairn's lectures have produced a marvellous impression in India. The attendance has been larger than two years ago, and the lecturer has been thoughtfully followed by the elite of Indian society. Grey-headed men, profoundly versed in the faith of their ancestors, and scholarly youths immersed in Hindu studies, have listened with a quietness that was truly pathetic to the man who was engaged in showing that the faith in which they had been trained was an inadequate faith for human need and destiny, and that what men require for the perfecting of being is the faith of Jesus Christ. The leader of the Brahma Somaj, or reformed Hinduism, Mr. P. C. Mazoomdar, with many of his fellow-believers, attended the lectures; and Dr. Fairbairn accepted an invitation to a reception given by this society, at which he submitted to a course of catechetical inquiry. The cause of Christianity in India will be greatly strengthened by the important service Dr. Fairbairn has rendered in accepting the task which was pressingly urged upon him by the Missionary Conference held some little time ago in India, after it was decided to invite him to give this course of lectures.

—Sometimes the magistrates in the Metropolitan Police Courts, in dealing with cases that come before them, venture upon observations that had better not be made. A case of this kind occurred at the Marylebone Court the other week, when Mr. Plowden, the magistrate, dismissed three youths who were charged with gambling outside the window of a house on a Sunday, to the annoyance of the inmates. The constable who had the case in charge mentioned that two letters of complaint had been received about these lads. The reference to these letters the magistrate contemptuously scouted, though it seems but part of magisterial duty to give some consideration to complaints of this kind, for few people care to have their window-sills used as gambling tables by noisy youths. Addressing the prisoners, "Nothing else to do, I suppose," said Mr. Plowden. "No," said one of the boys. "You don't like Sundays, I suppose? You find it a dull day, I suppose? Well, I am not surprised at that," continued Mr. Plowden. The boys, of course, agreed with these sage remarks of the magistrate, whereupon he added, "Well, I sympathise with you so far. Many people find it a dull day. It is a dull day, but you must not play cards in the street; you must endure the dullness, or play cards somewhere else where it is allowed, that is to say, in your own rooms. Go away and try to endure the dullness of Sundays." There is no wonder that language of this kind has been subject to severe condemnation. It cannot be too severely condemned. Mr. Plowden would have been much better employed had he kindly cautioned these lads against gambling, which is a national curse, instead of practically encouraging them. And it would have been more becoming the office he holds if he had pointed out to these lads a better way of spending the Sunday than in gambling either indoors or outdoors. Talk of this kind from a magistrate makes one wonder however he happened to be appointed to so responsible a position. Evidently somebody has blundered.

—The agitation against Ritualism, or rather Romanism, in the Established Church grows apace. The Archbishop of York has deemed it necessary to follow his brother of Canterbury with a Pastoral on the subject; but he protests very mildly. His Pastoral is as fine a sample of Episcopal trimming as could well be produced. He felt bound, we suppose, to say something, but he evidently was wishful to say it in such a way as not to seriously disturb his ritualistic friends. He advocates the faithful observance of holy days, but points out in a very mild way that there is no authority for observing any days that are not authorised by the calendar and the Prayer Book. On "Ornaments," a vexed question in this controversy, he simply says that Christian charity ought to have the fullest influence, a position that nobody will dispute in relation to this question or any other. He thinks the time may come when changes will be made in the rubric, but till such change is made, he ventures to say that a parish priest should not introduce unusual customs in his parish without consulting his bishop. The use of incense, he says, has undoubtedly the highest sanction as an accompaniment of divine service. If he goes back to Judaism he may find this sanction, but no sanction for any such use is given in the New Testament. But he adds that its use is not sanctioned by the Bench of Bishops, and he leaves the clergy to accept the highest sanction, or to regard the non-sanction of the bishops, as they please. The use of holy water is, he says, beautiful in its symbolism, even though the bishops do not sanction its use. On the real presence in the Sacrament he is somewhat obscure, and speaks vaguely, though he does say that practices distinctly Romanist are to be condemned. Secret confession he does not say is condemnable, but thinks it ought not to be compulsory, and he goes so far as to say that young clergymen ought not to attend at the confessional. There is not a strong outspoken word in the Pastoral. The Archbishop leans all through to the ritualist party, and when he does express disapproval, he does it in so mild a way as almost to convey approval. The Pastoral has evidently been written under the pressure of the growing agitation, and because silence might be disagreeably interpreted. But it is plain the Ritualists have nothing to fear from his Grace of York.

—Sir W. Harcourt, whose letters to the Times on Ritualism in the Established Church have been reproduced in pamphlet form, has added another letter in which he severely criticises a letter in the Church Review, in which the writer advocates confession to a priest on the part of candidates for confirmation before they receive this rite. This has, he says, been his uniform practice, and the effect is to make them learn that the sacrament of Penance is an ordinary Church form in which all Catholics take part. He also enjoins confession before all great festivals, and he adds, the young people accept the practice as naturally as ducks take to the water. Under this letter he does not give his name. Sir William designates it a revolting epistle, and the designation is well merited; and adds that unless the bishops adopt some measures to rid the Church of such men, they will soon find that the people will get rid of the Church. Sir Edward Clarke, in addressing his constituents at Plymouth, speaking with reference to this question, declared that he had no confidence in the bishops. They had had power for dealing with the ritualistic extravagances for some time, but instead of using it they had tolerated, and even countenanced the violation of the laws of the Church; and, as if to confirm Sir Edward's statement, the Bishop of Lincoln attended a service in the Church of St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington, which was described in the parish calendar as a High Mass—there were the peculiar eucharistic vestments worn by Romish priests, the proceedings at the altar were the same, the bell was tolled at the consecration of the sacramental elements, and the Host, when it had been created by the words of the priest, was elevated for the adoration of the people; incense was used ceremonially, and, in fact, but for one circumstance—the use of English instead of Latin—any one might easily have thought he was in a Romish place of worship. And yet to this service the Bishop of Lincoln gave the countenance of his presence, and preached the sermon. Truly, not much can be expected from bishops like Dr. King. Sir Edward thinks that if the bishops do not move, the Parliament will take the matter in hand, for he felt certain that the great majority of the people and members of Parliament had no sympathy with these anti-Protestant practices.

—Within the Church itself protest is being made against the Romanising policy pursued by so many ecclesiastics. Dean Lefroy, of Norwich, in a letter to the Times strongly condemning the ritualistic practices so prevalent, argues that the laity must be restored to the position occupied in the Apostolic and immediate post-Apostolic periods of Church life and activity. He proposes the establishment of a House of Laymen, to be summoned by Royal letters, of business before which questions relating to worship, ritual, appointments, disobedience, and discipline should be brought, and that it should sit with bishops and presbyters, and its conclusions be placed before both Houses of Parliament, and if no vital exceptions were taken to them within a specified time, they should have the force of law. The Dean would find it difficult to give effect to a scheme like this. By whom, and in what way would the members of this House of Laymen be elected? All British citizens belong in law to the Established Church, and would the Dean give voting power in this matter to every citizen, or would he limit it to such as have been duly confirmed, or who either habitually, or now and then, present themselves at the communion-table? We fear that the alternative, which the Dean fears—Disestablishment and Disruption—is more likely to happen than this establishment of a House of Laymen. Still, the Dean's letter and his outspoken utterances at the Islington clerical meeting, where he voiced the opinion of some hundreds of the clergy, and denounced auricular confession as a monstrous mischief, serves to show that among the clergy the agitation is not without effect. It is becoming more and more evident that either from within the Church or from without, some arrest will have to be put upon this masquerade of Romanism in the Established Church.

—There seems to be some disposition on the part of the Russian Senate, which has control of such matters, to move a little in the direction of greater religious liberty. The Stundists, who have been ruthlessly persecuted, have, at least, in that section of them which has united with the German Baptists, had some degree of liberty in worship granted to them. The Baptists have for some time been recognised as a lawful religious body, and there is hope that the liberty extended to the Baptists will be extended to the Stundists as well, so that they and the recognised Baptists may worship together without police interference. Another decision of the Senate affects the Old Believers, as they are called, who are now permitted to conduct religious services in their dwelling-houses. These concessions, small as they are, have produced much indignation in the Orthodox Church, and the Senate is being severely criticised for giving so favourable an interpretation to the law. Stundism is making considerable progress in Russia, notwithstanding the repressive measures that have been in force, and the Orthodox Church appears to consider itself endangered by this trifling extension of liberty, and strenuous effort will be made to neutralise the decisions of the Senate. The struggle between the more liberal spirit of the Senate and the rabid bigotry of the Holy Synod will be watched with interest by all who are interested in the progress of liberty and the recognition among men of the rights of conscience.

—The congregation which worshipped in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, or, at least, such portion as could find accommodation, returned to the old place on Jan. 1st. The lower part of the building has been so far completed and furnished that it can be used for worship, and will accommodate about two thousand persons. It was a day of joy and rejoicing. There was no formal opening ceremony. The people quietly assembled and took possession of the hall. The pastor conducted the service, and selected for text the Tabernacle motto for 1899: "Sing unto the Lord a new song," Isaiah xlii. 10. The new hall is larger and loftier than the old one, is well heated and lighted. It is provided with a baptistry under the platform, and with convenient vestries. It need hardly be said that the services of the first Sabbath in the restored hall were well attended. All the deacons were present, and no vacant seat was to be seen. The hall has cost £7,860, and the work has been done in a substantial manner. The contractors are Messrs. Higgs and Hill. Mr. Higgs' father built the original Tabernacle, so that practically the same firm that erected the historic building that was burned down last April has the erection of the New Tabernacle in hand. The superstructure, which will now be proceeded with, will cost £32,550, and the requisite furniture and fittings will cost some £3,500 more, so that the entire outlay, with commissions and extras, is not likely to be less than some, £45,000. Toward this outlay £22,000 was received from the Insurance Companies. Some £7,000 or more have been subscribed, but it is calculated that it will require £16,000 more to complete the work; and for this appeal will be made to friends of all denominations, and no doubt it will be forthcoming.

—An incident somewhat unusual has happened at Kreuzlingen, near Constance, in Switzerland. It was necessary to take down and rebuild the Protestant Church in the town, and the Roman Catholics spontaneously offered the use of their place of worship, when not used by them, for the Protestant services. There must be something peculiar in the Swiss atmosphere to bring to pass an occurrence like this. At any rate, the event is sufficiently notable to deserve generous mention, showing, as it does, that amicable relations are not impossible between Romanists and Protestants.

—For many years past the Established Church has unjustly appropriated Lord Wharton's charity, as it has done in scores of other cases. This charity was established by Lord Wharton, who was a Nonconformist, for the purpose of encouraging young people to read and study the Bible, and provided for the distribution of copies of the Scriptures under certain conditions in more than one English county. It was a Nonconformist charity, but with a keen hand to lay hold on all bequests to which it had no right, the Established Church managed to monopolise Lord Wharton's gift, and for some generations it has been in the hands of the clergy. Recently, however, some stir was made about it, with the result that the High Court undertook to form a scheme for controlling the charity. This has been done without taking any counsel with the representatives of Nonconformity to which Lord Wharton belonged—the Dissenting Deputies—though suggestions had been invited by the Attorney-General, Sir R. Webster, for the preparation of the scheme. The scheme, as it has been formed, is very unsatisfactory to Nonconformists, and rightly so. The charity was a Nonconformist charity, and yet the scheme gives half of it, which is a considerable sum, to the Established Church, and in addition, gives the Establishment practical control of the whole. The management of the charity by this nefarious scheme is vested in nine trustees—five Churchmen and four Nonconformists, but until a vacancy occurs there has to be only three Nonconformists; then the existing trustees, a majority of whom are Churchmen, have a veto upon the trustees appointed by the Nonconformists; so that no Nonconformist can become a trustee unless approved by the Church majority on the Board. Anything more iniquitous it would be difficult to imagine. But Nonconformists have little to expect with such a Government as we happen to have just now. We hope, however, there will be no hesitancy on the part of Nonconformist members of Parliament in tackling Sir R. Webster on the matter when the next session opens.

—Mr. W. T. Stead has inaugurated an International Peace Crusade which seems, as the Americans say, to have "caught on." He purposes to arouse public opinion in this country, on the Continent, and in America, in support of the proposals of the Tsar. At a meeting held in St. James' Hall, he gave an interesting account of an interview with the ruler of Russia, from which it seems the Emperor is deeply and seriously convinced of the evils present and prospective of the reckless race among European nations in increasing their military and naval strength. The Conference he has suggested, and to which our Government have given a favourable reply, and promised "to gladly co-operate in the proposed effort to provide a remedy for this evil," is not to consider a scheme of disarmament. The Tsar is not so quixotic as to propose anything of the kind. What he proposes is that the nations shall consider if some arrest cannot be put upon this reckless rivalry in military and naval armaments. His proposal is simply to see if things cannot be allowed to remain as they are without any further increase in murderous machinery, which is using up the best life of the nations and imposing upon them tremendous burdens of taxation. A modest enough proposal surely. Mr. Stead is seeking to enlist in this crusade in support of the Tsar, the best and most influential persons in every sphere of life, both in Europe and America. In this country there is no lack of sympathy with his mission, as the paper, "War Against War," which he has published, shows. The movement is taking root on the Continent, and in the United States opinion is moving favourably, so that by the time the Conference meets in March, as proposed, the crusade promises to elicit an expression of international opinion that may have some effect upon the deliberations of the statesmen who in response to the Tsar's appeal to the Nations may gather at the Council Board. It will be a common blessing to the Nations if by any international agreement the evil influence of militarism can be restrained, and the mental and physical energy it now appropriates turned into more humane and useful channels.

REV. EDWARD JONES.

Rev. Edward Jones.

OR over a generation the "Jones's" have been familiar names in the households, the pulpits, the administrative councils, and the circuits of the old mother District of the Tunstall and her two daughter Districts—the West Midland and Shrewsbury. For distinction's sake, with a respectful familiarity, they are always called William Jones, George Jones, and Edward Jones. They are all natives of the old district radius, and have spent the larger number of their years of Christian service amongst those who have known them from early manhood, and who highly respect them for their ministerial gifts, graces, and general usefulness.

The Rev. Edward Jones was born on October 11, 1839, in the picturesque neighbourhood of Bishop's Castle, which is situated on the western fringe of Salopia's beautiful county. He was cradled in Primitive Methodism, and belongs to its third generation, his maternal grandmother having been one of the earliest members of our Church. His days of happy childhood were spent in the town of Bishop's Castle. During his youthhood, his father, who was a respectable tradesman, removed to the Bog Lead Mines, which are located on the rugged Superstone range of mountains, from which a view extending over many English shires and a large portion of the Principality of Wales may be gained. He regularly attended the Primitive Methodist Sabbath School, and the warm-hearted religious services held at the Pennerley Chapel, in the Minsterley Circuit. His "hunger and thirst" after righteousness were quickened by daily contact with "a band of men and women whose hearts God had touched" and whose religious zeal was known in the churches of the neighbourhood. During the "fifties," and through the agency of the Rev. James Huff and his co-workers, Minsterley Circuit was favoured with a gracious revival of the work of God. Scores of persons professed conversion, many of whom still remain in the fellowship of the Church. Owing to the migratory habits of the lead-miners, some have gone to the distant coalfields of America, the diamond mines of Africa, and the gold diggings of Australia and India. The fruits of that revival are to be found in many lands. During that gracious quickening Mr. Jones was soundly converted on January 15, 1858, in Pennerley old chapel, at a service conducted by Mr. Huff. He joined the society class of the late Mr. Joseph Davies, who took the deepest interest in Edward Jones' spiritual growth and intellectual advancement. Shortly after his conversion he preached his first sermon to a congregation of warm-hearted villagers assembled in a hill-side cottage. This service was a source of encouragement, for he devotedly gave himself to earnest prayer, and also to a course of study, which included Biblical, theological, and elementary subjects; consequently he became a useful and successful local preacher.

The Minsterley Circuit officials speedily recognised his qualifications for higher service, and they unanimously recommended him for the important office of a Christian minister. In April, 1862, the young man from the secluded mountains, with much fear and trembling, entered upon his mission to the wider world, and began his public career as a minister of the Gospel. With the exception of a four years' term at Tredegar, in the South Wales District, the whole of his ministry has been spent within the area of what was formerly the Tunstall District. His circuit appointments include Dawley, Kidderminster, his native circuit of Bishop's Castle, Tunstall, Brierley Hill, Whitchurch, Market Drayton, Nantwich and Burland, Ramsor and Shrewsbury. During his ministerial term at Newcastle-under-Lyme, the Circuit was divided and he became the first superintendent of the Silverdale circuit. Twice he has been superintendent of Sandbach circuit, where he devoted seven faithful years to the development of the town and village churches. During his four years' appointment at Wrockwardine Wood, the extensive Sabbath Schools were erected and were subsequently leased to the School Board for day-school purposes. In connection with these schools and the School Board, of which Mr. Jones was vice-chairman, an unfortunate litigation case was forced upon him. His defence caused him great anxiety of mind, and also entailed upon him considerable financial loss. The District Meeting, along with the General Committee, having thoroughly examined the case, decided that an appeal should be made to the circuits and general public. Notwithstanding the amount that was raised at the time, we are informed that Mr. Jones is still £100 out of pocket for his defence of Free Church and educational principles. With our increasing Connexional wealth, and the professedly growing interest that is being taken in the welfare of our agricultural and mining villages, we are strongly of opinion that our churches should have stood by Mr. Jones, and have delivered him from the present financial obligation.

In his circuits he has been favoured with large success. At different times his spheres of labour have been visited with gracious outpourings of the Divine Spirit. He has had the joy of reaping, as well as tearful sowing, for he has witnessed a great number of persons professing conversion, and who have been added to the churches. He has superintended the erection of chapels at Rocester in Ramsor Circuit, and at James Street, Tredegar. Both of these properties are highly spoken of by competent judges, and are regarded as being model structures.

Few ministers have done more secretarial and committee work than Mr. Jones, who has a thorough knowledge of Conference rule and Connexional procedure. On these matters he is an encyclopædia of information, and speaks with all the authority of a district lawyer. In addition to the superintendency of large and important circuits, he has faithfully served the Primitive Methodist Church in its varied district departments. Being an able and ready penman he has worthily held the offices of Secretary to the District Committee, the District Furnishing Fund Committee, the District Equalisation Fund Committee, the District College Committee, and the District Orphanage Committee. For six years he was District Sunday School Union Committee Secretary. In 1891 he was elected Chairman of the Tunstall District Meeting. At four District Meetings he has been elected Journal Secretary, and has been appointed the Assistant Secretary several times. He represented his District Meeting at the Conference of 1882, and was General Committee delegate in 1889. He has been a member of the Sunday School Union Triennial Conferences held in Manchester, Leeds, and Sheffield. He has taken a full share of committee, deputation, and Sunday Scholars' Examination work. Having gained the confidence of his ministerial and lay brethren, he has been twice nominated for Connexional official departments.

In the routine and detail of circuit work Mr. Jones is methodical and painstaking. His supreme desire is peace within his borders and all-round prosperity. For this he plans, works, and prays. He is an unflinching disciplinarian, and yet gentlemanly and courteous in all his dealings with his fellows. His colleagues always speak well of his kindly considerateness and general helpfulness. He is fairly well-read, and keeps himself fully abreast of the theological trend and scientific and literary doings of the day. His pastoral service and his pulpit and platform work are highly appreciated by his flock. At first sight he may seem a "little stand-off" in manner, and therefore a wrong impression may be falsely created. He is, however, all the better for knowing, and grows upon you. A friendship having been once formed with Mr. Jones, it is life-long and true as steel.

He is exceptionally happy in his home-life. His wife is a true helpmeet "who looketh well to the ways of her household." She is a quiet and unostentatious worker in the Church, and her greatest joy is in witnessing souls deciding for Christ. Their two sons and three daughters are all members of the Church, and were converted at services conducted by Mr. Jones. The eldest son is a candidate for the ministry, and is labouring as a hired local preacher at Forest Hill, London. Mr. Jones has had his sorrows as well as joys. On several occasions death has flung its dark shadows over his home, and he has entered into the bitterness of bereavement, but he has been cheered with the consciousness that those who were taken from him were "not lost but gone before." After thirty-six years' arduous ministerial service, Mr. Jones is still young in enthusiasm and hopeful in spirit.

In love and sympathy, in hope and trust;
No outward sign or sound our ears can reach;
But there's an inward spiritual speech
That greets us still tho' mortal tongues be dust.

It bids us do the work that they laid down—
Take up the song where they broke off the strain;
So journeying, till we reach the heavenly town,
Where are laid up our treasures and our crown,
And our lost loved ones will be found again."

CHAPTER VII.

THE SCENE AT BOGGART'S CLOUGH.

PRESENTLY Alizon Neville made up her mind, Catholic or no Catholic, it was her duty to warn Duncan Rutland. But how? She could not tell any one to do it, for by so doing she would reveal the plot of her co-religionists. Much as she hated the action, she did not wish the poor fellows to be punished. They thought they were doing what would be both pleasing to her, and to Father Sheen. Besides, she shrunk from letting any one know that she had any knowledge of the matter. What then could she do?

She remembered Mrs. Pickup's words, "Oo'll be on his way theer by naa." But perhaps he might not be. She knew where Duncan lodged. She would go and warn him. It was a hard thing to do, but it was her duty, nevertheless. If he had left the house she must follow him to Boggart's Clough. He had accompanied her there once, now she would repay his services tenfold. But she hoped, profoundly hoped, that he would not have left his lodgings. Dinner was to be early at the Priory that night, so that she might accompany her mother to the debate; she knew, too, that she ought to go home at once; but instead, she made straight for the road in which Duncan lodged.

It was quite dark, but she recognised the house. It had been pointed out to her on one occasion. When she knocked at the door Mrs. Nutter appeared.

"Is Mr. Rutland in?"

"Noa," said the woman, peering at her curiously.

"Can you tell me where he is?" she asked with a heavy heart. She dreaded the journey to Boggart's Clough.

"Oo's gone to Croft Farm to pray wi' a deein' man," said Mrs. Nutter.

"How long has he been gone?"

"'Appen ten minutes."

"Thank you!" and she turned away.

"'Appen yo'll tell me what they call yo'," said Mrs. Nutter, "I can tell Mr. Rutland then."

But Alizon did not reply. She hurried away in the hope that she had not been recognised.

"If yon's not Lady Neville's lass, put me daan for a natcheral," said Mrs. Nutter. "What can she be wantin' wi' Rutland? Oo's noan her soart."

Meanwhile Alizon rushed along a lonely road towards Boggart's Clough. At first she thought of going to a cabstand, but that she realised would court publicity. The cabman would almost be sure to recognise her; besides, she would gain but little time that way. Under ordinary circumstances she would not have dared to have wandered along this lonely lane in the dark, but she thought nothing of the darkness now. It is true her heart beat wildly, and she dreaded meeting the tramps who were constantly prowling around, but she hurried on through the darkness, and prayed that she might be able to undo the evil she had unwittingly done.

What would Father Sheen say? she wondered. Would he applaud her? Surely he would, for though he dreaded the debate, he was an honorable man. And yet she did not feel quite sure. She had heard him say that any tool was good enough to fight the devil with.

Well, was it not true? Why should she worry? Let the rough men who loved their faith carry out their clumsily conceived plot. It was suggestive of an Adelphi melodrama, but what of that? They were sincere, they were loyal to their Church, and they believed they were doing God service.

But she discarded the suggestion the moment it was born in her brain. The blood of an English lady ran in her veins. The Nevilles had always been known as an honorable race.

It was a weary journey. The road was dark and muddy, and was flanked on either side with rough stone fences. Here and there she saw the leafless branches of a stunted tree, while in the distance she could dimly see the dark elms among which the Priory nestled. Her mother would be anxiously awaiting her, but it did not matter. The great question was whether she would be able to overtake Duncan before he reached Boggart's Clough, and before the rough men would be able to work their will on him. She did not like him, for he was an enemy to her faith, but she would do her best. The wind soughed across the wild waste of moorland which stretched away above her, and moaned among the branches of the stunted trees, while stories of saints which she had heard from her earliest childhood came back to her with great vividness.

One of them almost caused her to give up her mission. It told of a lovely girl who was betrothed to a man who was not true to his Church, and who had formed plans to destroy the power of the priests. When she went to the Confessional, the priest told her that if she would receive absolution she must find out her lover's plans, and tell him. She did this, and her lover was killed by the authorities of the Church. Nevertheless, priests, cardinals, and Pope applauded her, the Blessed Virgin herself appeared to her. Her life was a great benediction, and when she died the angels sung around her death-bed. She was created a saint too, Saint Winifred, and thousands of pilgrims visited her shrine yearly.

And yet she, Alison Neville, a daughter of the Church, a Church which was despised in Protestant England, was even now trying to help an enemy, trying to make it possible for him to destroy her faith. No, it could not be right, and she stopped suddenly.

Again she went on, however. The God of truth could never commend an evil plot. He could never condemn her for performing an action, which her heart told her was worthy of the name she bore. She might dislike him, he might be an enemy to her faith, but she could not connive at any action which was cruel and vulgar.

Presently she came to Boggart's Clough. She had seen nothing of Duncan, she had heard no sound. Her way now would be along an indistinct footpath towards Croft Farm. What should she say when she overtook him? How could she excuse the action of those of her faith? There was little time to think of these things now, however, her great work was to find him, to warn him.

A little later, she saw in the gloom of the night what she took to be the outbuildings of the farm, and a moment after she heard the sound of voices. Her heart beat even more quickly; in a few minutes she should know whether her mission had been successful.

Yes, that was Rutland's voice, high-pitched and almost angry.

"Kindly let me pass," he said, "a dying man awaits me yonder, and I must see him."

"Ther's noa dyin' man yon, mester," was the reply, "that was nobbut a trick. 'Appen yo' did'n' think yo' was sich a fool."

"What do you mean?"

"Aw main as aa thaa't noan spaik in th' Industrial 'all to-neet."

"Oh, I see, this is a plot to keep me away from the meeting."

"Ca' it what yo' please, mester. The devil's noan goin' to 'ave it all his oan way."

"But I shall go to the meeting," cried Duncan, "and it's at your peril you try to stop me."

The men laughed in a low, cruel way.

"And this is the way you Catholics defend your faith, I suppose," said Rutland, almost losing control over himself.

"Ony trick is gooid eno' to chait the devil," was the reply. "Naa then, lads, is all ready?"

Alison Neville had been creeping nearer to them all the time, and just as she came up she saw two men lay hands on Rutland.

"Thou'll noan be sa keen baat tellin' lees abaat th' Cathlicks agean," she heard one say savagely, with an oath. "Here, mester, 'ere's summat for yo' to sup."

"No, no!" cried Rutland, "take your hands from me."

"Thaa mun 'ave it," was the reply. "To-morra all't Lynford 'll know that Tudor parson wur druffen (drunk) to-neet."

"Stop, stop," cried Alison, scarcely realising what she was saying.

"What's yon?" was the cry, "by gum, it's a lass; be quick or we shall be found aat."

"Stop," cried Alizon again, "how dare you do such a thing? Shan Kelly, is that you? Aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

A whisper passed among the men. "It's Miss Alizon," they said, "but aw thot oo was all right."

"Let Mr. Rutland go," continued Alizon, "if you don't your names shall be known, and every one of you shall be punished. I shall tell Father Sheen, too."

There was a laugh half of derision and half of anger.

"Is this the way you defend your faith?" cried the angry girl, "is this your idea of being true Catholics?"

"We're ony doin' what you wanted," said one of the men sullenly.

"If I have given a wrong impression I am sorry," cried the girl, "I never dreamed that you would interpret my words in such a way. Leave Mr. Rutland alone, or it shall be worse for you."

The men stood undecided.

"Do you think," went on Alizon, "that if you do what you intended, that your purposes will be accomplished? I tell you I will go right back to the meeting and relate exactly what has taken place."

She had no fear of these men. Perhaps her position gave her a sense of safety, perhaps she felt certain that they loved her. Anyhow, she had no fear, and she stood in their midst without manifesting a shadow of timidity. As for Rutland, he scarcely realised what the episode meant, but he felt perfectly assured of his freedom from harm. The girl's presence was an impregnable barrier between him and danger, and while at first he felt angry with his would-be persecutors, he now became calm and considerate.

"I should like to know what this means?" he said. "What harm have I done to you?"

"It is my fault," cried Alizon, before the man had a chance to reply, and then she hesitated, for she scarce knew what to say.

"Your fault!" cried Duncan, "your fault, Miss Neville! why, you have stopped these fellows from venting their anger on me."

"My fault," repeated the girl eagerly, "so let me bear all blame."

"I do not understand," answered Duncan, bewildered.

"I will tell you," she replied. "I made use of words which these men have misunderstood, and—"

She hesitated a second; but Duncan understood her. He remembered the confused hints of the colliers, and rapidly piecing the various items of the episode, he saw what it meant. Perhaps the fact that Alizon Neville was a highborn, beautiful girl influenced him to do what he would not have otherwise done, or it might have been that a true, chivalrous nature expressed itself. Anyhow, before Alizon could conclude what she was trying to say, his mind was made up.

"I beg you will say no more, Miss Neville," he cried. "I understand everything. I thank you very much for troubling to come so far to save me from the results of an entire misunderstanding. As for these fellows, they may accept my assurance that nothing more will be heard about the matter."

The girl turned towards him gratefully, and in spite of the anger she felt towards him, she could not help admiring him. The men, however, could not understand so clearly.

"Dost a main that thou'lt say nowt to th' bobbies?" said one.

"I mean that no word concerning the matter shall pass my lips to anyone," said Duncan. "It was a mistake, and this shall be the end of it as far as I am concerned."

Possibly his words, freeing them from all fear of punishment, quelled their anger, and led them to give up their idea of doing him physical injury, even more than Alizon's presence. Poor, simple fellows, they were not bad-hearted, and they believed they would be serving their faith, by making it impossible for Duncan to speak at the meeting. Now, however, they almost forgot their plans, and a more gentle feeling came into their hearts.

Thoroughly ashamed of themselves, they slunk away. Most likely they were really glad that their plans had been frustrated, for they were not really vicious. Indeed, when they knew that Alizon disapproved of what they were doing, all their eagerness had departed, while Duncan's words made it impossible for them to harm him.

"Yon's a gradely lad when all's said and done," remarked one presently.

"Yi," said another, "oo's noan so bad. Art a baan to go to th' 'All to-neet?"

"Noa, awm noan baan."

And then they walked along through the darkness of the night without speaking another word.

Meanwhile, Alizon and Rutland stood watching them as they went away.

"Thank you, Miss Neville," said Rutland. "Will you allow me to accompany you to the Priory? I shall then be in plenty of time for the meeting."

"You are very kind," she replied, and with many wild thoughts surging in her mind she walked away by his side.

CHAPTER VIII.

DUNCAN RUTLAND'S VICTORY.

"MR. RUTLAND," said Alizon, when they had walked some distance together, "I must tell you exactly what has taken place."

"Pray don't worry," was Rutland's reply; "besides it is unnecessary: I know. It will only distress you to dwell on it."

"You know! How?"

"It requires but little penetration to see what it all means," replied the young man; "let us drop the whole matter, it is not worth dwelling on."

"But it is," cried the girl, "and it is due to those men that I tell you."

"It was all a mistake, I am sure. For my own week, so bitter towards our faith, Mr. Rutland, that I said, almost without thinking, that I wished something might happen to keep you away from the meeting to-night. One of those men heard me, and so——"

"You came all through the darkness to tell them of their mistake. It was wondrously generous of you, Miss Neville, and I thank you."

"No, no, of course I could not help it, but——" she ceased speaking suddenly as though she was frightened at what she was about to say. "Can't you see," she went on presently, and her voice was husky with excitement, "can't you see that you are fighting against God—by saying what you did last week? You were encouraging heresy, you were giving arguments to those who will use them as a means of keeping away from the Church. More, you were sowing the seeds of doubt and unrest in the minds of believers, you were doing untold harm! Can't you see it, Mr. Rutland?"

The young man's heart hardened at her words.

"No, I cannot see it," he replied. "I can substantiate every word I uttered last week. I shall be able to do the same to-night. But let us not talk of that, it would be ungenerous of me."

"Oh, please don't think that what you call arguments have the slightest weight with me," she cried with a sneer in her voice; "believe me my faith is too surely grounded for that."

"I was not thinking of that, Miss Neville, I was only thinking how ungenerous it would be of me after your great kindness, to utter what would be to you rank heresy, and thus hurt your feelings."

"But you will do so to-night."

"That is a different matter. I shall be set for the defence of the faith that is in me; the people will have come to hear both sides of the matter, and a man who is supposed to be skilled in such matters will be present to answer me. At present I can only think of you as a friend, a benefactor, who at great personal sacrifice has saved me from—I know not what. That is why I said let us speak of something else."

"But I cannot—I cannot. Believe me, I can think of nothing else. I—I know Father Sheen is not a good debater, and—and——"

"Truth always prevails, Miss Neville. God lives, and He never lets the truth suffer. You know what St. Paul said, 'We can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.' Every false system will die a natural death. Nothing lives, except because of the truth that is in it, for God is Truth."

"Do you really believe that?" cried the girl impulsively.

"I am sure of it," replied the young man.

"But God uses us to help the truth," she said presently, "and woe be to us if we go against it."

"Truth is merciless," replied Duncan.

"Then for your own sake, for the sake of those

"HE TRIED TO READ HIS NOTES."

part, I only think of one aspect of this night's adventure."

"And that?" queried Alizon eagerly.

"Your courage, your heroism," cried Duncan fervently. "I know what it meant, that is, I know what it must have cost you to come through the dark night, along a lonely road, to render service to one whom you regard as an enemy to your faith."

"Yes, yes," was her answer, "but I could not help it, how could I? I—I, oh, I must tell you, I must! You were so cruel to Father Sheen last who will be there, give up this debate," cried the girl impulsively.

"Will you be there?" asked Duncan.

"Yes, I shall be there. I hate the thought of going, but I must go. You have no idea what pain you gave last week?"

"To you, Miss Neville?"

"Yes, to me, and to my mother, and to Father Sheen," cried the girl impulsively, little realising what she was saying.

"I am very sorry," replied Duncan, "it grieves me to give you pain, but—but I cannot help it."

"Will nothing persuade you?" cried the girl.

"Nothing."

She said not another word till they reached the Priory, and then without a word, save a chilling "Good-night," she left him alone.

The young man walked towards Lynford thinking deeply. "I am afraid this night's experience has unfitted me for a mental conflict," he thought, "and it is hard to say what will give pain, but——"

"Is that yo', Mester Rutland?"

"It is, Matthy," replied the young man to the query of the old weaver.

"Ee—aw'm reight glad. Aw'm jist bin to yar lodgins, and when Mrs. Nutter tow'd me wheer yo'd gone, aw was feared, aw was, fur sure."

"Ah well, it's all right. You've brought down the books?"

"Yi, they're on th' platform by naa. Doant yo' be maily-maathed, Mester, yo' gi et to 'em 'ot. Lots on us ev bin prayin' for yo'."

"Thank you, Matthy." A few minutes later Duncan found himself in the ante-room of the Industrial Hall, where he tried to read his notes, but try as hard as he might he could not keep the words of Alizon Neville from ringing in his ears, while her face kept constantly coming between his eyes and the words he had written.

"I shall be a dead failure to-night," he thought sadly.

A few minutes later Father Sheen came into the room accompanied by some of his supporters. The old man looked pale and ill. His eyes were rheumy and bloodshot. His cheeks were flabby, his lips blue. Evidently he much feared the encounter, and ought rather to be in bed than at such a meeting. Just before the time for the commencement of the debate, Lady Neville and Alizon entered the room. Duncan knew that both had seen him, but neither paid him the slightest attention. Instead, they both talked pleasantly with the old priest. The young man felt depressed, and altogether uneasy. He was ill-prepared for his work. Although Alizon had done her best to nullify her thoughtless words to Shan Kelly, they had more effect than she wot of. They had led to events which had a very disturbing effect on the sensitive, highly-strung young man. Still he never thought of giving up. He would fight the business to the bitter end, and presently, when the chairman led the way on to the platform, he followed him with a steady step.

According to the rules of the debate, Duncan had to speak first on the second night, and as he saw the sea of upturned faces he felt that he had nothing to say. After all, why should he give pain? Why should he speak against a faith which had comforted millions? why should he earn the enmity of the girl with whom he had been thrown into contact so strangely?

When the chairman for the evening arose to reiterate the rules of the debate, and in so doing mentioned his name, he heard in addition to the cheering, an angry muttering, and he wondered if many there were disappointed at his appearance. This somewhat aroused the fighting element within him, but when he rose to speak he felt that in spite of the enthusiastic applause of his friends, that he was ill-prepared for his work.

Still he stammered his way through his speech, and when the half-hour was at an end, sat down without having said anything of much importance. There was no life in his words, no conviction in his tones; the address was a failure. Evidently Father Sheen felt this, for he rose with alacrity and confidence. His fearfulness had departed, his faith rose triumphant. Through the week the old priest had been reading largely of Cardinal Wiseman's addresses, he had also studied Newman carefully, and he had something to say. As the old man proceeded, moreover, he became more at ease, his Celtic fervour manifested itself, his words came fluently, and his benignant presence helped his cause.

His peroration, too, was in its way fine. He described the Catholic Church united in its great Head, the Viccgerent of Jesus Christ, and showed how this fact had kept the Church through the centuries. How that, in spite of stress and storm, enemies without, and enemies within, the Church had marched forward. He told of the noble souls she had nurtured; in burning words he described the deeds of heroic souls, deeds of men who were beacon lights before Protestantism began to be.

"And is all this," he cried, "to be put aside for the puny arguments of a fledgeling boy, who has only just begun to tread the pathway of life, and who happens to be the minister of a so-called Church which forms a part of a sect, of a sect, which at some time or another broke away from some other sect, because of some particular fad of some particular man?"

He played upon this with rollicking Irish humour, and then, with a passionate appeal, which contained a sneer for Duncan, he sat down amidst loud applause.

So far Father Sheen had had the best of the debate. He knew it, Duncan knew it, and the audience knew it. The young minister felt his blood surge madly through his veins as he thought of it, and turning, his eyes met those of Alison Neville. He saw the look of joyful triumph that shone there. To him the girl's look was a taunt, a sneer, a scornful challenge, while the tumultuous shouts all over the hall told him of his defeat.

Perhaps all this was the best thing that could have happened for Rutland. It put him on his mettle, it made him eager to answer. He forgot Alison Neville's appeal, and remembered only her look of scorn; the experiences of the night had lost their power. Facts which he had forgotten came back to him, arguments which had evaded him, fastened themselves on his memory, and every vestige of hesitation had departed. He was able to master himself too, so that the very derisive laughter of his opponents sharpened his wits, and made his language more cutting and virile.

If his first speech was a failure, the second fully atoned for it, and the fact was fully appreciated by the audience. His youthful appearance helped him, too. There was something more than usually striking in the thought that this beardless young man was doing battle with an old warrior. His cheeks were flushed with eagerness, his eyes flashed fire, and every gesture of his lithe young form added to the effect of his words. From the body of the hall he looked only a lad of nineteen, and yet he uttered words which swayed the throng of hard-headed men and women as the branches of trees are swayed by a strong wind.

He tore Father Sheen's arguments to pieces and then threw the fragments from him. He showed how that instead of unity there was discord, and gave hard, irrefutable facts to prove how that one infallible Pope had denied the pronouncements of another infallible Pope. He described how one Pope gave a version of the Bible to the world as absolutely free from error, and who uttered an anathema upon any who should seek to alter it, and yet another Pope immediately succeeding him had discovered innumerable errors in it, and then gave the Church another so-called infallible version. He quoted instance after instance of Popes who were the vilest and most cruel of men, who connived at the basest of lies, and sanctioned the most bloody deeds. With fine humour, biting, sarcastic epigrams, and burning eloquence, he concluded an address which undermined the old priest's words, and left him from an argumentative standpoint, bruised, bleeding, and helpless.

"By Jove," said the young lawyer, who had been present the week before, and who had listened to the speech from the standpoint of a barrister seeking to convince a jury, "it's unanswerable. I thought he was going to turn out a frost to-night, but it's the best thing he's done so far."

"It's a pity the chap isn't Lancashire," replied the manufacturer to whom he spoke; "if he were, I'd try and get him to resign Tudor and stand as our next member. The fellow would make his mark in the House of Commons."

"I'd rather see him a barrister," was the young solicitor's rejoinder.

The speech affected no one, however, as it affected Father Sheen. The old man after listening to Duncan's first speech had calculated upon an easy victory; this had given him confidence and freedom of speech. Now he felt completely non-plussed. Having no skill as a debater, and not being able as many clever men do, who have a weak cause, to fasten upon side issues and make them appear principles, he left Duncan's words completely unanswered, and proceeded to give the second speech he had prepared. The hard-headed Lancashire audience felt this, and as Duncan saw Alison Neville's face, he knew that she felt it too. She was keen-minded and well educated, and prejudiced as she was in favour of her father-confessor, she could not help seeing that in spite of her hopes the battle was going against the cause she loved. Her face was drawn as if by pain, and tears of bitter disappointment came into her eyes. She hated Duncan more than ever, but she could not help seeing that he was far more than a match for the old priest. For a moment she almost wished that she had allowed the men to work their will with him at Boggart's Clough that night; but this was only for a second. Even although her cause suffered it could not have been right to allow cruelty and treachery to triumph.

Father Sheen did not even occupy his half-hour. The old man's mind was confused, and as he heard the murmurs of derision at some of his statements he forgot what he was saying and stammered piteously.

When he sat down, the audience felt that although the debate was only half through, the real issues were settled. Father Sheen had utterly stumbled at Duncan's statements proving that Papal Infallibility was an insult to the intelligence, a violation of the known facts of history, and an impious fraud.

When Duncan rose to give his final address he was met with such tumultuous applause as would turn many a young man's brains. At the same time he heard angry mutterings, and saw dark vengeful faces, and he knew that but for the presence of a large body of police he would be in great danger. Even as it was he knew that he would in future have to watch his every action closely, for he had made many enemies.

But whatever his failings, cowardice was not one of them, and so he faced the people a third time with a clear light in his eyes, and spoke to them with an unflinching voice.

"To bring this matter to a head," he said, "I purpose to conclude the debate for to-night by confining the question to one main issue, and if Father Sheen will deal with this issue honestly and fairly we shall go far to settle the question. Let us take the passage in the New Testament on which this great superstructure of the dogma of Papal Infallibility is built."

He then quoted the words of Jesus Christ concerning Peter, and the Rock on which He should build the Church.

On this passage the doctrine of the Papacy was built, and the Roman Church had claimed that Peter's powers had been transmitted to the succeeding Popes ever since. He then went on to show that for three hundred years, not one writer had ever ventured to quote these words as applying to the Bishop at Rome, not one Pope had ever used it as applying to himself; rather the great writers of the first three centuries had shown that it had an entirely different application. Then, in order to establish its claim the Roman Church had in later years issued certain manuscripts, called the Clementine Homilies and the Isidorian Decretals. These pretended to show that there had been a continuous succession of Bishops back to the time of Peter. The later Popes had accepted these Homilies and Decretals, and had placed their imprimatur upon them. Now every scholar admitted that both the Homilies and Decretals were forgeries. And thus Infallible Popes had again and again declared true, what had been again and again proved to be forgeries and lies.

These facts Duncan stated clearly and concisely, and so simply that the most ignorant in the hall could follow him, and as he did so a great hush settled upon the crowd. Father Sheen looked steadily at his shoes, while both Lady and Alison Neville watched the old man's face with evident pain.

"I will not enlarge on this," said Duncan in conclusion, "neither will I dwell upon the fact that there have been in the history of the Church rival Popes, sometimes one being in power and sometimes another. I will not urge the fact that one or more of these rival Popes must have been false, and that thus their ordinations must have been equally false, I will simply press this fact upon Father Sheen. Let him prove the continuity of the succession, let him prove that the assumption of the Papacy does not rest upon acknowledged forgeries and lies!"

An abler man might have bolstered up something like a case. He might, like a popular priest who is related to a great dignitary, have pleaded that it was not likely that millions of people through hundreds of years would have been mistaken, he might have poured forth turgid rhetoric; but Father Sheen was utterly crushed. He was not a reader of Church history, he was unable to refute Duncan's arguments; and when he sat down after uttering some feeble expletives, he knew that the Catholic faith had been but miserably defended. He knew that much might have been said, only he was unable to say it, and he felt with sorrow that even the adherents of his church would go away confused and unsettled in their minds.

"Won't you go down with us to the Priory for a light supper and a little gossip?" asked Lady Neville kindly, "you have eaten scarcely anything for days, and a change will do you good. I will tell Jenkins to drive you home."

But the old man shook his head sadly. "I am not well, Lady Neville," he said.

Duncan watched them as they left the platform, and as they neared the door he caught a look from Alison Neville. The girl's eyes fairly blazed with anger.

"Mother, I hate him," she said to Lady Neville as they drove up to the Priory door. "He may be clever, I am afraid he is, but I hate him. He will do untold harm to our Church."

"The issue is in God's hands, my darling," replied her ladyship, "let us pray for His help."

CHAPTER IX.

THE COMING OF FATHER RITZOOM.

THE next day Father Sheen's failure was the talk of the town, while Duncan woke to find himself, as far as Lynford was concerned, famous. Towards evening it leaked out that Shan Kelly and a few others had conceived a plot against him, and that but for Alison Neville he would have had vitriol thrown on him. The day after that a host of garbled stories were discussed in the mills, each of which made the young minister a hero; and when the Saturday's newspaper appeared it contained, in addition to the report of the debate, a summary of the stories concerning his adventure at Boggart's Clough. A reporter had called on him, but he absolutely refused to speak a word concerning the matter, and this fact was also duly recorded. Altogether the town was in a ferment.

The debate was the topic of conversation in three-fourths of the homes of the town, it was fervently discussed in public-houses, while a special song had been written and sung at one of the music halls.

As for Father Sheen, he had kept inside his house. No one had seen him. The young priest who acted as curate had to do all the pastoral work, and in nearly every case had done his best to prove that Duncan was an ignorant clown, if not a liar. This young man had even hinted to his superior that it might be well if the onus of the discussion were transferred to his own shoulders, as he felt quite sure he could, to use his own words, "make mincemeat of the blaspheming heretic."

But the old man had not listened to his curate; instead, he had sat quietly in his own study thinking much as to what should be done.

When he opened the Saturday's newspapers and saw the report concerning the plot against the young minister his heart sunk like lead. Much as he hated heresy he loathed the thought of such an act. He was a kind-hearted, honourable old gentleman, who scorned to do a deed of meanness. Down deep in his heart, while he was angry with Rutland, he admired him for the stand he had taken. He bore him no grudge, and if occasion occurred, he would have done him a kind action. The young minister had kept entirely free from personalities, and his language had been fair and chivalrous throughout the whole debate. The old priest had, moreover, commanded the Catholics to take no violent steps, and to use no menacing language. He had been dragged into this debate against his will; but he wanted to live at peace and concord with all men.

"BUT WHO WILL CONVERT HIM?"

"This will do untold harm," he thought as he read the news. "I must talk with Alizon about it. Anyhow, I am glad that it was a Catholic who warned him of his danger."

Then he read the report of the debate and noted the editorial comments.

"I daren't meet that audience again," he thought sadly, "I daren't. It's a subject which will be even harder to deal with than the others. 'The right of Private Judgment,' why, Rutland can do almost anything with it in speaking to a Lancashire audience, almost anything. Oh, I'm not the man for it, I know I am not! But what can I do?"

He thought long and carefully, then he started up suddenly.

"That is it," he cried, "that is it. He can see me through this business. I am glad I thought of it!"

He seized a telegraph form and wrote hastily:—
"Father Ritzoom, College of St. Joseph of Arimathea, Dublin.

"Come here immediately. Most urgent. Wire time I may meet you.

"SHEEN."

This missive he sent away hurriedly, and afterwards threw himself into an arm-chair with a contented smile upon his face.

"Yes, Ritzoom will see me through this," he thought. "Ritzoom can see a man through anything. He's as clever as the devil himself, and as full of plans. I'll not trouble any more; oh, I am glad to be rid of the whole business. But he may not be at the college, he may not be able to come! I hope and pray he can. Anyhow, I'll not worry; I'll go down to the Priory and have a chat with Alizon and her ladyship."

When he reached the Priory he found Lady Neville reading the Lynford Observer, while Alizon stood near her, eagerly looking at the books on the library shelves.

"I am glad to see you," said Lady Neville, "very glad. I wish to talk with you."

"Oh, I am glad to come," cried Father Sheen, "I have been so worried. I've neither been able to sleep nor eat. That debate—that debate has been like a nightmare to me."

"Has been, why, it is not finished yet."

"Oh yes, it is as far as I am concerned."

"How?"

"I could not go on with it, Lady Neville, I simply could not. My brain is all of a whirl. I am getting to be an old man, and I am not able to bear excitement. Besides, our opinion concerning that last subject, 'The Right of Private Judgment,' is not the kind of thing that goes down with Lancashire people."

Lady Neville had felt this as keenly as Father Sheen had felt it, and had thought of writing him concerning the matter.

"But what are you going to do?"

"I have telegraphed for Father Ritzoom to come and see me."

"What, Ritzoom the Jesuit?"

"Yes. He's the cleverest man I know, and I—I think he likes me."

"Of course he likes you, every one does; but I am not sure that I——" she stopped suddenly, evidently deeming it unwise to complete the sentence.

"He'll see me through this—if he can come."

"Do you anticipate that he will take your place in the debate?"

"Yes, I expect so. I really am ill, Lady Neville, such another night as last Wednesday would kill me. I can explain in Wednesday morning's papers, that being physically unfitted for the work, I have asked a friend to take my place. You see it is not as though I hadn't done my best, I've not shown myself a coward—and—and I'm an old man."

"I think you have acted wisely," replied her ladyship, "but however clever Father Ritzoom may be, I'm afraid the mischief's done."

"In what way?"

"Well, you see, the people will say that you've been obliged to call in an outsider; besides, that affair at Boggart's Clough will not tell in our favour."

"I never heard of it till this morning. What is the exact truth about this matter?"

Alizon, who had been listening intently to what had been said, now joined in the conversation, and told Father Sheen exactly what had happened."

"It seems that some of our people must have blurted out the story themselves," remarked the priest when she had finished.

"It would seem so."

"Just like them, just like them. If they had succeeded it would have come out all the same. What a mercy Alizon was in time; for if they had harmed Rutland in any way, the town would have gone wild. I must say, however, that the young fellow has behaved very well."

"I think so, too," remarked Lady Neville, "for my own part, although Alizon does not like him, I think he is a fine gentlemanly young fellow. He's clever, too."

"Yes, he's clever," sighed Father Sheen, "there can be no doubt about that; and it was certainly good of him to refuse to say anything to the reporters. He could have made it appear that it was Alizon who incited Kelly and the rest of them; as it is, she will appear in an entirely different light."

"If they don't themselves tell the truth."

"Yes, yes, I must see to that. I'll call on them on my way back. Anyhow, Rutland seems all right."

"I hate him," cried Alizon hotly. She had not meant to have spoken, but the words escaped her before she was aware.

"Ah well, we must love our enemies, my child," remarked the old man, "and I think you have acted very nobly. But I must get back. I hope Ritzoom's telegram will await me at home."

"If Father Ritzoom comes, please bring him down," said Lady Neville.

"Thank you, I will. Oh, Ritzoom will turn the tables entirely. He's such a clever fellow. I shall have no fear if he can come. I wish I had thought of him before."

When Father Sheen reached his house after making a few calls he found a telegram awaiting him.

"Cannot arrive before Monday night. Meet 6.10 train from Manchester."

"RITZOOM."

"Our Lady be praised!" ejaculated the old priest fervently. "I shall be able to enjoy my dinner to-day."

On the Monday evening Father Sheen was early at the station, and waited anxiously for the Manchester train to appear.

"Oh, I do hope nothing has happened to detain him," muttered the old man as it drew up to the platform. "Ah, there he is!"

As some of my readers may possibly have become acquainted with Father Ritzoom, I will not attempt to describe him here.* Indeed, such a task would not be at all easy, for he belonged to that class of man which defies description. Father Sheen felt this as he caught his outstretched hand. The older man somehow felt as though he were enveloped by a strange influence, an influence which made him hesitating and nervous.

"I'm so glad to see you," he said, "so glad. It is good of you to come. I hope you have had a pleasant journey."

"I really have not thought of it."

"Haven't you? I was afraid you would be cold and miserable."

"I'm hungry, if that's worth talking about."

"Oh, I've provided for that."

"I hope you have some good cigars, too. If you haven't I'll buy some on the way."

"No, don't. Good cigars are my one luxury, and I'm well stocked. Shall I get a cab, or will you walk back to the house? It will take us about ten minutes."

"I think I'd rather walk."

"That's right. I can tell you on the way why I've taken the liberty to send for you."

"I don't wish to hear anything about it."

"But—but—"

"Time enough for that. I'm hungry, and I want a smoke. I thought I had better not indulge in a pipe on the way. There were a good many people in the carriage, and some of them lived at Lynford, I gathered."

On the way Father Sheen talked incessantly, but nervously. It was easy to see that he was somewhat afraid of the man he had summoned to help him. Ritzoom, however, never spoke a word, nor did he seem to pay much heed to what Father Sheen was saying. Rather, he was closely scrutinising the people who passed him, and the town through which they walked.

Presently they came to the Catholic Church, when he lifted his hat reverently. He was dressed in ordinary clerical attire, having for the time discarded the Jesuit's distinctive dress.

"Do you live far from here, Sheen?"

"About three minutes more."

"That is right;" and then he was silent until he had taken off his overcoat and hat, and sat in the old priest's study.

"Dinner is quite ready, Ritzoom."

"Thank heaven."

The two men entered the dining-room, and Ritzoom ate heartily, but spoke scarcely a word. Once when Father Sheen began to refer to his reasons for summoning him to Lynford, he shrugged his shoulders impatiently.

"Let's enjoy dinner, Sheen," he said, "the whole night's before us, and you have plenty of cigars."

The older man sighed pathetically and went on eating. "I almost wish I hadn't asked him to come," he thought, "he makes me think of the picture of the devil playing chess with a man for his soul."

When dinner was over, however, and they sat down before the study fire, the Jesuit unbended somewhat.

"Let's have a look at your newspapers for these last two weeks," he said, as he lit his first cigar.

Father Sheen looked at him questioningly.

"The fellows were talking about it in the railway carriage," replied the Jesuit, answering the query in the other's eyes. "I saw the placards on the walls as we came along, too. Some announcing the debate, and others informing the public that full accounts were given of the same in the Lynford Observer. Let's see the papers."

The old priest gave them to him without a word, and then waited quietly while he scanned them. In three minutes he threw them aside with a gesture of impatience.

"This is the bother, I suppose?"

"Yes," replied Father Sheen pathetically. "Let me tell you how the thing commenced."

"What's the use of that?—but stay, it may be of interest. Go on."

The priest told his story with a fair amount of precision. Here and there he wandered, as though the facts were not clear to his own mind, still he gave the Jesuit a fair idea of what had passed.

All the time he was speaking Ritzoom sat in a large arm-chair, smoking steadily. He never once opened his eyes, nor did a muscle of his face move. His large, square features were apparently in repose, as though the man had given himself entirely over to the luxury of smoking.

"And that is all!" he said presently.

"Yes, it is all I can remember."

The Jesuit went on smoking for several minutes in silence, his eyes still closed, his face as still as that of a statue.

"Well!" he said at length.

* See Author's novel, "The Scarlet Woman."

"I hope it is 'well,'" said Father Sheen with a feeble laugh. "I hope, too, that you'll take my place in the debate on Wednesday night?"

"I certainly shall not."

"Then I—I suppose I shall have to—to—meet him myself unless—that is——" he did not finish the sentence, but relapsed into silence, his chin resting heavily on his chest.

"I suppose you know what you've done?"

"No—that is——"

"Excuse me for speaking plainly, Sheen, but we are here alone. You've been a consummate ass, a blithering idiot. There, I take the liberty of an old friend."

"I am afraid I have," replied Father Sheen meekly, "I am afraid I have. My speeches were not to the point, and Rutland——"

"Your speeches were all right, better, indeed, than I thought you could give."

"I am glad to hear you say so," said the old man, evidently much pleased.

"But you were a fool to tackle him at all. Never any good resulted from a public debate yet. They have always made more perverts than converts. In this case the fellow evidently wiped the floor with you."

"I am afraid so."

"How old is Rutland?"

"About twenty-six, I'm told. He looks even younger."

"He seems a fellow capable of pathos, passion, humour, eloquence."

"Yes, yes, all that."

"Highly sensitive, of an artistic temperament."

"Yes, certainly."

"He's capable of realising the historical spirit."

"Yes," replied Father Sheen, although he hardly knew what the Jesuit meant.

"You must not meet him on Wednesday night. No one must meet him, he must have a clear field."

"But—but that will never do. Think of what the town will say. I shall be a by-word, so will the Church."

"So much the better."

"I—I do not understand."

"I did not think you would. But that does not matter. Let him say his hardest things about us, let him prove us to be falsifiers of history, logic, common-sense, morality, everything good. The stronger his statements the better for us."

"I am utterly at a loss to know what you mean."

"Of course you are."

"But why will it be the better for him to say all these things, while no one replies?"

"Because before they are forgotten he will in that very hall recant them, deny them, and pray heaven to forgive him for saying them! Then all his sayings will recoil upon the Protestants, and tell in our favour, and there will be a large ingathering into our Church."

"But how can this be?"

"Oh, easily!"

"But that will mean that he will have to be converted."

"Exactly."

"Oh, but you do not know him. He is a Protestant every inch of him. He is a student of history, he laughs at our claims, ridicules the Pope, and holds up our doctrines to contempt. And mind, it will take a clever man to prove him in the wrong. I really did not think that Protestants had such a strong case. You see, they will not accept the authority of the Church to begin with."

"Of course not, and that is where you made a fool of yourself by arguing with him. But it does not matter; indeed, we will turn it all to our advantage. He is young, he will be converted."

"But who will convert him? You?"

"No," and the Jesuit laughed quietly.

"Who, then?"

"A woman!"

"A woman! What woman?"

"You must be dense not to guess. You will know soon. I must see him. But it will be all right. I have not studied men a quarter of a century for nothing, and as surely as my name is Anthony Ritzoom, of the Society of Jesus, it will be as I say."

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

III.—THE FREE CHURCH CATECHISM.

THE rising generation of Free Churchmen have had little, many think too little, acquaintance with catechisms. They have gone out of vogue to a great extent in England. Scotsmen are still reared on the Shorter Catechism, and in the Ritualistic Churches of England children are drilled in catechisms which are in too many instances mischievous in their teaching; but the old-fashioned catechetical teaching of a generation ago has been to a great extent abandoned by the Free Churches.

Why is this? Many reasons might be given for the change. The catechism has become unpopular no doubt; but why? In part this is due to the new methods of Sunday School teaching. These are more scientific than those which obtained a few years ago, and with greater efficiency in the teachers, and more time given to the work of preparation, the catechism has got crowded out. Then doubts have crept in as to the value of the catechism. It has been thought to be an irksome method of imparting, or rather of receiving, religious knowledge. Memories of dreary Sunday afternoons or evenings devoted to the task of committing to memory pages of dry theological definitions are among the recollections of youth that are not pleasant, and it is felt that such experiences did not tend to make the Sabbath a delight.

But are we to say that the fault is in catechetical teaching, per se, or in the instruments by means of which that teaching has been carried out? There can be no doubt the catechisms in use in nearly all the Free Churches have become obsolete and unsuited to the changed conditions of the time. Instead of abandoning this method of imparting religious instruction, the Churches would have done well to address themselves to the task of revising their manuals of instruction. For there can be no doubt the catechism gave a solid basis of religious knowledge that can scarcely be secured in any other way. One of the defects of the knowledge of many of the children brought up in connection with our Sunday Schools is its indefiniteness. Moreover, the knowledge, such as it is, is not verifiable. There is a certain acquaintance with the great fundamental truths of our holy religion, but it is not accurate, and so nebulous in its character that the child can give no intelligent account of what he knows. The best remedy for this is definite catechetical teaching.

Since, therefore, the need of the time is a good catechism, it is a matter for congratulation that the Free Churches have turned their attention to the subject. But the remarkable thing is that the result is a catechism which is calculated to meet the needs of all the Free Churches. This catechism is a sign and symbol of the most remarkable movement of the latter half of the nineteenth century, viz., the Federation of the Free Churches of England and Wales. The readers of this magazine can scarcely have failed to learn something of this great movement. In brief, it seeks to secure among the Evangelical Free Churches of this country such unity as will enable them heartily to co-operate in the work of securing the great spiritual ends in which they are all alike interested, and for which they exist. The doctrinal differences which once divided these churches into hostile camps have largely disappeared, and there is a general desire to emphasise, not the points of difference, which are few and non-vital for the most part, but the points of agreement, which are many and of vital importance. The movement has spread to every part of the country, and instead of being a number of isolated forces the Free Churches have become one great united body, animated by one common purpose, and able to concentrate its strength on any great issue.

The new catechism is a happy and significant symbol of this new unity. This catechism has been prepared by a committee composed of representatives of all the Free Churches—Congregationalists, Wesleyan Methodists, Baptists, Primitive Methodists, Presbyterians, Methodist New Connexion, Bible Christians, and the United Methodist Free Church. The representatives were appointed by the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, and not by their own communions. No church, therefore, is responsible for the catechism, but the gentlemen chosen were such as had been recognised as representative men by the churches to which they belonged. Our own representatives on the committee were the Editor of the Magazines, the Rev. H. B. Kendall, B.A., and Professor Peake of the Manchester College. The Editor tells the writer there is nothing in his experience on which he dwells with more satisfaction than these revision meetings.

The result of the labours of the committee lies before us, and, taken as a whole, is a very satisfactory production. It admirably realises the ideal with which this work was undertaken. The new catechism is Catholic rather than denominational, and is up to date. This does not mean that any doctrine is, or could be superseded, but that the catechetical statements "have been expressed in modern language rather than in obsolete terms which involve the risk of ambiguity or misapprehension." The catechism has the great advantage of brevity. The total number of answers is only fifty-two, so that the entire ground may be covered by taking one question and answer per week in the course of one year. Under question 28, however, which deals with the interpretation of the Commandments, we have ten additional questions and answers; while under question 32 we have a similar series of six questions and answers dealing with the Lord's Prayer. These can easily be omitted by the younger children, and as they grow older they will have no difficulty in mastering the sections dealing with these important questions.

Let it here be observed that the catechism is nothing less than a series of definitions of the great truths held by the Evangelical Churches. That the committee ultimately accepted each definition unanimously is a very remarkable sign of the times. At what other period of the history of the Church would it have been possible to secure such unanimity? The claim that this catechism is a symbol of the essential unity of the Evangelical Free Churches is surely well founded. And it is gratifying to think that the theologians who have prepared the catechism represent, directly or indirectly, the beliefs of not less, and probably many more, than eighty millions of avowed Christians in all parts of the world.

Of course, the catechism is not above criticism. What human document is? The purpose of this article, however, is not criticism, but hearty commendation, and to call the attention of all our people, and especially of our young people, to the value and significance of this remarkable exposition of Free Church doctrines and principles. The catechism does not venture beyond definition. Proof texts are not given, and on the whole the omission was wise, nay, inevitable. Proof texts are responsible for not a little of the prevalent misinterpretation of the Scriptures. The expositions of doctrine combine simplicity with fulness, and can easily be committed to memory by a very young child.

In addition to the doctrines which are commonly believed amongst us, we have definitions on questions of vital interest to young Free Churchmen. To the question, What is the Holy Catholic Church? the following answer is given: "It is that Holy Society of believers in Christ Jesus which He founded, of which He is the Head, and in which He dwells by His Spirit; so that, though made up of many communions, organised in various modes, and scattered throughout the world, it is yet One in Him." This is a capital definition, and will be most helpful to the young. Even more valuable is the answer to the question, What is the essential mark of a true branch of the Catholic Church? an answer which strikes at the root of those mischievous pretensions which are so confidently put forth by too many of the clergy of the Anglican Church. Here is the answer, and well were it for the rising generation of the Free Churches if the truth thus set forth could be thoroughly grasped. It would be a valuable equipment for the struggle of the coming time. "The essential mark of a true branch of the Catholic Church is the presence of Christ, through His indwelling Spirit, manifested in holy life and fellowship." The catechism, in fact, is just the manual of Free Church principles so much needed at the present time when the most erroneous and intolerant teaching is being given in the Episcopal Churches of the land. This catechism should be in every Free Church home, and might with great advantage be employed both there and in our Sunday Schools.

We cannot close without once more expressing our wonder and delight at the fact that the closing years of this century have witnessed so remarkable an event as the gathering round a table of Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, and Methodists, who have been found able deliberately to agree upon a common statement of faith in relation to every doctrine of fundamental importance. It may not herald that organic union for which many have so long yearned, but it is at least a striking symbol of a growth of that spiritual union which is perhaps all that can be hoped for in this mundane state. As such it is a sign which all true believers will hail with joy and gratitude as a sure proof of the progress of the Kingdom of God.

JOSEPH RITSON.

Not the Least Sign.

(FIRST REPORT.)

"There is nothing."—1 KINGS xviii. 43.

E read that fierce drought had lasted three years and a half in the land of Israel when Elijah set himself to pray for rain. On the top of Mount Carmel, overlooking the Mediterranean Sea, which stretches westward from its base to the Atlantic Ocean, he bent his knees and bowed his head in supplication to Him who holds the elements of nature under His control. When he began to pray appearances were as unpromising as ever. Not a cloud was to be seen: the sky was like a dome of burnished steel. Seven times he sent his servant to look out towards the sea to see whether there was any sign of rain, and six times he returned with the same discouraging report, "There is nothing." In appearance there was nothing, but in reality the artillery of the clouds was collecting in the distance, and Elijah, seeing by faith what his servant could not see by common sight, prayed on till he prevailed and till the rain descended in torrents on all the thirsty land.

Let us consider this report, "There is nothing," delivered on Mount Carmel as one that is tendered every day in reference to matters small and great, where, because it is based on a partial estimate, it is egregiously mistaken. We have heard it a thousand times in our own secret thoughts, and we have heard it we know not how often from the lips of other men. It is a true report we must admit respecting many things. There is nothing in a shadow: it is only the absence of light. There is nothing prophetic in an ordinary, uninspired dream. There is nothing in many an appearance of helpful or of hostile intention on the part of men towards us that means anything of the kind. There is nothing satisfying in the vanities of the world. But the history leads us to confine the report to that numerous class of cases where it is a delusion and a snare, or where its applicability is transitory.

I. "There is nothing."—IT IS THE ACCOUNT OF BEGINNINGS, NOT OF ENDINGS.

When you begin to pray there is no change in the situation: the difficulty shows no sign of shifting, the burden on your spirit is as heavy as before. It may even seem for a time to be heavier because of the earnest attention directed towards it and the vividness with which it is realised. When you enter on some useful work there is perhaps nothing to be seen that encourages you to proceed: there is no evidence that you will succeed in your endeavours. Nay, adverse opinions which had been silent are now freely expressed, and forces of resistance which had slumbered are roused into activity. This is the appearance of things at the beginning and many give up disheartened. But how different the scene at the close to those who have persevered! Results are there before them which are the embodiment of all the effort they have expended with a rich interest upon the outlay. Sow the field with wheat and harrow it in. Then to-morrow in your impatience for results unbare the grains. They are the same as when sown: no signs of sprouting. But wait a few months and the ripened corn fills all the field and the harvesters have come for its ingathering.

The annals of philanthropic and of missionary effort furnish many an example of the same thing in the spiritual field. It is God's way of working. Time enters as an element into the processes of His Providence. If the next instant after we had begun to pray or to labour for anything it was obtained, where would be the trial of our faith? and where the discipline of our powers?

Nothing! in these cases of which we are now speaking, it is the cypher that is written down first: the positive figure will be placed on the left hand of it at last, and will derive from it tenfold value. The two will become twenty and the nine ninety, and if, as in Elijah's case, there are six cyphers to begin with, a single figure of one to the left will make of them a million.

II. "There is nothing"—IT IS THE LANGUAGE OF IGNORANCE.

When a man does not know that a thing exists, it is just the same to him as if it did not, though its existence may be a grand reality with a very direct bearing upon his welfare. His thoughts are the same, his feelings are the same, and by necessary consequence, his conduct is the same as if the really solid fact were not a fact at all, and it had never entered into any one's head to suppose it was a fact. Meanwhile, one who is in possession of the truth is looking at him amazed, or it may be amused at his simplicity.

Strictly speaking every one of us is ignorant. He is ignorant of more things ten thousand times over than he knows. The most learned man is comparatively illiterate. The ripest Christian is but a child slowly learning his alphabet in the school of wisdom. And on account of this great ignorance the wisest often sees a blank leaf when it is in reality crowded with characters. His thoughts come in from their outlook with the report that there is nothing, when the fact is there is a scene full of wonder and delight, into which God has put so many of His deeper thoughts that a man might spend a lifetime in trying to unravel them, and he would still be only at the beginning.

But this is not the kind of ignorance of which the history leads us to think. It is largely in accordance with the will of God, who has fashioned us with limited powers so that we cannot take in the whole of truth, and what progress we make must necessarily be gradual. But we speak now of ignorance as it is popularly understood: ignorance that ought not to be: ignorance that is a shame to the man himself, or to those who have had his training,—mother, not of devotion, but of superstition and of innumerable evils. This gross and reprehensible ignorance is one of the greatest foes to the happiness of mankind that exists, and it is to be fought against with weapons of light, truth, and knowledge, and the Word of God—the Holy Spirit's own sword.

What a dull dreary round the lives of myriads are because they know so little that is calculated to inspire them, to brighten their existence, and to give them an interest in the things by which they are surrounded! What cruelties are practised, what vices and crimes are committed, simply for want of knowing better! How dogged the resistance, or stolid the indifference, which noble causes encounter from multitudes because they have no knowledge of the facts by which those causes are supported. How inoperative are the most beautiful truths of religion and the richest and most helpful statements of Scripture to those who have never read them or had them made known to them! "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost."

Jesus weeping over Jerusalem said, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least, in this thy day, the things that belong unto thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes." It might be truly said to millions: If you had only known, you would not have been where you are, nor what you are. If only light were poured in upon your mind disclosing the exact situation, how differently you would think and speak about many things; you would laugh, indeed, at the absurd fantasies which have possessed you, but on the other hand you would be enthusiastic where now you are indifferent; you would be reverent where now you mock; you would change the road you are pursuing; you would alter the plan of your life.

III. "There is nothing"—IT IS THE REPORT OF UNBELIEF.

Ignorance says, There is nothing, because it has never heard that there is anything; but unbelief says, There is nothing, after being taught that there is something: after the subject of it has come from amid the influences of a Christian home and sat under the preaching of the Gospel from childhood, and read the Bible through and through, and perused many theological books. Not that the majority of those who deny the truth of religion do so after such an extensive acquaintance with the subject. But here and there one may do so, for mere logic never yet made a man devout: learning, talent, genius have no prerogative for discerning spiritual things: religion is not a thing that admits of a "quod erat demonstrandum" like Euclid's geometry: it is of such a nature that he who chooses to doubt may doubt, and may bring forward very plausible reasons for his infidelity. So it is possible for the intelligent, as well as the ignorant, to say, "There is nothing," where there is everything: everything worth living for, and everything for which a martyr could most rejoice to die.

Unbelief looks on the Bible and sees but a collection of ancient documents bound up together in one volume, and not a lamp to guide along the path of life lit by inspiration for our use. Unbelief looks out on the universe and sees no sign of the presence of an infinitely glorious Creator. Unbelief looks back on life and sees no Providential discipline to make us holy: looks forward to death and sees no entrance on a life eternal, but an absolute melancholy end, the final termination of our conscious existence. Unbelief looks at the cross and sees no sacrifice for human guilt, no revelation of the love of God to sinners. Unbelief looks on religion and sees so many forms and ceremonies, so many dry, dead dogmas, but no new birth nor Divine life, no friendship with God, no service to men for His sake. In short, unbelief, like a babbling idiot, blind and deaf, keeps muttering, "There is nothing," in the face of the grandest realities, and in the presence of the sublimest mysteries such as John Milton and Sir Isaac Newton studied with reverent delight, and such as angels' desire to look into after untold ages of progressive thought.

And when unbelief has really begun its work nobody knows where it will end. Its natural course is that of the inclined plane; its passion is that of a destroyer, and in too many instances, though not always, it continues its destructive activity until it has pulled down the fabric of faith to its foundations, and brought around the soul such a scene of desolation as we know has compelled some for very distress to return to the faith of their early years. No spiritual world, no Divine revelation, no Redeemer from sin, no future state of being, no God, no pure and holy standard of living—this is the sad series of negations through which we sometimes see the unbeliever run, crying out as he reaches each successive stage, There is nothing! There is nothing! There is nothing! nothing but a superstitious spell that once bound me broken; nothing but a dream of my childhood cruelly disappointed. So cries the unbeliever as he accomplishes his downward course, until it may be, when he has lost everything and begins to be in want, he yearns like another prodigal for his Father's house, and says, "I cannot live on doubts: I want to believe something. There is a God, or the universe is a splendid riddle. If there is not a hereafter, there ought to be. And if I give up Christ, what teacher shall I find half so wise and good to fill His place? Lord, I believe: help Thou mine unbelief."

IV. "There is nothing"—IT IS THE CRY OF DESPAIR.

Despair is the infidelity of the heart. It has reference, not to the doctrines of religion which may be admitted to be quite true, but to something which is to be done or to be obtained on behalf of ourselves, or on behalf of others. It is the very opposite of faith in its nature, and by consequence its effects are as different as they can be. While faith brings the distant near, despair removes that which is really close at hand so far away that it cannot be seen. Faith sinks the mountain to a plain: despair magnifies the mole-hill into a mountain. Faith creates the success in which it believes: despair brings about the ruin which it dreads. So our great dramatist has said:

"Our doubts are traitors,
And make us lose the good we oft might win,
By fearing to attempt it."

How many give up works of usefulness in which they are engaged, and lay aside plans of action which, if carried out, must have resulted in much good, because they do not see at once the success which they desired and expected! They look at present appearances, and because there is nothing, conclude that there never will be anything. And with a mad waste of time and toil they wait, it may be through the worst, then when they are on the point of reaping the fruit of all their labour, they give up; like one who should construct a chain from the staple at one end link by link until all that was wanting was the staple at the other end to turn the time spent in the construction of the chain to account, and at that very point should discontinue his work.

How many lose heart respecting the ultimate triumph of the Redeemer's Kingdom, because they both underrate the good that has been already done, and the extent to which Christianity has spread among the most advanced nations, and because they do not take into account the one great factor in the sum which turns impossibility into certainty of achievement—that the cause is God's and therefore must prevail.

How many, after ineffectual attempts made in a fitful and unscriptural manner to obtain the rest and peace, the spiritual strength and victorious power over temptation promised to obedient faith, have come to the conclusion that it is of no use trying for these high things: have accommodated their weakness by lowering their standard and have sunk into apathy, content if they could be reckoned as good as their neighbours.

Let us, then, refuse to credit the reports which are brought to us by ignorance, by unbelief, and by despair; let us stop our ears to their creaking. They tell us there is nothing, when in reality there is very much, and more than we can conceive. Nothing? There is something in working righteousness and doing good that will bear looking back upon, and will give lasting satisfaction to the mind. Nothing? There is an Almighty Father who loves us and cares for us, and who is always with us whoever else be present or absent. Nothing? There is a Heaven of glory a little farther on, where sin and sorrow and death shall be done away; where life shall be enjoyed in its fulness, and all things that oppress it shall be cast off for ever. Nothing? There are beautiful truths, there are pure pleasures, there is fruitful labour, there are enterprises of vast moment, there are opportunities of service, there are possibilities, both of attainment and achievement, worthy of our utmost endeavours, and of all the sacrifices that we may be required to make. And though at the beginning the empty echo may seem to mock our most earnest prayers, and every token of encouragement may be withheld from our view, the end shall show that from the beginning the Divine power was working for their fulfilment.

Z.

THE only conclusive evidence of a man's sincerity is that he gives himself for a principle. Words, money, all things else, are comparatively easy to give away; but when a man makes a gift of his daily life and practice it is plain that the truth, whatever it may be, has taken possession of him.—J. R. Lowell.

Candle-Snuffing.

HE was a superannuated estate carpenter, living in his "neatly-thatched cottage," and devoting his declining years to "keeping together the cause" associated with the little whitewashed chapel on the village green. He had served his earthly masters so long that current rumour would have it, correctly or otherwise, that if his daily peregrinations to and from duty had been performed on a straight line, that line would have belted the globe. Certain it is, that while the estate itself had changed hands more than once in the last half century, he had held his own against all comers until his genial presence seemed necessary to any thing approaching completeness. But "age never comes alone," and in this case its unwelcome attendant was a condition of semi-blindness which compelled his retirement on a well-earned pension.

The chapel in question being ten miles from the circuit town, was never overdone with ministerial talent. The pulpit was, by common consent, the most difficult of all to fill, on account of—not its structural capacity, or its fastidious hearers, but—its isolation. This fact gave ample opportunity to our retired brother to display his genius as a lay preacher, and popular opinion declared him equal to each occasion, whether the outcome of appointment or disappointment.

It was on a bitterly cold, dark, December night that "the Super was planned." No one expected many hearers to turn out that night. And, besides, it was so near Christmas, and, most significant of all, the morrow was "dead poultry day" at the nearest market town. All things considered, it was not the time for a formal sermon, but for thoughtful conference and prayer on the state of the cause, and "week of revivals," to be held at "the full of the next moon." After urging the necessity for daily prayer, careful visitation, and full consecration to God, the Super affirmed his opinion that everyone present could do something to ensure success. How can that be? thought the little granddaughter of the village layman, who shared the home of the old man. What can a child of ten years do? And the next hour and a half was spent in anxious thought.

The last train which drew up at the station of a neighbouring village had safely carried the Super to his home in the circuit town. The old thumb-worn Bible had been read in the cottage-home of the village patriarch. The family altar had also been erected, and from it earnest, simple prayer had ascended to heaven, in which the cause, the Super, and the coming revivals shared a conspicuous place. Scarcely had the final Amen been uttered when the little girl, in the flutter of an uncontrollable excitement, exclaimed, "Oh, grandfather, I've just thought of it!" "Thought of what?" was the bewildered inquiry of the old man not yet in the know of things. "Why, don't you know, grandfather, that Mr.—" said everyone of us could do something to help on the cause. And I could not for the life of me think what I could do until you had just finished prayer, and then it came to me as clear as the light, and as though in answer to it, that I can snuff the pulpit candles." The day of the old-fashioned tallow-candles was not yet over, and required frequent snuffing. But as the preacher's hand was unsteady, and his "sight indifferent," it often happened that they were snuffed out when the old man attempted the task—an incident which always told upon the risibilities of the farm servants present. Thenceforward, up to the time petroleum invaded the monopoly of cotton-wick and tallow, our juvenile heroine ascended the pulpit prior to hymn, lesson, and text, and deftly rendered valuable help in keeping the cause together, by the humble discharge of simple but indispensable duty as candle-snuffer to God's house.

How easy it is for the open hand to find work, and how soon is the willing worker suited—drawer of water, hewer of wood, server of tables, anything, everything that glorifies God in the service of humanity is acceptable, and fits into the scheme of things.

Our thoughts are involuntarily carried to another village which has its chapel and its cause, but the pulpit here is shared by small farmers, tradesmen, and labourers. Near the sanctuary lived a bachelor farmer, a noble and interesting specimen of a type almost extinct. He confessed to having had a good start in life, and to having made money when "rents were low, rates reasonable, and when wheat, now hardly worth growing, could be sold at three pound per quarter." His Sabbaths were usually divided into three parts. Morning saw him at the parish church sitting under the rector. Afternoon found him in the little chapel which stood sheltered in one of his own fields, and where, on collection Sundays, his half-crown piece told perceptibly on the village revenue. In the evening he was at home in order that "the servants might have a chance."

The village lamp of truth was burning none too brightly. Times were hard, "prices down," labour scarce; and the circuit finances bore every evidence of it all. One day the farmer had it on his mind to send for the circuit steward. "Well, Mr. —," said he, "I thought I would like a little talk with you. I know things are none too bright in the circuit, and I thought I could brighten them a bit. I cannot do much for the cause; I'm no preacher, as you know. And as for singing, why, I've no voice at all; but if it's acceptable, I can find you a bit of money now and then. Will a five pound note help you?"

"Yes; certainly!" And the effect of it when unexpectedly placed upon the table of the Quarterly Meeting was almost magical. How it separated the ashes of despair from the flickering flame of official energy! How it let in the oxygen of hope and re-kindled enthusiasm to a flame, as each "thanked God and took courage!" And the circuit luminary blazed forth with increased effulgence because the "balance due" was snuffed out. He was actually thought good enough for a fourth year.

Here is another village with its chapel and its cause; and here a humble labourer, whose weekly revenue stands about midway in the teens of shillings, is largely in evidence. And oh, what a specimen of practical Christianity! His character is irreproachable, his life a sermon, his whole being a sacrifice to God. It is camp-meeting day, the great day of the year, and he is therefore seen to advantage, especially so by the one privileged to be his guest. It is a day on which all nature seems to put on her best. The midsummer sun pours down a flood of golden light from a cloudless sky, to be broken only by the outspreading branches of the apple orchard, in which the waggon-pulpit is temporarily lodged, while half developed "real Hereford Blenheims"—the world's prize-taker—hang about the preacher's ears. On leaving the camp-ground our friend remarks that the "tone" of the service indicates a "breakdown before the day's end," and his opinion is largely shared by others. Before dinner a walk is taken in the garden, and the timid preacher—a first-year probationer—remarks upon the beauty and variety of the garden fruits. "Yes," was the reply, "and how blessed it is to look at the gift and bless the Giver!" The preacher readily assented to the suggestion. An extensive and varied landscape presented itself at another point of observation, when the preacher said, "How grand!" "Yes," said the cottager, whose life had been spent in such surroundings, "and if God can produce such grandeur in a world cursed with sin, and which has so many drawbacks as this has, what can He do for us in a world without sin and where everything is to His mind?" The preacher was embarrassed with the magnitude of the inquiry, and the more he thought on it the more the embarrassment grew on him. At "grace before dinner" God was not only thanked for the food, but was desired to so bless "our young man" that he might break the bread of life to many hungry multitudes. "Grace after dinner" was said kneeling, and God invoked for a "feast of fat things" at the camp meeting. From this soul-bracing atmosphere the young preacher went forth to take charge of his first camp meeting service. And what a service it was! Heaven is fuller to-day on its account. And all was the outcome, under God, of the effective manner in which the pulpit candles had been snuffed in the humble home of the village labourer.

Like a sky with a sunbeam,
Is a face lit up with a smile;
I saw it to-day as I passed on my way,
And it lightened the road a good mile.

FIG. 1. A LUSTRE.

FIG. 2. SET OF THREE GLASS PRISMS.

A Piece of Glass.

BY ARTHUR E. GOODMAN.

THE ancient Phoenician, according to tradition, or the still more remote Egyptian—if we wish to assign the important discovery of the manufacture of glass, with more probability of correctness to the proper person—could not by any possibility have foreseen a tithe of the utility of his discovery, or have had any comprehension of the vastness of the mines of knowledge his discovery would open up. To him it represented something novel, and, when fashioned and coloured according to his crude ideas, something which was, to his eyes and those of his contemporaries, an object of beauty.

To the Phoenicians undoubtedly, however, can be given the credit of first making transparent glass, and it is to such a piece that the present article refers.

The hundred and one everyday applications of glass for the purposes of ornamentation and ministration to our comfort and luxury, are patent to everyone, and do not concern us here; but there are some uses of glass of a scientific nature which have led to the most far-reaching results that could well be conceived, and which will well repay investigation. It is with the view of explaining one of these uses, and of giving some indication of the vast field of knowledge which has been rendered accessible to the human mind that the present article has been prepared.

The great variety of purposes to which glass can be applied is to be explained by its many properties; hence to understand the adaptability of glass to a given purpose, is to be conversant with the particular property upon which the suitability of glass for that purpose depends.

The behaviour of a triangular prism of clear glass upon light can scarcely be termed a modern discovery, for some two hundred years ago Sir Isaac Newton devoted considerable time and study to the examination of the colours into which white light was split by a glass prism.

This property of glass prisms was popularised in the earlier days of our parents by the introduction of the ornaments, now considered somewhat old-fashioned, known as lustres, a good specimen of which is reproduced in Fig. 1. The same principle is the basis of the more modern device of bevelling the edges of glass mirrors.

Whether we admire the effect of the bevelled mirrors, or prefer the old-fashioned lustre, the production of those many-coloured patches of light of rainbow hues on the walls of our rooms contains much more of interest than mere ornamentation.

Sir Isaac Newton early proved to the scientists of his time the origin of these beautiful colours. The diagram in Fig. 3 illustrates the experiment he made. In the shutter of a darkened room he made a small hole, S, through which a ray of sunlight could be made to pass. In the diagram a candle is employed for producing the ray of light. Placed so that the beam of light shall fall obliquely on one of its sides was a glass prism, A, the effect of which was to bend the ray out of its course and to project a coloured band of light on the screen E,—the colours being identical with those of the rainbow—of which the red is the least and the violet the most deflected from the original path of the ray.

The explanation of this simple experiment is not equally simple. It is based on what is known as the "wave theory" of light, which assumes that surrounding every atom of matter is an extremely elastic and subtle medium termed the "luminiferous ether," and that light is merely a state of rapid wave-like vibration of this ether, which travels forwards at a rate of some 185,000 miles per second. A certain rate of vibration always produces the same colour effect on the nerves of the human eye, whilst any alteration in the speed of the vibrations causes a corresponding change in the colour of the light as seen by the eye.

The rates of these vibrations can be most accurately calculated, and it may be of interest to note that red light has the somewhat rapid rate of vibration of 434,420,000,000,000 oscillations per second, whilst violet light has a rate of vibration nearly double, having no fewer than 758,840,000,000,000 oscillations per second. Between these two rates there is, of course, every intermediate speed, each one producing its own shade of colour, and so giving rise to the infinite variety of shades of colour in the spectrum.

It must further be understood that when a ray of light passes obliquely from one substance to another of different density, its path is altered, as is seen in Fig. 3, where the path of the ray is deflected from its course both on entering and again on emerging from the glass prism. All rays of light, however, are not equally deflected; those having the slowest rate of vibration (red) being the least, and those having the highest rate (violet) being the most deflected from their course.

It may be asked, "How is it that there is such a variety of rays between red and violet, and none beyond either?" There are certainly no visible rays beyond either the red or the violet of the spectrum, but this does not prove the non-existence of rays. If, instead of viewing the spectrum, it is photographed, it will be found that the photographic plate shows a spectrum extending past the violet considerably beyond what was visible to the eye, thus proving the existence of rays incapable of acting on the nerves of the eye. These ultra-violet rays have great chemical or actinic properties, such as every photographer knows are almost absent in red and orange rays. Just as there are rays beyond the violet so are there rays beyond the red. These infra-red rays are rich in heat, and are the rays we feel when standing in the sunshine; hence there is something more than mere sentiment in speaking of reds as being "warm" and blues as being "cold" colours.

FIG. 4. DIAGRAM SHOWING THE REVERSAL OF THE SODIUM LINE.

In 1802 Wollaston, in experimenting with spectra, discovered that the band of coloured light forming the spectrum, which was obtained from a ray of sunlight, was not a continuous band, but was crossed by a number of fine black lines, each line representing an absence of light. These lines are known as Fraunhofer's Lines—from the fact that the celebrated Munich optician, Fraunhofer, was the first to thoroughly study and give a detailed account of them.

But for the presence of these lines, Spectrum Analysis would not play anything like the important part it does in science, and very much that is now generally known to-day would in all probability have remained for a long time unknown.

The description of a simple experiment which demonstrates the nature of the Fraunhofer's Lines will, therefore, not be out of place, and, in fact, is essential in order that what has still to be said may be followed with ease.

In Fig. 4 is shown the apparatus which may be used in this experiment, and the reader will readily recognise some of the individual parts, such as the prism, P, the source of light, E, which are the carbon poles of an electric arc lamp, and the screen on which is thrown the spectrum, VDR. The only other part which at present concerns us is that marked C, which is a tube closed at the end nearest the light E by a lens, and at the other end by a plate perforated with a very narrow slit. This allows a narrow beam of bright light to pass through the screen S and the lens L, which projects an image of the slit in C, on to the prism P. For the present it will be supposed that the burner F is removed, and that the carbon rods in E have their ends well soaked with a solution of common salt (sodium chloride).

When the electric current is switched on, the great heat of the electric arc volatilises the salt solution, and an incandescent vapour, containing a certain amount of sodium, is produced. When this light is analysed by the prism, the usual spectrum, ranging from red to violet, of the electric arc is projected on the screen with the addition of a very much brighter streak or line in the yellow, indicated by the black line D. As the salt is gradually volatilised from the carbon rods this bright line gradually loses its brightness until it is indistinguishable from the rest of the spectrum. Before it has completely faded a mark (d) should be made on the screen indicating the position of the bright line. When this has been done, the Bunsen burner F is replaced and in the flame is held a small metallic spoon containing a small piece of the metal Sodium. This at once ignites, imparting a bright yellow colour to the flame of the burner. A curious change now occurs in the projected spectrum. Exactly in the same place where the former bright line occurred there now appears a dark line. This shows that the yellow rays, which should have formed this part of the spectrum, and which are emitted by incandescent Sodium, can be totally absorbed by passing through a cooler vapour of Sodium.

Such absorption of rays from the spectrum is by no means a peculiarity of the metal sodium, for all the elements met with on our earth, which are capable of being examined spectroscopically and are found to produce bright lines on being rendered incandescent, likewise absorb the rays corresponding to their bright lines, from light which has passed through them. The dark lines thus formed by any given element are not only invariably produced in the same exact part of the spectrum, but also are never identical with the lines formed by any other element. From this it will be seen that by the analysis of light emitted by an unknown substance its nature and composition may be accurately determined.

Substances which the scientist can handle in his laboratory may be analysed in other ways than this, and although the spectroscope is in many instances invaluable to the analyst, it is in other spheres that it assumes an importance that makes it indispensable, and is capable of performing feats, which, even in these days of advanced knowledge, seem wonderful and well nigh incredible.

It is in the examination of those mysterious and fascinating jewels which bedeck the midnight skies of all lands that the spectroscope, in its various forms, excels. The nearest of these stars is our own sun, and it is natural that the first investigations of a spectroscopic nature should have reference to sunlight.

By comparing the dark lines in the solar spectrum with the lines obtained from known elements existing on the earth, the composition of the sun has been found to be practically identical with that of our earth. It naturally follows that, since the sun has an enormously higher temperature than our earth, the elements do not occur in the form in which we are familiar with them, but exist in a more or less gaseous condition. In addition to determining the composition of the sun, the spectroscope has enabled astronomers to learn much more of the state or condition of the sun, as well as the nature of sun spots, prominences, etc., and in the total eclipse of 1898, much of that wonderful phenomenon, the sun's corona, only visible during total eclipses of the sun.

Scientists soon turned their attention to the other stars and endeavoured to wrest from them their secrets, as they had from the sun. Here, however, very many and serious difficulties at once presented themselves. The nearest star is at such an immense distance that the amount of light from it, which reaches us, and is available for analysis, is, even with the aid of the best instruments, much too feeble to be analysed so as to be easily seen by the eye. This difficulty was surmounted by first of all photographing the spectra and afterwards by examining the photographs.

In Fig. 6 is shown the form of spectroscope employed in astronomy, with the camera affixed as when employed in taking the photographs of star spectra. It will be noticed that there is no prism attached to this apparatus, and that its place is occupied by a flat glass plate fixed in a solid frame. This is no ordinary glass plate. It is far and away the most costly part of the apparatus, its value depending on the fact that on its upper surface it has a series of exceedingly fine parallel lines ruled or scratched, forming a grating. These lines are so fine and close together that on the glass plate here represented there are no fewer than 20,000 to the inch, all equal and equally distant apart. Such an arrangement has been found to produce much clearer spectra than the ordinary prism.

By means of these diffraction gratings, as they are called, Fraunhofer's lines, which were numbered by Fraunhofer at about 600, are now known to number several thousands.

Fig. 8 represents a photograph of a portion of the solar spectrum taken by means of such a grating. This portion is only about one-fortieth of the entire solar spectrum, and shows that portion which contains the sodium line. This line, which has been referred to as though it were a single line, will be seen to consist of two very strong lines and a number of fainter ones. The scale and numbers give the wave-lengths of the rays of light forming any particular part of the spectrum, and form a ready means of reference for any particular line.

The spectroscope shown in Fig. 6 is again represented in Fig. 7, attached to a six-inch equatorial telescope, without the camera, and shows the tube by which the spectra are viewed by the eye.

Many, and perhaps most of the difficulties in connection with spectrum analysis of the stars have thus been overcome, and in Fig. 9 is a series of photographs, taken by the method just described, of various classes of stars.

In the first spectrum, that of the nebula situated in the constellation of Orion, it will be seen that it consists of a few bright lines, and is thus of a similar nature to the bright line spectrum described in the first part of the experiment with sodium. From this it is inferred with every probability of correctness that the nebula is composed of incandescent or glowing gases, in which are most probably embedded swarms of meteors.

The collisions of these meteors one with another as they attract each other would account for a gradual increase in temperature which would render other elements incandescent beside the gases, and a spectrum of such a system would show a large increase in the number of bright lines. Such a spectrum is exhibited by a certain group of stars, of which the brightest star in the constellation of Hercules (α Herculis) is an example (Fig. 9). The spectrum of the star α Cygni shows a still greater number of bright lines, as well as an increase in the number of dark (absorption) lines. Stars of this group have reached a stage in the history of their development when most of the meteors referred to, have been vaporised by the collisions; whilst stars of the next group, which exhibit an almost continuous spectrum, have reached another stage in which all solid matter in the mass has been reduced to vapour. In this stage the highest temperature is attained.

From this point the star gradually cools until it reaches a stage similar to that of our own sun, the spectra being practically identical.

The Fraunhofer's Lines have not divulged all the secrets they so mysteriously hold about these distant worlds when they have told the scientist the composition and state of the stars. Thus it was soon found out when the more powerful gratings were substituted for the earlier prism, that the lines in the spectra of some stars were all displaced slightly towards the violet end, whilst in the case of other stars, the lines were displaced towards the red end. This displacement of the lines was also observed in the spectra of light taken from the eastern and western limb of the sun, as well as of the solar prominences, which are sudden upheavals of gaseous matter on the sun's surface.

In these latter three cases the sources of the light under examination are rapidly moving, and scientists were not long in forming the opinion that motion was the cause of the displacement of the lines.

It has already been pointed out that light is a form of motion, and that red light represents the slowest rate of this kind of motion visible to the eye, whilst violet is the effect on the eye of the most rapid motion visible. If we suppose a star moving rapidly through space towards our own universe it is evident that the rays of light reaching our earth would have these rates of vibration increased. If we suppose, on the other hand, the star to be receding from our earth, the rate of vibration of the light rays would be decreased. Increasing the rate of vibration of a ray of light would mean, when passed through a prism, or examined by a grating, a displacement towards the violet, and similarly a decrease in the rate would mean a corresponding displacement to the red.

From this it follows that when the light of an approaching star is examined the lines in the spectrum would exhibit a displacement towards the violet, and that in the case of a receding star, the displacement would be towards the red end of the spectrum. Since in most stars such a displacement is to be found, it is quite reasonable to assume that these stars are either approaching or receding from us according to the displacement,—receding, if towards the red, and approaching, if towards the violet. As the amount of displacement is directly proportional to the speed at which the star is travelling to or from us, and moreover, as the displacement can be accurately measured, not only is the direction in which the star is moving determined, but its exact rate can be calculated.

When it is remembered that the nearest star (α Centauri) beyond our own sun, is some twenty billion miles away, we must admit it is no small matter to be able to state with little likelihood of error, not only the condition of the matter of which it is composed, but also what the nature of that matter is, and the direction, to or from us, in which its mass is moving; and when we further reflect that all this knowledge is dependent upon a piece of glass, we may well marvel.

Christ Come and Coming.*

THE aim of this little book is to show that the Master's words—"I come again"—long since fulfilled, are still in process of fulfilment in the lives of Christian men,—are, in fact, the source of their richest experiences, and the ground of their highest hopes. Apart from its theory of the Second Advent, which need not detain us, there is much fine thought for profitable meditation. That Jesus Christ spoke freely of His coming again, and coming again, not in meek and lowly disguise, but in the glory of the Father, none can doubt; but whether that promised Advent is identical with the destruction of Jerusalem, is open to question. It is, however, not the Advent itself, but the power of the Abiding Presence that concerns us here. As an objective fact, the Coming may be over; but the accomplished Advent has become the source of endless blessing for every expectant soul, and what remains for us to do is to secure its application and fruit in our personal experience.

When the Scriptures speak of Christ's present relation to the Church, presence, and not advent or coming, is their favourite term. The Advent happened once for all; the Presence grew out of the Advent, and is with us still. This distinction must not be overlooked, for it is the abiding Presence rather than the momentary Coming, that is the secret of our glory, and the source of our strength. Hence our author regrets that "the chosen and most appropriate word is often concealed in our current translations. The English Bible practically overlooks the important distinction between Advent and Presence, which the sacred penmen mark so carefully. It is much to be regretted that the Revisers (with eyes open, and the unwarrantable change confessed at the side of the page), have repeated the old error." But no mistranslation must be allowed to rob us of the precious truth of the living, abiding Presence of Christ, a truth so fruitful of good. Let faith but realise it, and there open before it possibilities the most vast and the most blessed. To the prepared expectant heart Christ is ever ready to reveal Himself in all the fulness and glory of His grace. "Having of old tendered His friendship and grace without stint to all that waited on Him; He will again, with equal and even greater facility, grant the means of happy communion. The healing rays of the Sun of Righteousness will be freely poured out and abundantly enjoyed, provided there be no intervening obstacles to stay their course; just as it needs only the opening of the eyes and the dispersion of earth-born clouds to perceive the beams of the natural luminary."

* "Christ Come and Coming." By Folland. Elliot Stock,

It is well to assure ourselves of this, for the privileges and hopes of the Christian life do not lessen with the lapse of time. "In the succession of the ages, the position of the children is not inferior to that of the fathers. If the men of former days saw many things, our spiritual perceptions will be clearer than theirs, and carry further; much was given to them, but we are to have more. Man's communications with God do not become less frequent and intimate, but more frequent and intimate. The occasional chances of the past have given place to the ceaseless opportunity of the present; and that which was to the early disciples a temporal spring of delight, has developed into a perpetual fount of satisfaction for their successors. The right of highest intercourse, common to patriarch, prophet, and apostle, is not for us curtailed and diminished, but confirmed and enlarged."

In these self-manifestations of Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost plays an important part. Christ's own words prepare us for that. He repeatedly promised that the Comforter should guide us into all truth, especially the truth concerning Himself: "He shall bear witness of Me; He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you; He shall glorify Me; for He shall take of Mine and shall declare it unto you." The Son of God is thus the chief subject of the Spirit's illumination; by His grace the soul is prepared for seeing and sharing in the Redeemer's glory. He alone can prepare us for that fellowship with the Risen Christ, which is the highest privilege of the Christian. "He cleanses the eye of the soul, suffuses the heart with fervent desire, makes us look up in a meek receptive mood, and thus He prepares us to behold and entertain the vision of Christ." If you look at the successive petitions in Paul's prayer for the Ephesian Church, you will see how they mark the various steps and stages in the attainment of this vision of Christ. "You are first to be strengthened by the Spirit in the inner man; then Christ dwells in the heart through faith; next comes the rooting and grounding in love—a distinctive work of the Spirit; and, as love brings insight into Divine things, you are now introduced into a boundless expanse, 'the breadth and length and depth and height,' in whose vague immensity the soul seems lost until it discovers the ocean to be no other than the love of Christ which passeth knowledge; and, having gained this elevation, you are filled unto all the fulness of God."

We can realise this Abiding Presence so as not only to mark a veritable turning-point in our career, but so as to prevent the life-stream from ever again flowing in the same meagre channel as before; but to do so we must have the fulness of the Spirit. The usual scant measure of the Spirit's grace does not suffice for taking in the deep things of Christ. With a receptive faculty, but feeble and defective, you might actually behold your Lord and not recognise Him, much less see His beauty and feel His charm. The reason why Christ so seldom shows Himself to His people is that neither in mind nor in heart are they ready for the disclosure; and, for Him to appear under circumstances so unfavourable, would be as if, for the taking of a portrait, one stood before a mirror whose surface may cast a perfect reflection, but has no ability to retain the image; only step aside and the life-like impression is gone. That sight of our Lord whose effect must vanish is usually denied to us. The manifestation is granted with a view to gracious results; the design is that our nature be endowed with abiding beauty and power. But this cannot be unless the soul is found in a suitable mood, and such a mood can be realised only by the Spirit's aid. Apart from the course of prior preparation, we should be as disqualified for the receipt of Advent blessing as common paper is unfit for the purposes of the photographer's art. The flower that is to imbibe the warmth and display the hues of the sunbeam had need to live in the vigour of vegetable life; and the vital power of the Holy Ghost must be in us if we are to take in and afterwards continue to reflect the likeness of Christ. The case of Stephen is a case in point. The fulness of the Spirit preceded the vision of Christ: "He, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God." The fulness of the Spirit, and then the vision of Christ—that seems the law of divine procedure. It is not, however, a question of simple succession. It is one of vital preparation and fitness. "The correspondence between the work of the Spirit and the work of Christ is more than a mere rotation in time—the one first and the other second; there is a strict resemblance in the effects which they produce on the mind; they give birth to similar impressions and results. And, because the illumination of the Spirit and the revealed Presence of Christ act to like purpose on character and life, some may be disposed to resolve the one experience into the other, referring all to the Spirit's operation. But to blend these august influences, is to overlook or obscure sacred teaching, and tends to introduce confusion of thought. The offices and functions of the second and third Persons in the Godhead differ; their respective provinces are treated in the Book as separate and distinct; and it cannot but be a mistake to confound things which the Scriptures sunder. Much as the effects wrought by the Spirit's effusion may resemble those of Christ's manifestation, their final aim being in complete accord, we have no warrant for identifying the ways of the two Divine Persons; but are humbly to follow the method prescribed by infinite wisdom: expecting first the Spirit and then the Christ; the help of the One to prepare us for the reception of the Other.

Men have to be indwelt by the Holy Ghost in order to be qualified for Advent light and power. "When the Comforter has entered those who are sprinkled with the blood, He causes their upper room to be cleansed and furnished for the in-coming of its Chief Occupier. This combined and harmonious operation is indicated in Paul's words: 'We all, with unveiled face reflecting as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit.' The looking-glass of the inspired soul becomes sensitive enough to retain the light falling upon it from the Saviour's countenance: a light which the quickened nature holds fast, a beauty for ever."

What, then, are Christ's methods of self-disclosure? We cannot answer that question fully, for we are acquainted only with a few of His many modes of access to the human mind; and whether, in a new case, any of the recorded methods will be adopted is a point which we have no means of deciding. Variety of plan characterises the wisdom of God in every department of His work, be it in nature, providence, or grace; and, instead of repeating Himself, Christ may choose to give fresh proof of His diversity of resource. The Scriptures of the New Testament, however, contain many instances of Christ's self-disclosure, and they may be suggestive of hints as to how He may possibly, if not probably, manifest Himself now and throughout all time. "And it is most gratifying to notice that in every one of the paths, so marked by His feet, Christ has since been pleased to walk again and again: the examples afforded in the New Testament have been matched, some of them frequently, in the experience of later generations. The Divine footprints are not obliterated, but restored from age to age. It is easy and delightful for faith to trace these steps, especially with the added hope of something akin to them in one's own life."

The particular form of Christ's self-manifestations will be largely determined by our need and capacity. While always dependent on our spiritual condition, they come according to the mood and need of the moment. Their fruits will differ from those of the Spirit only in being higher in degree. "The divine Son and the divine Spirit strive together for common ends; and it is reasonable to suppose that the measure of blessing wrought by their co-operation must exceed the issue attained when the Spirit labours alone: the joint result will be the larger result. Christ's work is an extension of the Spirit's work; the one course of sublime action is in continuance of the other, and a farther development of it; both aim at the same consummation." The vision of Christ makes the graces which are implanted by the Spirit grow into fresh vigour and beauty, and these in their turn enable us to rise into a brighter vision and into a fuller experience of Christ.

These fruits of Christ's self-manifestation are intended for present experience. We cannot dismiss them to a future state without incalculable loss to the life on earth. It was not death and heaven that the apostles had in view when they spoke of the revelation of the Master's presence. It was rather the manifestation of His power and grace and glory here. The patience of faith may be a fine virtue; but the true function of faith lies in its appropriating for present experience and use all the wealth of life and power which God intended for the present. To postpone to the future what God intends for the present is a prodigal and sinful waste of opportunity: it is to rob Christian experience of some of its richest bequests. "With so much of our inheritance put away, relegated to another world, earth is needlessly impoverished in favour of the upper life: a practice not to be sufficiently deplored; for it is here below, not there on high, that our want is greatest." We cannot afford to let slip so much blessing and privilege intended for present experience, nor dare we set limits to the measure of their attainment. With so much offered in the Gospel, and so much needed in the heart and life, let not our desire be unduly satisfied, or our explorations into the unknown regions of spiritual life, stop too confidently and too soon, as though we had reached the utmost limit. With a measureless fund of promise and grace to draw from, and with a perfect Saviour to repose in, the question ought not to be, What is the Church's richest attainment? for even that is not the measure of the possible. It ought to be rather, What is God's highest and best for His people here? and with nothing short of that ought we to stop or think of stopping.

The true attitude of the soul towards Christ, "Come and Coming," is one of waiting. The waiting is passive, as the manifestation we seek rests on the will of another; but merely, purely passive it cannot be, for while it rests on the will of another, it rests on the will of One who is eager to reveal the fulness of His grace and truth the moment His conditions are complied with. An idle and quiescent attitude towards Christ can only end in disappointment and loss. "The mind that finds delight in stillness and quiet must not abandon itself to contemplative moods, as if meditation and kindred states comprised the whole of devotion and nothing else was required. The incumbent waiting leaves room for every kind of useful service, and is never incompatible with the necessary routine of life." This waiting takes the form of an ardent expectancy, only it must not lead us to form preconceptions of the forms in which Christ will manifest His presence. Such a course might be fraught with loss. The very messengers of God might knock at our door; but, because they do not come in the garb in which we pictured them, we fail to recognise them as messengers of God at all. It is for us rather to cherish ardency of expectation, and cultivate receptivity of spirit, praying that we may be able to recognise and welcome a visitation of God in whatever garb it may come.

Purely passive this waiting must not be, we say; for much may be done in the way of self-preparation. We can co-operate with the Holy Ghost. "If we grieve or dishonour Him, darkness, and not illumination, will be our lot; but if we assume and maintain a right attitude towards Him, He will clear the film from our spiritual eye, and the vision of Christ shall be ours. Then self-disclosure shall follow self-disclosure, each one an Advent of the Living Christ into our life, and each one a pledge of still further grace and blessing. This shall go on until these manifestations shall not be like the pale and passing gleams of April, but like the fulness of the summer's glory.

"Abide in me; there have been moments blest,

When I have heard Thy voice and felt Thy power:

Then evil lost its grasp, and passion hushed,

Owning the Divine enchantment of the hour.

These were but seasons, beautiful and rare;

Abide in me and they shall ever be.

Fulfil at once Thy precept and my prayer:

Come, and abide in me, and I in Thee."

R. G. GRAHAM.

An Old Case of Persecution Retold.

ROUND many of our village chapels there is an air of romance making them centres of interest to Christian workers. There are incidents associated with the formation of the Church, and exciting stories told in connection with the building of the place, which would supply abundant material for Methodist Idyls of village life fifty years ago. The glimpses we get of the social condition and humble surroundings of the workers, as we listen to traditions which have come from father to child, make us regret that no loving pen has preserved from oblivion the chronicles of those heroic struggles. Those men were heroes according to Amiel's definition of heroism:—"Heroism is the brilliant triumph of the soul over the flesh—that is to say, over fear; fear of poverty, of suffering, of calumny, of sickness, of isolation, and of death. There is no serious piety without heroism. Heroism is the dazzling concentration of courage."

Good and true men have arisen and played the part of the village Hampden, but the only record of their heroism is preserved in the stories told by the fireside, or an occasional reference in the speeches at the annual meeting. No Church has been more fruitful than ours in the production of men who have worked with the sword and the trowel; men who have preached the Gospel to their fellows, and when necessity has arisen, have boldly resisted the united efforts of the hall and the rectory to rivet the fetters upon the villagers. These village craftsmen and sturdy yeomen have confronted their oppressors in maintaining the rights of their fellows; and in their efforts they have been sustained by that influence which for the last eighteen hundred years has proved the mightiest force in human souls. The little chapels and meeting-houses, "the temples of His grace," are their memorials, every brick and stone of which was laid by prayer and cemented with affection. As we gather in these places they appear to us cold, unattractive, and sometimes repellent with their plain walls and comfortless benches; and occasionally the service is bald and wearying to the flesh; but these village sanctuaries were the cradles of strong men, and we are very near the bed-rock of the English democracy of to-day. Those village services generated the oxygen of our nineteenth century civilisation; and any one who wishes to find the springs of many of the potent forces of the great movements which are marking the life of the closing years of the century, will need to study the impulses which were awakened in these unpretending buildings. They were sacred spots to our fathers, the trysting-place where the soul was refreshed by communion with God; the sacred mount where heaven kissed earth; the resting place of the ladder whose top touched the throne of Infinite Love. We need not wonder that they regarded them with an affection amounting almost to reverence, and that they were very jealous of any seeming reproach cast upon these hallowed shrines.

These village sanctuaries were not built without great sacrifices and many privations, and very frequently a donation to the building fund meant so much less food for the table. The following taken from the old Magazine for 1827, and relating to the building of a chapel on the Lynn Circuit, will show the straits to which those early workers were put:—"I told the people it was possible to collect a quarter-of-a-peck of farthings, and urged the possibility of it in every place. . . . A few weeks after, a quarter-of-a-peck of farthings were seen by many. We had collected in the whole, 2486. . . . The affair gave rise to a new proverb, 'The Ranters have got all the farthings.'" Places built at such a cost, and under such difficulties, would necessarily become interwoven with the spiritual life of the worshippers. Very often the chapel was the culmination of a long struggle between the village despots and a band of sturdy workers. Those old saints brooded over the spiritual condition of their neighbours until the Divine fire burned so fiercely in their hearts that they could no longer keep silent. Gideon-like, the angel of the Lord appeared to them while on the threshing-floor, and urged them to put forth efforts to deliver their fellows from spiritual bondage. The word of the Lord came to them; they saw strange sights, they felt new forces pushing them forward. The boys of Verona used to whisper as Dante passed, "There goes the man who has seen hell." These old men looked into the Inferno of their day, a hell where no breath of heaven ever entered; and the higher conscience bid them haste to the rescue of their fellows. With an intensified faith in the supernatural, and a trenchant emphasis on the necessity of individual regeneration, they commenced the God-given work of the moral reformation of their neighbours. It is a fine characteristic of the men of Issachar that they were "men that had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do." The same feature marked the conduct of these men. They were not mortgaged to the past, nor hampered by blind conservatism. They had an open mind, a flexibility of movement, a resourcefulness of effort. The religious teachers of the State Church could not understand them, and regarded their Christian boldness and Christian liberty as the outbreak of a rebellious and wicked nature, and made strenuous efforts to thwart them in all conceivable ways. Often no action was too mean, and no conduct too contemptible to be used against them. Open and secret persecution, legitimate and illegitimate means were employed to disperse their gatherings. Intimidation was tried, employment was withheld, false charges were trumped up, and as might be expected, they became familiar with the prison cell.

There are strange stories told by men and women who are still living in this district, of battles fought by men and women whose names are almost forgotten, but whose works still live. Those unknown heroes and heroines commenced a holy crusade in which the Amoses of the nineteenth century told things divinely true; and as they spoke the hearts of the villagers leaped up in response. Their message, with its attendant results, shaped the destinies of the people with such a breadth that it has become a prophecy of a world-wide brotherhood, and a forth-teller of a co-operation for the common good.

A brief report of one such struggle has been put into my hand, and as it will give a glimpse of that old-time religion, as it was lived on this Crewe Circuit, it may possibly be of some little interest, as a specimen of the social and religious surroundings amidst which the foundation of our Church was laid.

The persecuted man, William Wood, was a member of the family of that name, who rendered such signal service on the Nantwich and Burland Circuit in our early days. Thomas and John Wood are remembered as powerful local preachers whose services were in great demand for "specials," not only on their own, but also on the neighbouring circuits. Tradition says that Thomas Wood was one of the local preachers who missioned Crewe, and during the first service a collection was taken, which amounted to fourpence halfpenny. Surely those were the days of "small things." The Wood Memorial Church at Nantwich preserves the memory of John Wood, and towards its erection he contributed nearly £1,000. The representatives of the family are still actively interested in the work of our Church on the Crewe and Nantwich Circuits. Mr. James Wood of Willaston, a widely-known and popular local preacher, is a member of the family.

From the brief account which I have received, with explanations and elucidations by certain aged members who heard the story from personal spectators, it appears that William Wood, a carpenter living at Audlem, Cheshire, was at that time a member of the Wesleyan Church. His heart was pained by the condition of his neighbours, who were harassed and neglected, like sheep without a shepherd, and he resolved to put forth an effort to reach, and if possible, save them. To protect himself he took the oath and subscribed the declaration required by the Act for the relief of Protestant Dissenting Ministers and Schoolmasters. He then invited his neighbours to join him in a religious service on Sunday, June 14th, 1812. A few accepted his invitation, and they gathered on a bank in the open-air very near the site on which our present chapel and school stand. The service was opened by singing, and while Mr. Wood was engaged in prayer, Mr. John Groom, an attorney, and magistrates' clerk, acting under an asserted warrant which had been issued on the complaint of the clergyman, seized the preacher, dragged him on the ground for a considerable distance, and threw him into a ditch.

The following Tuesday, Mr. Wood received a summons to appear before the local magistrate at Market Drayton, "to show cause why he should not be convicted in the penalty of twenty pounds for the said offence." On the day appointed, he answered the summons, and upon the oath of the constable and Groom he was convicted in the penalty of £20. He urged that no breach of the law had been committed by him, and on conscientious grounds, refused to pay the fine. A distress-warrant was issued forthwith; his live and dead stock were seized, removed to Market Drayton, and disposed of by public auction. The expenses, together with the fine, amounted to upwards of £60; and so tyrannical and reckless were the proceedings that the poor man was stripped of his possessions, and reduced to a state bordering upon destitution. It was desired by the persecutors to drive the Methodists out of the place, and they delusively hoped that strong measures in this case would intimidate any of the other members from continuing the services, but the sequel proved them mistaken. Acting on the advice of his friends, Mr. Wood served on the magistrate a notice of appeal, but not being in a position to provide the requisite recognizances, he was not able to carry the appeal to the Knutsford Sessions; and the clouds appeared to be gathering darker around the little band of persecuted Methodists. Friends, however, came to his help, and interested themselves in his behalf. With their assistance he was able to bring an action against Mr. Groom for assault, and on Tuesday, April 27th, 1813, the trial took place at Chester, before the Hon. R. Dallas and F. Burton, Esq., His Majesty's Justices. The plaintiff was represented by Mr. Cross and Mr. D. E. Jones; the defendant by the Attorney General and Mr. Williams. Damages were laid at £500. In our next we will give the report of the trial as it appeared in the newspaper of the period.

Primitive Methodism and the Temperance Reformation in England.

III.—THE TOTAL ABSTINENCE PLEDGE.

THE grandfather of the present Earl of Derby built a place in Preston for the brutal sport of cock-fighting, and was the chief patron of the now illegal pastime; but when his son, the father of the present Earl, was defeated at a Parliamentary election in 1830 by Henry Hunt, the advanced Radical, the noble Earl was so disgusted with the ingratitude of the Prestonians that he withdrew his patronage, and closed the cockpit. The temperance people leased it, and for twenty years it was their Temperance Hall. It was in this ex-cockpit that these earnest reformers took a step in advance of all other Temperance Societies. The speeches which had been made at the meeting in the Primitive Methodist chapel on the 3rd of May, 1832, went beyond the moderation pledge on which the society was based. Mr. Livesey's was in reality a strong plea for total abstinence, not only from ardent spirits, but from all intoxicating liquors as beverages. These speeches led to deep thought and to much discussion, and some began to feel that, having taken the moderation pledge, logical consistency required total abstinence.

John King and Joseph Livesey signed a pledge of total abstinence in Mr. Livesey's shop in August, 1832. In addition to the question of consistency, circumstances forced some of the leaders to the conclusion that mere abstinence from ardent spirits would never secure general sobriety. Large numbers joined the society, but lapses into drunkenness, through the use of wines and malt liquors, became so numerous that the more far-seeing were satisfied that their work would be a comparative failure unless something more was done. A special meeting of the society was called for September 1, 1832, when the desirability of changing the pledge to one of total abstinence was introduced. The proposal met with strong opposition. It was declared to be an "innovation upon both English and American orthodoxy," and that, if pressed, it would break up the society. No definite decision was arrived at, but the discussion was not in vain. A number tarried behind and continued the debate after the meeting had closed, and John King, Joseph Livesey, and five others signed a pledge to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, except as medicines. A heated controversy was kept up until the first annual meeting on September 26, 1833, when the subject was brought before 2,000 people. The meeting decided that there should be added to the pledge—"We do further voluntarily agree to abstain for one year from ale, porter, and ardent spirits, and all intoxicating liquors, except used as medicines, or in a religious ordinance."

A resolution of total abstinence "for one year," if submitted to a temperance meeting to-day, would be received with ridicule and rejected with contempt; but at that time it was a solemn step to take. We now know, for it has been demonstrated, that people can live better and live longer without alcoholic liquors than with them. Sixty years ago it was generally believed that alcoholic liquors had nourishing qualities, and were necessary to sustain men and women under great physical strain. Hence the caution of those early reformers must not be set down to cowardice, but to prudence. It was a great step, in advance of anything known in the temperance world up to that date, and has resulted in a revolution in scientific and public sentiment in reference to intoxicants. There had been isolated instances of total abstinence before that meeting. The Rev. James Macpherson, who is one of our own ministers, signed a total abstinence pledge in 1828, and at the time we write is still vigorous in intellect and active in limb, and as true to total abstinence as he was seventy years ago. Hugh Bourne practised total abstinence before the birth of English Temperance Societies. John King, Joseph Livesey, and others in Preston signed a total abstinence pledge some months before this meeting. Mr. Logan in his book on early teetotalism, gives cases of men in what we may term private associations adopting the total abstinence pledge; but we believe that it was never endorsed by a public meeting as a basis of social reform before the one just mentioned. The first seven who signed were John King, Joseph Livesey, Thomas Swindlehurst, Joseph Dearden, Joseph Richardson, Richard Turner, and William Gregory. Three of these, John King, Joseph Richardson, and Richard Turner were connected with our Church in Preston.

John King, who signed the moderation pledge and all three of the total abstinence pledges which we have mentioned, was a seat-holder in our chapel, if not a member of our Church. His wife and daughter were enrolled members. He was born at Walton-le-dale, near Preston, on Christmas Day, 1795. His trade was that of a clogger. "He left Preston in 1834, and was the means of establishing the Chester Temperance Society, and several societies in Nottinghamshire, and other parts; but after three years' wandering he returned to Preston." —(Winskill). He was an indefatigable worker in the cause of temperance, and was successful in promoting its interests. He had silver medals presented to him by London Teetotalers, the Irish Total Abstinence Society, started by Father Matthews, the Total Abstinence Association (India), founded by soldiers whom he had converted to temperance, and by other societies and individuals, expressive of his worth as a temperance reformer, and some of them stating that he was "the first man that signed the teetotal pledge in England." He lost his sight when he was seventy-seven, and became reduced in his circumstances. He was not allowed to want, however, for such was the esteem in which he was held that a penny subscription was set on foot by the Good Templars, which purchased for him an annuity of £40. He died in 1884, in the ninetyeth year of his age.

Joseph Richardson was converted to temperance at the meeting held on Preston Moor in July, 1832, and took the moderation pledge. We have already described this meeting, which was held about three months after the formation of the society, and was its first open-air meeting. He became distinguished in the temperance world. He was best known as "Pad Joe." He was a shoemaker, and was noted for making excellent children's "pads," hence the cognomen, "Pad Joe." He was addicted to drink in his early days, but gave it up and joined our Church, and remained a member to the day of his death, a period of forty years. He believed, with most reformed drunkards, that drunkenness was the great sin, and one Sabbath, when a preacher, who was thought not to be favourable to the cause of total abstinence, declared from the pulpit that an idle man was worse than a drunkard, Richardson sprang to his feet and lifted up his hand and shouted, "Never." The preacher and congregation were startled, although responses were much more common than now, and greater familiarity existed between the pulpit and pew than would be considered proper at this time. He was enthusiastic as a Christian, as well as a temperance reformer. He enjoyed the means of grace, and rejoiced in Christ in daily life. He was accustomed to say, "I am the happiest man alive; for no man can be happier than a teetotal Primitive Methodist." He was a consistent Christian, and a zealous labourer in the good cause. Mr. Thomas Walmsley says: "On Sunday morning, 25th July, 1869, I visited Richardson. He was physically very low, but quite resigned. . . He said, 'I am not afraid to die,' and wished soon to depart to be with Christ. Pointing upwards, he said, 'I am going to heaven, thank God.' I then read the twenty-third Psalm, which seemed to lift him up, particularly when I read that part where it speaks of the valley of the shadow of death. He smiled, and said, 'After I was converted, I used to put my hand through the room window and shake hands with God. I always lift my hand up when I go by the place where I was converted.' The public prints, in announcing his death, which took place on August 16th, 1869, said: "Another of the pioneers of the teetotal cause in the town has passed from amongst us. The deceased was born in August, 1794. He joined the Temperance Society in Preston very soon after it was established, and was one of its early tract distributors and visitors. He was also one of the foremost to sign the first public teetotal pledge, which was adopted at the theatre, at the first annual meeting in 1833, his name being sixth in the list. He was a member of the Primitive Methodist body for nearly forty years. Since he first joined the society he has ever been most assiduous in his efforts for the spread of teetotal principles, and much good has been effected through his instrumentality." He had a public funeral, and large numbers of his friends and co-workers, both in the cause of Christianity and Temperance, attended to pay the last tribute of respect to one who had been so useful, and whom they so dearly loved.

Wm. Tuf
J. Livesey

Richard Turner was also a Primitive Methodist for many years. He was commonly called "Dicky" Turner, and was, perhaps, the most remarkable man amongst the temperance pioneers. He was born in the township of Bilsborrow, near Preston, on the 25th of July, 1790. His parents removed to Preston when he was a little boy, and he was sent to work in a cotton-mill. He was afterwards a plasterer's labourer, and then a hawker of cockles and mussels. He fell a victim to drink, and was not sober when he signed the total abstinence pledge in October, 1832. He signed, as we have seen, the public abstinence pledge the year following. He was a popular advocate. Mr. Livesey, in his Reminiscences, informs us that he coined the word "Teetotal" which has become the technical designation of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors throughout the world. The advocates had to phrase the principle as best they could till September, 1833, when Turner supplied them with a name. It has been said that it was a Lancashire provincialism, and that Turner applied it to total abstinence. The Slang Dictionary says: "The origin of this term is not known. It is said to be from the expression of a fanatical and stuttering enthusiast in the cause of total abstinence. It has nothing to do with tea." Whether he coined or simply turned it to a new use, he was a great coiner of striking words and phrases. Mr. Livesey says: "He was never at a loss for a word; if a suitable one was not at his tongue's end he coined a new one." He used the word at the meeting when the total abstinence pledge was adopted. He was discussing the relative merits of moderation and total abstinence, and said, "that nothing but the Teetotal would do." Mr. Livesey rose and patting him on the back, said, "That shall be its name," and the audience endorsed it with loud cheering. The word has passed into literature as the technical name of one of the most potent movements of modern times. He was a man of medium height, with a dark, ruddy complexion. He was not a cultured man, but he was far from being rude or offensive. One who knew him well says: "He had a great idea of doing the thing in a respectable way. He dressed for the occasion, which was usually white ducks, a blue coat with silk velvet collar, and brass buttons, large white Berlin gloves, and parsonic necktie. He was welcome everywhere." He was above all things, a true and an earnest man. He used to go through the streets with a rattle announcing the meetings, and collecting crowds to preach to them temperance. He walked from Preston to the World's Temperance Convention in London in 1846; and then went into the south on a temperance mission; and evidence is not wanting that he did much good. He was respected in life and greatly lamented in death. His funeral was a public one. The Saul Street Primitive Methodist Sunday School, and four hundred teetotalers from different parts of the country, attended. The streets through which the procession passed were thronged with deeply affected spectators. He was interred in St. Peter's churchyard, Preston. The following inscription is on the stone over his grave: "Beneath this stone are deposited the remains of Richard Turner, author of the word Teetotal as applied to abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, who departed this life on the 27th day of October, 1846, aged fifty-six years."

Hugh Bourne, one of the founders of the Primitive Methodist Church, attended one of the early meetings in Preston, and gave his experience as a total abstainer, and in the presence of 500 people, signed the total abstinence pledge, naively saying, "I am not coming over to you; you are coming over to me." Meaning that he was a total abstainer before the society was formed. He was a staunch friend of total abstinence, and kept in touch with the progress of the movement. He often corresponded with the late Dr. F. R. Lees. Dr. Lees sometimes sought his advice, and has frequently acknowledged his indebtedness to him in the early days when he was beset with difficulties. It will be interesting to Primitive Methodists to know that the Bible Christians have been in the foremost ranks of Temperance Reformers from the dawn of the abstinence movement, and that nearly all their ministers and the bulk of their members are abstainers.

Humanity owes a debt of gratitude to the heroic and far-seeing men who braved professional and public opinion, and entered upon the crusade against all intoxicating liquors, as not only unnecessary, but as injurious as beverages; for modern science and historic facts testify that they were right and their opponents were wrong. We are glad that so many Primitive Methodists were amongst the first crusaders. Are we acting in a way worthy of the sons and daughters of our temperance sires? is a question worthy of our devout consideration.

HEN, upwards of 300 years ago, Camden, the antiquary, visited this part he observed a large number of seals (?) on the rocks at Saltburn, and they had this peculiarity, that they always fled at the approach of men, but betrayed no fear in the presence of women. Hence, when they were to be captured or killed the hunters dressed themselves in women's clothes. Saltburn would be much astonished to find seals on its rocks now. Health and pleasure are hunted there now instead of seals, and I know not but they are as coy as those wary creatures, but may be had if sought in the right way. And surely, if health is to be had anywhere, Saltburn is the place, for it hasn't even a cemetery or burying-ground of any sort yet, presumably because it has not been required. This fact alone is undoubtedly a capital advertisement for a health-resort, though do not think for a moment that we are insinuating that this accounts for its absence.

A curious but beautiful freak of nature is to be seen near Moorsholm, in the form of a conical hill, called Freeborough, upwards of 500 feet high, and quite separate from the surrounding hills. Some have declared it to have been a temple of the Druids, as close by there are the remains of a British camp and a tumulus fifteen yards in diameter, which was opened above a hundred years ago and a large vase found in it full of burnt bones. Others say it was devoted to the worship of the Saxon goddess Friga; while others again say that it was here where the Free Men of the Borough, in Saxon times, met to make and administer the law. And, finally, there have been those who argued that King Arthur was buried here. Researches have proved it to be a natural formation and not an artificial mound as many have supposed. We, nevertheless, think that its figure and contiguity to a British camp give force to the theory that it has been used as a centre of religious rites and civil government. It may more distinctly divulge its secret yet.

"Kilton's deep vales, clear rill, and sylvan gloom;
Freeborough's huge mount, immortal Arthur's tomb;
And Huntcliffe scowling o'er the distant main,
With cloudy head involved in murky rain."

HALL STEVENSON.

Danby, like Stokesley, has had its hero, but one of a different type. I'm sure I don't know how Carlyle would classify him, for we cannot truthfully affirm that he was either prophet, poet, priest, or king. Here, however, is his epitaph, telling the world what he was here below, and what he is doing at the present time,—and you must judge for yourselves:—

"Consecrated to the memory of Samuel Raebanks, gent. His life was an academy of virtues; his conversation a precedent for piety; his estate a storehouse for charity; his good name a place for innocency; his death a passage to eternity; his eternity a perfection of glory, where he now sits, triumphs, and sings with angels, archangels, and cherubins and seraphins, Holy, Holy, Holy, to Him that is, and was, and is to come! Hallelujah! He died aged sixty-six years, in the year of grace 1635, December 14."

It is to be feared we shall not see his like again. The butter and eggs from the Danby district are sweet and fresh, none better, and can command a market; but we can assure the Danby district that, if it can produce men like the above, the world is hungrily waiting to take all it can supply and will not be anxious for them to meet with the "angels, archangels, and cherubins and seraphins" prematurely.

That curious basaltic intruder in geological formations, the whinstone dyke, can be traced right from the West of Durham past here on to Whitby. Between Ayton and Roseberry it crops out to the surface and is called Langberg, or Langbaurg, or as we should now call it, Long-hill. The old style of the name is still given to the Baronial liberty, or Wapentake of that part. The Courts' Leet and Baron, whatever they may have been, were formerly held on it. A Sir Henry Bellasis, in the early part of the seventeenth century, is said to have "Established his title and claim to have the Wapentake of Langberth, with its rights, numbers, liberties, appurtenances, free chase, free warren, fines, issues, amerciements, courts' leet, pillory, tumbrel, gallows for malefactors," etc., etc. The gentleman is to be congratulated upon having had the good fortune to live in the seventeenth century, for I fear neither his purse nor his life would have held out long enough to "establish" such "a title and claim" at the present day. The lawyer has supplanted the sword which often "established" titles to estates, though not a few regard the latter method as the lesser evil.

Right away yonder on the plain is sweet, dreamy, little Marton, the birthplace of the immortal circumnavigator, Capt. Cook. When Themistocles was laughed at because of his ignorance of the fine arts and his obscure parentage, he replied, "'Tis true I never learned how to tune a harp, or play upon a lute, but I know how to raise a small and inconsiderable city to glory and greatness." If Cook has not made Marton great as was Athens, he yet has given it some considerable renown. As you face the village from Roseberry, Easby Hill is to your left, and upon it stands Cook's monument, a shaft fifty-one feet high. His mother and some of the family are buried at Ayton; his father lies in the Marske churchyard; while part of the mangled remains of the great seaman lies in far-away Hawaii. I have an uncertain impression that the reproach contained in the following lines can no longer be made.

"No monumental stone adorns the nook
Where rests the parent of the gallant Cook;
Cook stands aloft upon a hill of fame,
His father lies at Marske without a name."

Let Marske look to its business and walk in a straight path, for Guisbro's eye is upon it; for was it not this self-same Marske which, when its neighbour had fallen on evil days and lost its good name, pretentiously announced itself to her astonished Barony as the market town instead of Guisbro'? Yes, and market town with a cross too. The event caused no small stir and comment in these parts at the time, and inspired at least one daring rhymster to mount his Pegasus. "In good King Charles' golden days" the Guisbro' folk were no better or cleaner than they ought to have been; but then, who among its neighbours could throw the first stone? Like many other and better-known people after the Restoration they forgot both what was due to themselves and God. Two years after the Great Plague in London the place was visited by a terrible disease, and the alarm was so great that no one would come to market to buy or sell. The devoted little town was shunned, and there lacked not plenty of people to tell it that God was punishing it for its excessive wickedness. Perhaps we should say to-day they were chastised as much for their uncleanness as sinfulness. However that may be, Guisbro's misfortune was Marske's opportunity, and it was taken. It is the way of the world. Power, riches, greatness, what are they often built upon but the loss and ruin of others? One individual, community, or nation is depressed or broken that another may rise and be made strong.

Guisbro' has its market again—a very mild affair true, unless two or three pigs get adrift in the street to waken up a bit of excitement—and the presumption is, it repented and has been restored to grace and honour. But read the local lover of the muse of those days on the subject.

MARSKE CROSS.

Go round this cross and view it well,
When it was built I will you tell—
In sixteen hundred and sixty-seven;
I hope the builder's now in heaven,
When Guisbro' did God's laws transgress,
And turned their backs on righteousness,
The Lord sent forth a dreadful plague,
And many an one in death was laid.
The farmers all and tradesmen too,
To sell their goods they knew not how,
Nor to contrive a market-place
To keep them from this sore disease.
Then Marske became a market town,
But now its cross is tumbling down;
Who will repair 't I cannot tell—
I'm sure it can't repair itself.

When Guisbro' read the above it probably said,
"Let it tumble down, it was an impertinence to build it." Who likes to be constantly reminded of his follies and losses? Don't you think, Mr. Editor, that these stanzas must be possessed of more than ordinary vitality to have survived upwards of two hundred years of merciless selection and rejection, and at the end of the great nineteenth century appear, by your permission, in the Primitive Methodist Magazine? If indestructibility be one of the notes of poetry, then this venerable effusion may not impudently lay claim to some merit. Why, sir, for a few seasons now we have been told in high-sounding phrase of "epoch-making" books—books of poetry, philosophy, theology, fiction, and what-not, but where are these Teneriffes of literature to-day? Mere hills of snow, piled by log-rollers. Not all the disinterested sympathy of our periodicals has been able to stimulate more than a short-lived and spasmodic circulation. We live in an atmosphere of Hooleyism. The hands of the religious press are none too clean in this matter; its unceasing flood of silly, indiscriminating adulation has become nauseous through unreality and excess. No such artificial and unkind support has been given to our Marske friend, though I'm afraid, sir, these irreverent and utilitarian times will scarcely regard his extreme age as synonymous with worth. Let it pass at that. The chief thing to be said is, Let each man climb his Parnassus and give to the world the fruit of his toil without meretricious aids—or in plain words, scorn booming, of which there has been quite enough and to spare lately. When God sends His great ones to visit and bless us, both they and we to whom they speak can do very well without the insincere chatter and pompous signalings which characterise so much of the work of our modern periodicals. But, dear me, where have we wandered to? Pardon the digression, sir.

Quite a favourite place was Highcliffe Nab for a walk from Guisbro', especially for the young people, and I daresay still is, unless human nature has deteriorated. There is something in the ramble specially attractive to the aforesaid, for half of the distance, up to Paradise Farm, there is nothing to interfere with their spooneying, save a gate or a stile; but from thence upward, a hundred to one their sentimentalism will at once take a practical course, and they will buckle to and zealously assist each other up the steep, she by words of "linked sweetness long-drawn out," (and not one too long), and he by strength of arm. Not an inappropriate parable of what life should be, is it, dear reader? But, oh my, when as lads we scrambled up through the heather, disdaining the ordinary bridle path, in the close, hot summer evening, how the flies and midges did bite to be sure! We were no doubt glad to get a puff of the sweet moor air on the top, but as to the glorious prospect, it did not impress us; we saw it not. And yet we must have seen; it must have made an impression, though then we knew it not. Some of those climbings and visions from the stern old crag are fadeless memories to-day. Recollections of far-extending land and sea, of gorgeous skies, of the sombre massive beauty of the thickly-wooded hill-sides, to which at the time not the slightest conscious attention was given, but which somehow subtly soaked into the mind and remain there ineradicable. This is at once an interesting subject for mental philosophers to discuss; and more important still, a reason for devout thankfulness to our Heavenly Father who, without asking, "fills us with good things." But, bless you, what did we care about "the beauty of the earth" or the "shining heavens"? We were after jackdaws, or any other mice and small cattle that could be caught. It makes one shudder now to remember how we clambered about the rugged face of the old Nab, and hung on its ledges to get the young daws, or maybe, catch an old one on the nest. What with lads shouting "here," "there," "be quick," "hold tight," etc., and the shrieking of the old birds, and the squeaking of the young ones, there were some lively times. It seems to me now there was often a great hullabaloo and very little caught. I have seen, on these hills, hounds, horses, and huntsmen run, gallop, and shout themselves black in the face for a whole day, and return triumphantly and joyously home with never a brush to show for their prodigious labours. It appears to be strength spent for nought, and labour which satisfies not; and no doubt there is much foolishness in such ways, still, who knows but that God may show us great things even in the paths of thoughtlessness? The fires of experience make the lessons legible in after years.

III.—HARE COURT: ITS FOUNDER AND PASTORS.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

HARE Court derives its name from Sir Nicholas Hare, who was privy councillor to Bluff King Hal, and Master of the Rolls to his Protestant-persecuting daughter—Queen Mary. Hare Court Chapel is one of the oldest centres of London Nonconformity. It is hoary with age and fragrant with religious memories. Associated with its church is an unbroken history of nearly two centuries and a half. In years gone its ministers and leading members took a foremost position in the battle for Nonconformist freedom. The Church was founded by the Rev. George Cokayn, immediately after his ejection from the church of St. Pancras in Soper Lane, because he could not conscientiously conform to the Liturgy of the Church as by law established. He and his loving people commenced religious services in Red Cross Street, where he remained as pastor until his death. They subsequently removed to the "Stated Room" in Hare Court, located between Red Cross Street and Aldersgate Street. In the year 1772, "a commodious and simply severe" chapel was built. The congregation eventually settled in a new sanctuary in St. Paul's Road, Canonbury, and still bearing the historic name of Hare Court Chapel.

The Rev. George Cokayn, B.A., the founder of the Hare Court Church was one of the leading divines of his day. As a Puritan preacher of the Commonwealth, and later, as an Independent minister, he became exceedingly popular. He was a man of considerable pulpit power, and was liberally endowed with extraordinary gifts and graces. Honourably he filled the unique position of being the friend and spiritual adviser of Oliver Cromwell, Sir Bulstrode Whitelocke, Henry Ireton, and other prominent national leaders of the seventeenth century. He has been described as having "rich brown hair, parted in the centre of the forehead, which flowed down in clustered masses over his shoulders. His face shone with ruddy health, and was aglow with enthusiasm. To the charms of his person were superadded a vigorous intellect and a natural eloquence which irresistibly won the hearts of his hearers."

George Cokayn was descended from an ancient family, whose ancestral pedigree goes back to several centuries before the date of the Norman Conquest. He was the son of the Bedfordshire branch of the family, who have linked their name with the neighbouring village of Cockayne-Hatley. He was born at Cotton End, Cardington, on the outskirts of Bedford town, and was baptised in the mother parish church of Cople, on January 16, 1619. He was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. In the year 1648, he became the vicar of St. Pancras, Soper Lane, London, where he faithfully ministered for twelve years. In 1666 the church was burnt to the ground in the Great Fire of London, and the parish afterwards became absorbed in the adjoining one. The site of the church is not exactly known, and only a fragment of the old burial-ground still remains.

During the Commonwealth, St. Pancras is said to have been a church famous for its civic ceremonies. The congregation of George Cokayn at St. Pancras included the Cromwells, Henry Ireton, Whitelocke, Colonel Rowland Wilson, Sir John Moore, the poet Milton, Alderman Tichborne, the Lord Mayors of the city, and other notables.

In his thirtieth year, and in November, 1648, Cokayn preached before the members of the House of Commons, on the occasion of the Monthly Fast, at the old church of St. Margaret's. The service lasted from three to four hours. It was a time of national anxiety. King Charles was a State prisoner, and Cromwell was at the height of his political power. On that memorable day of fasting and prayer, Cokayn selected for text the significant words of the Psalmist: "I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the Most High. But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes. Arise, O God, judge the earth, for Thou shalt inherit all nations." At the close of the service he was sincerely congratulated by his parliamentary friends, and subsequently was presented with the thanks of the House for his wise words and opportune counsels. Afterwards, he published the sermon under the title of "Flesh Expiring and the Spirit Inspiring the New Earth." When he was asked to preach a second time before the parliament he respectfully refused.

In an old Church Record still kept at Bunyan Meeting, Bedford, there are several references to the Rev. George Cokayn and Hare Court. By birth these two eminent divines were near neighbours. Their county kinship and their spiritual sonship ripened into the closest friendship. On a wet night in August, 1688, Bunyan, drenched with rain, rode to the hospitable home on Snow Hill of John Strudwick, who was the first appointed deacon of Hare Court. The immortal dreamer was suddenly seized with a violent fever. After ten days' illness he passed through the river of death and joined the pilgrims in the celestial city. Dr. Brown is strongly of opinion that it was "George Cokayn, who, as Bunyan's life-long friend and John Strudwick's pastor, would almost certainly conduct the funeral service." Another authority says: "Regarding the relations which subsisted between Bunyan and Cokayn, we have no doubt now that Cokayn was a constant and welcome visitor at the sick couch of the dying pilgrim; that it was he and Deacon Strudwick who wrote down the dying sayings of Bunyan; that it was George Cokayn who laid the immortal dreamer to rest in the vault of Strudwick; and that it was George Cokayn who, when Mary Bunyan hurried up to London to see her sick husband, but arrived too late, ministered to her the consolations of the Gospel in that time of sorrow. Had Hare Court no other tale to tell of her history, the relations between Cokayn and Bunyan would suffice to make her famous."

The literary work of George Cokayn is not extensive, but, nevertheless, it is interesting for its associations and its flavour of Puritan quaintness. He assisted the Rev. Joseph Caryl in the compilation of a Greek Lexicon. In 1646 he wrote a prewomb of Providence, and which will come out first we know not."

After the Restoration, Cokayn was four times indicted for preaching against the Stuart kings and denouncing the government. For having expressed an opinion in his father's house at Cardington "that the old king did ought to be beheaded," he was thrown into prison. George Cokayn died on November 21, 1691, and was buried near to the graves of John Bunyan and Hare Court's first deacon, in Bunhill Fields Cemetery.

The Hare Court church relics include an old portrait of the Rev. George Cokayn in oils; and the silver communion service. It is thought to be some two hundred and fifty years old, and was used by the church when it worshipped at Soper Lane. One cup is stamped with the armorial device of Sir Robert Tichborne, and the four solid dishes were the gift of Sir Bulstrode Whitelocke.

Cokayn was succeeded in the pastorate of Hare Court by the Rev. John Nesbitt, who was a native of Cumberland. Before he was twenty years of age he underwent a five months' imprisonment for the defence of his Nonconformist principles. During his thirty-seven years' ministry the church increased its membership and grew in influence. He was an accomplished Greek scholar, an able preacher, and a learned theologian. He died in 1727, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and was buried at Bunhill Fields. He was succeeded by John Hurlion, Samuel Bruce, Dr. William King, Joshua Webb, and William Sterne Palmer.

Dr. Raleigh entered upon the Hare Court pastorate in January, 1859, and remained until the year 1875, when he removed to Kensington. In his day he attained great popularity in the Congregational Churches. Although he was only of average height and of fragile physique, yet his snowy locks gave him a venerable and imposing appearance. As a preacher his sermons "were always devoutly meditative, and thrillingly interesting. His manner was grave, his elocution perfect, and his voice admirably suited to convey the loftiest ideas and sublimest sentiments into the deepest depths of the soul." He gained a position of eminence as an author and contributor to religious magazines. As a writer he had an elegant diction and a silvery musical phrase. During his ministry at Hare Court the church was advanced to the highest state of prosperity. At every service it was filled to overflowing and the membership was increased to over one thousand. Nearly £10,000 per year were raised by the church for the different branches of religious and philanthropic enterprise. His successors were the Rev. W. M. Statham, and the Rev. Henry Simon, who died somewhat prematurely in 1892. Some twelve months later Dr. J. Lawson Forster removed from Chelsea to be the minister of Hare Court.

face to the works of Dr. Tobias Crispe—an eminent Calvinistic author of some repute. In 1658 Cokayn published a sermon that he had preached at the funeral of the Hon. Colonel Underwood, entitled, "Divine Astrologie, or a Scripture Prognostication of the sad events which ordinarily arise from the good man's fall by death." Ten years later he saw Bunyan's last book through the press. Cokayn wrote the preface for it, in which he deplorably says: "Who knows what will become of the ark of God! Therefore it is a seasonable duty with old Eli to sit trembling for it. Do we not also hear the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of wars? Mercy and judgment seem to be struggling in the same

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

III.—ON BEING MASTER OF ONE'S FATE.

HERE is no poem of Wordsworth's more intimately characteristic of the man than that to which he latterly gave the somewhat prosaic and pedantic title, "Resolution and Independence," but which all real lovers of him like to think of by the earlier and simpler name: "The Leech-Gatherer." It is a stately, grave, austere poem, but with vivid human passion at the heart of it: as severe in its absolute simplicities as the bleak moor it has for its scene, and as such one of the finest moral tonics I know. Let me give as swift an account of it as is consistent with its high merit. The poem, as it stands, is a unity, but Wordsworth's own report of its origin more than hints to us that it is a gathering together, and a poetic idealisation, of several scattered experiences, fused by intense imaginative heat. He did not meet the old leech-gatherer precisely in the situation described; the state of mental dejection, following on one of high exhilaration, which introduces the main motif of the poem, belongs to another date and place than those the poem itself suggests. Here is Wordsworth's own brief note: "Written at Townend, Grasmere. This old man I met a few hundred yards from my cottage: and the account of him is taken from his own mouth. I was in the state of feeling described in the beginning of the poem, while crossing over Barton Fell from Mr. Clarkson's, at the foot of Ullswater, towards Askham. The image of the hare I then observed on the ridge of the Fell." Let me pause and give the image. Any one who has kept his eyes open in the country will recognise its truth. I will quote the entire stanza:

All things that love the sun are out of doors:
The sky rejoices in the morning's birth:
The grass is bright with rain-drops;—on the moors
The hare is running races in her mirth;
And with her feet she from the plashy earth
Raises a mist, that, glittering in the sun,
Runs with her all the way, wherever she doth run.

I have said that the poem is a unity—as all poems should be, but unhappily are not—and its one theme is: that a man need not be the sport and slave of random emotions, but may, and ought to, command and contain himself by moral fortitude and strength of inward principle. It is an apt lesson for an age which, like ours, is sadly erotic and neurotic. First the alternations of feeling in the poet's mind are vividly pictured. It is a morning of clear, bright sunshine, such as often, in that district, comes after floods of rain.

I was a traveller then upon the moor,
I saw the hare that raced about with joy;
I heard the woods and distant waters roar;
Or heard them not, as happy as a boy:
The pleasant season did my heart employ:
My old remembrances went from me wholly:
And all the ways of men, so vain and melancholy.

But suddenly a reaction supervenes. The spirit falls from its height of joy to a corresponding depth of dejection. "Dim sadness and blind thoughts," the prevision of a coming day of "solitude, pain of heart, distress, and poverty," will not be put off. To darken the picture come visions of other careers of opening promise closed in premature night. Was there not Chatterton, the sleepless soul, that marvel of poetic precocity, concerning whom one who knows has said that his two ample volumes of poems, "now, upwards of a century after his death, command our admiring wonder for the rare evidence of genius and sustained power which they display," and who, when still three months short of eighteen years, perished from poison administered by his own hand, in an obscure London lodg-

Who walked in glory and in joy, but whom the snobbery of high Edinburgh society did much to spoil, and who died at the early age of thirty-nine, mainly from want of this same manly self-control. Here a reminiscence of Carlyle's "Lectures on Heroes" comes up, and will not be put by till one puts it down on this page. "These lion-hunters were the ruin and death of Burns. It was they that rendered it impossible for him to live. He could not get his lionism forgotten, honestly as he was disposed to do so. He falls into discontents, into miseries, faults; the world getting ever more desolate for him; health, character, peace of mind, all gone; solitary enough now. It is tragical to think of! These men came but to see him; it was out of no sympathy with him, nor no hatred to him. They came to get a little amusement;—and the hero's life went for it! Richter says, in the island of Sumatra there is a kind of 'Light-chafers,' large fire-flies, which people stick upon spits and illuminate the ways with at night. Persons of condition can thus travel with a pleasant radiance, which they much admire. Great honour to the fire-flies! But—!—" And with that word, so say those who saw and heard, the lecturer stepped suddenly behind the curtain, leaving the scorn that was in him most fitly expressed, because all unexpressed.

But to return from this digression—how was the poet recovered from his abyss of dejection? To his own faith it was by spiritual or providential means. The poem itself suggests "peculiar grace, a leading from above, a something given." The notes put this still more plainly. "I consider," says Wordsworth, "the manner in which I am rescued from my dejection and despair almost as an interposition of Providence. A person reading the poem with feelings like mine will have been awed and controlled, expecting something spiritual or supernatural. What is brought forward? A lonely place, a pond by which an old man was, far from all house or home; not stood, nor sat, but was—the figure presented in the most naked simplicity possible." Let us scrutinise this figure. Its simplicity and rustic dignity fit the bareness of the scene which frames it. With what Mr. Myers well calls "naïve earnestness," Wordsworth continues: "Though I believe God has given me a strong imagination, I cannot conceive a figure more impressive than that of an old man like this, the survivor of a wife and ten children, travelling alone among the mountains and all lonely places, carrying with him his own fortitude, and the necessities which an unjust state of society has laid upon him."

He told that to these waters he had come
To gather leeches, being old and poor :
Employment hazardous and wearisome !
And he had many hardships to endure.
From pond to pond he roamed, from moor to moor ;
Housing, with God's good help, by choice or chance,
And in this way he gained an honest maintenance.

The old man still stood talking by my side ;
But now his voice to me was like a stream
Scarce heard ; nor word from word could I divide :
And the whole body of the man did seem Like one whom I had met with in a dream :
Or like a man from some far region sent,
To give me human strength by apt admonishment.

And soon with this he other matter blended,
Cheerfully uttered, with demeanour kind,
But stately in the main ; and when he ended,
I could have laughed myself to scorn to find
In that decrepit man so firm a mind ;
"God," said I, "be my help and stay secure ;
I'll think of the leech-gatherer on the lonely moor."

It is a type this of which Wordsworth is fond, and his fondness for it is one of his chief sanities. The Pedlar of the "Excursion," Michael, the shepherd of "Greenup Ghyll," and the "Old Cumberland Beggar," are other examples, to say nothing of the classic "Laodamia." Let my readers turn to them all. It is the sure and strong Epictetian touch; the disdain of poverty and privation, the undaunted temper, the force of man's unconquerable mind.

Is there, for honest poverty,
That hangs his head, and a' that !
The coward slave we pass him by,
We dare be poor for a' that !

How life has changed since Wordsworth's day, and how different the scenes amid which we live from those that environed him! From the quiet of his valleys to the quick, eager life of our big towns and cities—it is a far cry. Life with us has lost its repose: we rush and hurry and worry. As a waggish provincial preacher put it: Isaac no longer goes out into the fields to meditate at the eventide, and lifts his calm eyes and greets Rebekah. He must hurry to the busy station to meet her, for Rebekah is coming by the 7.20 express. We are all nerves nowadays: we are more at the mercy of our feelings. Our emotions are more complex and more responsive. The poet's sensibility is shared more widely. We are creatures of vagrant impulses, impressionist, mobile, and sentimental. It looks as if there were decay of moral fibre, and a tacit concession that to have a mood or a feeling is to have the justification for its fullest indulgence. We tend to be the slaves of random impulses rather than their masters and guides. We need an infusion of something of the old heroic strain. We, too, need our leech-gatherer mentor—the humbler and simpler the better. As Emerson has it: "At times the whole world seems to be in conspiracy to importune you with emphatic trifles. Friend, client, child, sickness, fear, want, charity, all knock at once at thy closet door and say, 'Come out unto us.' But keep thy state; come not into their confusion. . . . Our sympathy is just as base. We come to them who weep foolishly, and sit down and cry for company, instead of imparting to them truth and health in rough electric shocks, putting them once more in communication with their own reason." You know how Newton, once asked how he had been able to achieve his discoveries, replied: "By always intending (that is directing, superintending) my mind." If Newton is too high and hard an example, take a washerwoman I once knew, "The more trouble," she said, "the more lion, that's my principle." The pundit and the plebeian mean at bottom precisely the same thing.

Did you ever ponder the words said to have been spoken by Jesus to Peter, as given in the supplementary chapter to the Fourth Gospel? "When thou wast young thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not." The writer interprets the saying of the manner in which Peter was to die, but while the outer meaning is crucifixion, the inner meaning is that Peter, the child of impulse—still so, as his very next question indicates—should be disciplined by the Spirit and by the future until he should become the strong, helpful, immovable man of principle, according to that word Luke reports: "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." Religion on Impulse, and Religion on Principle—there is the inner secret of the antithesis, and it is equally the burden of this our poem of the month. Christ's word to all of us is: "In your patience (your perseverance, fidelity, constancy) ye shall win your souls." As Bayard Taylor wrote when he was but three-and-twenty years of age: "I will become the sculptor of my own mind's statue." Let us, then, have the spirit of Great-Heart, the stalwart soul who forgets his own heart-troubles and tremors in the helping of the Feeble-Minds and the Ready-to-Halts. You may put Feeling for Fortune in the lovely lines of Enid, and change their spirit and their lesson no whit:

Turn, Fortune, turn thy wheel and lower the proud:
Turn thy wild wheel thro' sunshine, storm and cloud:
Thy wheel and thee we neither love nor hate.

Turn, Fortune, turn thy wheel with smile or frown:
With that wild wheel we go not up or down:
Our hoard is little, but our hearts are great.

Smile and we smile, the lord of many lands:
Frown and we smile, the lord of our own hands:
For man is man and master of his fate.

Turn, turn thy wheel above the staring crowd:
Thy wheel and thou are shadows in the cloud:
Thy wheel and thee we neither love nor hate.

The Shelf of Honour;

OR, BOOKS THAT HAVE MOVED ME.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH RITSON, AUTHOR OF "LOST AND WON," ETC.

"AYLWIN."

CHARLES LAMB, in one of his delightful essays, declares that he felt disposed to say grace upon twenty other occasions in the course of the day besides his dinner: before a pleasant walk, a friendly meeting, or a solved problem. "Why have we none for books?" he asks, "those spiritual repasts—a grace before Milton—a grace before Shakespeare—a devotional exercise proper to be said before reading the 'Fairy Queen'?"

On sitting down to read "Aylwin" I did not say grace, but I felt profoundly thankful, and that is more than can be said of every person who gives formal thanks on sitting down to table.

I had various reasons for gratitude. To begin with, it was a dense November fog, and it was necessary to burn gas nearly all day. Not that that was a reason for gratitude, for abundance of light is indeed to me one of the primal necessities of life, and I chafed under the infliction of darkness in the middle of the day. It was a darkness that might be felt. Hence anything that helped one to "thole" the misery of it was a boon. "Aylwin" promised "respite, respite and nepenthe," and was therefore a just cause of gratitude. Whatever affords innocent forgetfulness of physical misery is surely a boon. Then I was weary and depressed, and sadly in need of some mental distraction which would give the mind opportunity to recover its tone. Something that lifts one out of himself and transports him to new scenes exhilarates like fresh morning air in such circumstances. Really good fiction will do that sometimes better than anything else. Well is it for the man who in his healthier seasons has learned to enjoy fiction, and use it wisely. And happy such a man who, in his time of need, is able to lay hold of what he wants. There is fiction and fiction. What is offered as bread is often found to be a stone. It is good neither for body, mind, or soul. When you light on a book good alike for all three, it is surely something to be thankful for.

And such a book I had reason to believe "Aylwin" would prove to be. Reviews are no doubt sometimes misleading. Apart from all other considerations, there is the fact that the reviewer's taste may not be yours, and so what delights him may be anathema to you. But it seemed impossible that there could be any mistake about that review of "Aylwin." Not only was the writer enthusiastic, but he gave such varied and abundant reasons for the faith that was in him that you felt here was a rare book, such as only appears once or twice in a generation. Casting about for some solace in my physical misery, I bethought me of this new book, and braving the dense, blinding fog, I made my way to the bookseller, tabled (or should I say countered?), my four and six, and returned home in triumph with the book under my arm.

First impressions were all favourable. To begin with, you had something for your money: four hundred and seventy-two pages of clear long primer type, enough to last through a long fog. Then, with its artistic binding and gilt top, the book was arrayed in goodly apparel. But as one cut the leaves there was promise of better things than those merely sartorial; chapter headings of romantic suggestiveness caught the eye: the Cymric Child; the Moonlight Cross of the Gnostics; Haroun-al-Raschid the Painter; the Palace of Nin-ki-gal; the Magic of Snowdon, and others scarcely less calculated to awaken interest.

With a sigh of delighted anticipation, I glanced at the title page. "Aylwin, by Theodore Watts-Dunton." The double-barrelled name was, of course, not new, but one seemed to know little about the man. And yet he had been doing solid, and even extraordinarily brilliant, literary work for years. But for one person who had heard of him before, hundreds have heard of him since the publication of this wonderful work of fiction. Such is the magic power of the novel in these modern days. Even "the recognised master of English critics" is not known beyond a limited circle till he essays fiction. Though "the first critic of our time, perhaps the largest-minded and surest-sighted of any age," as one of the great poets of the day expresses it, Mr. Watts-Dunton has only become known to the great reading world within the last few months. A book like "Aylwin" makes one think of the years of preparation that have preceded the writing of it. This is in some measure true of every book.

It may have been written in so many weeks, months, or years, but in reality it is the outcome of all that went before. Unconsciously, the author had been preparing himself for this work all his life. But in the case of "Aylwin" this is so in a peculiar degree. Not only is the outcome of the long process a great book, but its character clearly reveals the complex and varied training and experience that gave the author the requisite equipment for his task. "To do justice to such a work," as Mr. Coulson Kernahan has well said, "a syndicate of reviewers, not a single reviewer, is required. After the book has been dealt with from the point of view of the novelist's art, the services of an expert in Romanyn might with advantage be called in. It could then go to the naturalist, that he might record his opinion in regard to its marvellous accuracy of observation, and after that, to the art critic, who would find therein more than enough matter for an article upon 'Aylwin' and some aspects of art. And when the scientist, the critic of poetry, and the Cymric scholar had duly commented upon the encyclopædic knowledge borne witness to by 'Aylwin,' the student of philosophic religion might then step forward to express an opinion upon the originality with which Mr. Watts-Dunton has dealt with that 'grafting'—if one may use a horticultural metaphor—of a reverential and poetic attitude of mind upon an original stock of pantheistic belief, which results in what theologians call mysticism." It would seem that Mr. Watts-Dunton has had the training of a scientist, a naturalist, an artist in a double sense, and a student of Romanyn, to say nothing of the training for literary composition which a poet acquires in the exercise of his art.

And yet this classification leaves out the most important training of all—that which has given the author his religious equipment; for "in the true sense of the word, religion—deep, earnest religion—is the mainspring of 'Aylwin.'" The author must therefore have had a religious training and experience of no ordinary kind. It goes without saying, of course, that the religious element is held in solution, so to speak, in the book. "Aylwin" is a work of art, and not only are the various elements in it so fused and mixed as to make a consistent whole, but of this particular element it may be safely said that it is so little obtruded that some would question its title to the name of a religious book at all. This is because there is no preaching, in the literal and didactic sense, that is: and yet Mr. Watts-Dunton is a great preacher who has copied the greatest of all models in that he has adopted the parabolic method, and sought to convey, by dramatic and pictorial expression, a profound moral lesson.

Before dealing with the religious significance of the book, let me say a word or two on that aspect of it which will commend it first of all to the bulk of readers. It must not be imagined that because "Aylwin" is a profoundly religious book it suffers in consequence as a story. There can be no question it will be prized by the great majority of readers for its beauty and interest as a story. It is in that respect full of charm. The writing possesses, not only distinction, but often rises to the level of prose poetry. Mr. Watts-Dunton is a great poet as well as a great literary critic. His first book, "The Coming of Love," will probably be among the enduring poetic work of the century. Its originality, its supernatural glamour, its beauty of thought and expression, and its moral significance, give the book a chance for all time, and at once secured the author a place in the ranks of the greatest living poets. There is one poem in particular which struck me as singularly beautiful, and it has subsequently acquired for me a new interest from the fact that it won the enthusiastic admiration of Rossetti, and led to one of the most memorable and important friendships in the literary history of the time. The poem, which is inserted near the end of the volume, was recited one day by Dr. Hake, and affected Rossetti so deeply that his eyes filled with tears.

Beneath the loveliest dream there coils a fear:
 Last night came she whose eyes are memories now;
 Her far-off gaze seemed all forgetful how Love dimmed them once, so calm they shone and clear.
 "Sorrow," I said, "has made me old, my dear;
 'Tis I, indeed, but grief can change the brow:
 Beneath my load a seraph's neck might bow,
 Vigils like mine would blanch an angel's hair."
 Oh, then I saw, I saw the sweet lips move!
 I saw the love-mists thickening in her eyes—
 I heard a sound as if a murmuring dove
 Felt lonely in the dells of Paradise;
 But when upon my neck she fell, my love,
 Her hair smelt sweet of whin and woodland spice.

A poet does not always excel in prose, but Mr. Watts-Dunton won his spurs in prose before he essayed poetry. Certain it is his prose is beautiful and exhilarates like—, well, I was going to say wine, but a life-long abstainer cannot know just how wine does exhilarate, so I had better find a simile of which I have had some experience, and say, like the bright sunshine of a day in early spring. Anyone with the least feeling for style will find "Aylwin," in this regard, delightful. The story arrests you at once. It opens with the introduction of a boy and girl. Both are wonderful pictures of childhood—of the imaginative order of childhood that is. They are presented with the vividness, and insight, and felicity of touch that characterise the boy and girl in "Lorna Doone," but with the additional elements of genius as the informing spirit of the one, and spirituality as that of the other. Henry Aylwin, the Cymric child, has in him from the very first, an arresting quality which only an imaginative child of nature could possess. Through him the reader is to gain a glimpse of the Romany race, with its curious superstitions, its keen sympathy with and understanding of nature, and its aloofness and detachment from our modern civilisation. Winnie, the heroine, has a freshness, a sweetness, an exquisite simplicity and unwavering loyalty which invest her with a charm almost without parallel in literature. Together the hero and heroine furnish a perfect medium for that poetical interpretation of nature which is, in part at least, the purpose of the book. But there is a third figure which plays an important part in this work, Sinfi Lovell, "the superb, self-reliant, young looper, who is yet a great-natured, loyal, and loving woman to the heart's core, of her." She is even a more magnificent creation than Rhona Boswell, the gipsy girl of "The Coming of Love."

With the story as such I have no intention of dealing. It is romantic and beautiful, and serves to carry the reader on from beginning to end with unflagging interest. There are not wanting thrilling incidents, and an element of weird mystery runs through the book. Pictures, too, there are of natural scenery of surpassing beauty. Wales, at last, has found a writer with the genius, the insight, and sympathy requisite for the task of adequately portraying the splendour of her mountain scenery and the mystic beauty of her glens and waterfalls. But no fair impression of either the story or its concomitants can be given in an article like the present. And in any case it is with the religious and philosophical teaching of the book we are mainly concerned.

The religious teaching of the book is manifold, but it all circles round one subject, the doctrine of immortality and a future life. The truth is, of course, presented symbolically, and in dramatic form. In Philip Aylwin, the father of the hero, we have one to whom the sudden loss of a passionately loved wife has made the idea of materialism "intolerable as hell itself," and belief in the word "never" equivalent to madness. "You will find," he says to his son, "that you dare not leave untried any creed, howsoever wild, that offers the heart a ray of hope, should you ever come to love as I have loved." Now, the doctrine of materialism, as is well known, is, that since thought is a function of the brain, just as steam is a function of the tea-kettle, when the organ perishes, the production can no longer continue, and the soul must surely cease to exist. It is maintained that the spiritual life, the consciousness is absolutely dependent upon the brain. Is it not a fact that a blow on the head destroys memory or consciousness, and that stimulants and poisons, acting upon the brain, change the quality of our ideas? Is it not also true that in perfectly sound sleep consciousness ceases to exist? If these slight interferences with the "grey matter of our cerebral convolutions" destroy consciousness, what will happen when that matter has perished? The Materialist and the Positivist will tell you the inevitable conclusion is that there is no such thing as personal immortality. This conclusion may not be often met with in that blunt form, but it is woven into the very warp and woof of much of the scientific teaching of the time.

Now "Aylwin" is a dramatic refutation of this theory of Materialism. The reader who wishes to see the doctrine attacked on its own ground should procure a capital little book by Professor James, of Harvard,* which is full of suggestion, not only on this subject, but on the cognate one of telepathy. But it must be remembered that the author of "Aylwin," while choosing somewhat different ground on which to tackle the modern heresy, is yet perfectly cognisant of every phase of the whole subject, and within certain limits has even traversed the contention of the scientific Materialist. But in the main he has fallen back on the consciousness and experience of the race. His work is a striking link between the ancient doctrine of Animism, and the latest results of psychological investigation. Animism in some form is found among the lowest and most barbarous tribes, and arose from the evidence of the senses, interpreted by the crude and child-like science of the savage. "Two problems seem to have occupied the primitive mind. First, What is it which makes the difference between a living body and a dead one? what causes waking sleep, trance, disease, and death? In the second place, What are those human shapes which appear in dreams and visions? The savage makes these two groups of phenomena each help to account for the other, by combining both in the conception of an apparitional or ghost-soul, the cause of life and thought in the individual it animates, capable of leaving the body and appearing to men waking or asleep, as a phantasm, and able to enter into the bodies of men, animals, and things inanimate." Have we not heard our African missionaries tell how the natives believe their dead ancestors have entered into certain trees, and that from them all kinds of malign influences flow?

The influence of the dead over the living is, however, not merely a question occupying the minds of the ancients, or of the modern heathen. It is profoundly interesting many of the most devout and enlightened of our own time. "The whole universe is one great whispering-gallery, and we are again surrounded, as the Apostle said, by a 'great cloud of witnesses.'" But to keep to the subject before us, which is Mr. Watts-Dunton's use of the ancient doctrine of Animism as it is found among the gypsies to-day. The story of "Aylwin" is the story of a dead man's curse; of how that curse fell upon an innocent victim, and so affected her brain as to change her, to all intents and purposes, into another person; and of how ultimately the curse was voluntarily accepted by another in whom it practically, after a short time, disappeared. That is far too bald a statement of the book to be fair to it. The vividness, the terrible reality, the blended pity and terror, the mystical beauty and romantic glamour of the story are required to do justice to its teaching. While Mr. Watts-Dunton has for years been waging war against the dogmatism of the scientific materialist, and has rendered splendid service in the field of argument, he has in "Aylwin" fallen back on what must, after all, be the final court of appeal to every human soul on the question of immortality, the experience and consciousness of the individual and the race. The creed of a blind materialism cannot meet the needs of the human heart, especially in the great crises of life. To quote the closing words of D'Arcy in "Aylwin," "When our hearts are torn as yours has been torn, and when our souls are on fire with a flame such as that I saw was consuming you, the awful possibilities of the universe—of which we, civilised men or savage, know nothing—will come before us, and tease our hearts with strange wild hopes, though all the "proof" of all the logicians should hold them up to scorn."

And now, what more shall I say of this remarkable book? One might speak of it as a great interpretation of spiritual love, albeit, one of the most passionate love-stories in the world, and as pure as it is passionate. Or one might dwell on the madness of Winnie Wynne, than which there has been nothing more moving, more pathetic, more poignantly sorrowful in literature for generations. Or yet again, how natural it would be to fasten on its thrilling, absorbing interest as a mere story, and the pleasure the reading it will give to multitudes who scarcely reflect at all on its deeper meaning. But its supreme value in the eyes of the thoughtful and the religious will be found in the fact that it preaches so powerfully, so eloquently, so convincingly, the great doctrine of immortality, and has thus, not only invested the novelist's calling with a new dignity and honour, but has set an example which is calculated to turn the stream of modern fiction into higher and purer and nobler channels.

Present-Day Prophets and their Messages.

BY JAMES P. LANGHAM.

I.—JOHN PULSFORD, THE MYSTIC.

IN every age God has His chosen messengers through whom He sends the needed word to His child—man. We dishonour God, and misread history, when we think our own age is destitute of prophetic voices. To our own age God has spoken unmistakably, but the ears of the multitude have been deaf to the message. The prophet has not only to bring God's message, but to find an audience. Hence, as a rule, prophets fall on evil times; and only when they have joined the majority is the importance of their message recognised. To-day, as in past times, stones are the portion of the prophets; coming generations will garnish their sepulchres. Prophets speak because they are impelled and compelled by the truth from God which takes possession of their minds and lays its commands upon their consciences. They may or may not belong to the Church; and they draw through heaven-born sympathies into the bosom of the common people. They ever seek to lessen the tyranny of classes and cliques, to widen the bounds of human liberty and to raise the ideal of life. Every man is a prophet who brings to his age a message which widens and heightens human thought, purifies and elevates human life, and strengthens and makes instinct with life the bonds which bind men to each other.

If God be our Father as well as our King, then inspiration and revelation will never cease; and every age will have its seers whose vision is not bounded by the material surfaces of things, and who veritably declare the will of God.

The character of the revelation will vary as the needs of men and the recipient messengers vary. God still speaks to men in divers manners by men who are capable of voicing His message. As God used the mouths and pens of men in ancient Israel to make known His will, so verily He uses the mouths and pens of men to-day.

We purpose to speak in these papers of men who, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, have shown the possession of powers, which entitle them to a place in the gallery of prophets.

The first nineteenth-century prophet we will speak of is John Pulsford, preacher and mystic. He was born at Torrington, in North Devon, in the second decade of the present century. When a youth he was apprenticed to a draper, but soon heard a voice calling him to another sphere—the sphere of the Christian ministry. He then entered the Baptist College at Stepney, and spent some years in the acquisition of knowledge and the culture of the inner man. On leaving college, he became pastor of the Baptist Church at Southampton, where he remained three years. After leaving Southampton he held pastorates at Hull, Offord Road, London, and Edinburgh. In all these places he was indeed a minister of Christ, who spoke as he felt convinced his Master would have him speak. He was more concerned to publish the divine message with absolute faithfulness, than to win a temporary popularity. With his great gifts he might easily have become the leader of a denomination, the controller, very largely, of its destinies. But a power to which he was ever heart-loyal led him by another path. To him was given the power to see into the heart of things, and reveal to men the reality of being. Most people think of the unseen as unreal, but he knew, with Paul, that "the things that are not seen are eternal." His excursions into the unseen, his knowledge of its eternal verities, gave to his messages, both spoken and written, a quality altogether unlike the words of the average speaker and writer. The average hearer, missing the forms of speech and modes of thought with which he was familiar, regarded him as peculiar and unsafe; and the ecclesiastics who prided themselves on their orthodoxy, excommunicated him, as a heretic. This they did actually and formally. "At a time

When his heart was crushed beneath severe domestic grief, he was waited upon by a group of ministers forming an Association in the town (Hull), the leader of which deputation read to him a paper drawn up and signed by all, solemnly cutting him off from all Christian communion."

These purblind occupants of the pulpit refused communion with a man upon whom the spirit of the Christ had fallen in richest measure. The only excuse that can be offered for their conduct is their spiritual limitations. We must have eyes to see and ears to hear, before we can recognise a divine messenger, or appreciate his message. We are not in a position, nor have we the desire, to dwell at any length on the incidents and experiences of his ministerial career. As a preacher, his ministry was unique and wonderful. Those who were privileged to enjoy it felt that they were indeed listening to a man versed in the deep things of God, who could, and did, open to them the way into the Holy of Holies. Beyond the audience influenced by his voice was a wider audience, to whom his published books were as draughts of living water. Without question, his books are living books, which serve as distributors of life to hungry natures longing for heavenly food. They are a contribution to the enrichment of human thought of inestimable value. No one can read them without a great clearing of his mental vision, the widening of his mental outlook, and the quickening of his spiritual nature.

Those who desire to make acquaintance with Pulsford's teachings cannot do better than begin with his first book, "Quiet Hours," published during his ministry in Hull. It is the natural introduction to his other works. In it breathes the same spirit of loyalty to Christ which distinguishes the many productions of his pen. All Pulsford's books are characterised by abounding life and superabundance of ideas. Each volume opens to the reader a new world of inquiry, reveals a new heaven of delightful truths. Still, in all you are conscious of the controlling influence of certain dominant ideas. In "Quiet Hours" we have the pleasing glow of dawn; in "Loyalty to Christ" we have the golden glory of noon-day; and the noon-day glory is felt to be the natural consummation of the morn-ing's brightness. Heaven spoke through John Pulsford from the first; but as time passed, the messenger was able to utter more fully and clearly the divine message. "Quiet Hours" was the prelude to the series of truth-revealing books which were to follow. It consists of a number of short papers on great themes. To give some idea of the style of the author, and the quality of his thought, I will transcribe one of his "Aids to Thought."

A LITTLE BIRD'S SERMON TO A SERMON-MAKER.

"I was in the act of kneeling down before the Lord my God, when a little bird, in the lightest, freest humour, came and perched near my window, and thus preached to me, all the while hopping about from spray to spray: 'O, thou grave man, look on me, and learn something, if not the deepest lesson, then a true one. Thy God made me, and the like of me; and if thou canst conceive it, loves me and cares for me. Thou studiest Him in great problems, which oppress and confound thee: thou lovest sight of one half of His ways. Learn to see thy God, not in great mysteries only, but in me also. His burden on me is light, His yoke on me is easy; but thou makest burdens and yokes for thyself which are very grievous to be borne. I advise thee not only to see God in little things, but to see little, cheerful, sportive things in God, as well as great, solemn, awful things. Things deep as Hell, and high as Heaven, thou considerest over much; but thou dost not "consider the lilies" sufficiently. Every priest should put by his awful robes, etc., sometimes, and go free. If thou couldst be as a lily before God, for at least one hour in the twenty-four, it would do thee good: I mean, if thou couldst cease to will and to think, and be only. Consider, the lily is as really from God as thou art, and is a figure of something in Him,—the like of which should also be in thee. Thou longest to grow, but the lily grows without longing;—yes, without either thinking or willing, grows, and is beautiful, both to God and man. Think of that.

"In conclusion, I remind thee that God has "many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without significance." But I perceive that thine ear is open only to voices of one kind. Thy danger is, under conceit of being the more godly, of becoming monstrous, and not quite God-like. Excuse a little bird. I am but one of the "many kinds of voices," which God has "in the world."

The bird's sermon is needed by great numbers of religious people to-day. It is very easy to think the divine communications must come to us along certain well-defined and familiar channels only. But he that hath ears to hear will often hear the Lord speaking to him through new lips, and will find the message more forceful in consequence. It will do the most fervent Methodist good to spend a few quiet hours with this man, who kept his doors and windows ever open towards heaven and God. His Methodist fervour will gain spiritual depth by contact with this great soul, who was indeed a friend of God. Before leaving this book, which carries with it a heavenly atmosphere, I will give you one more aid to devout thought.

OPEN DOORS.

"The door by which the world enters the soul, in the act of opening, shuts the door by which Heaven enters. Hence, it happens that those who have their door constantly open towards the world have their door as constantly shut towards Heaven. While worldly gains and pleasures, scenes and sounds, are freely entering the soul by an open door, the King of Heaven stands knocking at a shut door. On the other hand, when the door freely opens to the Lord Jesus, and to Heavenly gains and joys, the door, by which the world enters, closes. The worldly door, being shut, the Lord Jesus and the soul banquet together. The soul is then in her glory, she is dead to the world, and the world is dead to her."

"The great Master Himself said: 'Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father, which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.'

"Unless the door of the soul is shut to the world, it is no use shutting the door of our oratory, our place of prayer."

I first became acquainted with the greatest mystic of the nineteenth century by reading that wonderful book, "The Supremacy of Man."

When once I had tasted the waters of this heavenly stream, I thirsted for larger draughts; and with eager haste and great delight, perused work after work from our author's pen. The hours spent in communion with this great soul were hours of spiritual exhilaration, which lifted me to a higher level of life, and changed the whole horizon of my spiritual outlook. I felt that the author of the books was indeed my friend, and when I wanted more light, I ventured to appeal to him to supply it. His letters, received in answer to my inquiries, established between us a spiritual "rapport" which I cannot feel was broken by his decease. Those who have been made brothers by the powers of the world-to-come remain such to eternity. Even now, when I take up his letters, I cannot feel that he who penned them is dead. I think of him, and feel him to be more livingly near and with me, than vast numbers with whom I mingle in the walks of life.

We cannot think of them as dead
Who walk with us no more;
Along the path of life we tread,
They have but gone before.
Ours are they by an ownership
Nor time nor death can free;
For God hath given to love to keep
Its own eternally.

Before dealing with the great messages with which the later works abound, I will ask my readers to share with me the pleasure of the perusal of one of these prized and precious letters.

I wrote to him asking his counsel with regard to certain authors, and certain lines of spiritual inquiry I was at that time pursuing, and received in reply the following letter, full of loving counsel and spiritual wisdom.

"Huntly, Bishop's Teignton,

"May 19, 1892.

"I feel sure that there are for every age special centres of revelation and channels of inspiration. But in reading Swedenborg, Jacob Behmen, Thomas Lake Harris, etc., I have always been careful not to be brought into bondage to any man. It seems to me better to avail ourselves of all teachers and helps for the quickening and developing of one's own individuality, rather than to bring our individuality and specific genius into subjection to any one scheme of thought and organisation.

* * * * *

"In my judgment of books, my rule is not to inquire about the writer, but what is written. Does it quicken and enlarge my soul? Does it elevate my mind, kindle my sympathies, and heighten my aspirations?"

"What matters it to me who wrote John's Gospel? or when it was written?"

"One, and only One, is Lord and Master—God in the Man, the Man in God. Yearningly open your bosom and brain to His in-breathing, asking God to clear your channels of reception. Walk carefully, tenderly, prayerfully, watchfully—with no own will for anything; but ever craving that your whole being—spirit, soul, flesh—may be the dwelling-place and throne of His Spirit.

"Then you will slowly grow, and become the organ of His Divine Breath. But be patient, for the difficulties to be overcome are very great, and the transformation of the nature-race of man into God's race is the work of all works.

"Sincerely yours,

"J. PULSFORD."

At a future time I will give a brief account of his other characteristic books.

The Arrested Gesture.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE.

STEPHEN STEVENS was always in his place ten minutes before service-time. He had no great distance to come, but the ascent to Rosehill was a climb for a man of his years. There was time, also, for "a bit talk with the Lord" on his own account. As the congregation assembled, he scanned the Hymnal, wondering which of the six-lines-eights would be the preacher's choice.

He made a picturesque figure in his Sabbath attire. The velvet jacket and the black silk neckerchief were all that could be seen, and their Sabatarian association was unavoidable.

He was short and stout, with a big, round, rosy face, and close-cropped hair, white as snow.

He had his own place at Rosehill. At the preacher's left, in the second seat on the side gallery, at the corner near the door, Old Steve was wont to sit.

He came to worship. For the congregation as a congregation, he had no concern. His eyes never wandered from the preacher's face. With his body at an angle, his left foot well in advance, his left hand gripping the rail of the book-board, he confronted the man in the pulpit.

The critical was foreign to Old Steve's temper. It never occurred to him that the statements of the preachers might be open to challenge. To him they were infallible.

Stephen was not a silent listener, though he never said a word. Occasionally those near to him heard a gurgle in his throat, and knew that he was chuckling inwardly; but no word escaped his lips. Old Steve was eloquent of gesture. His right arm was always free, and the hand was an expert in the language of gesticulation. Every point was caught. Indeed, the faculty of anticipation was his. Closely following the sermon, he was able to foresee the truth approaching. High aloft his arm would swing, and when at length the truth was voiced, down would come his hand in concurrence emphatic. When a fact beyond the ordinary was coming, his head would spring erect, his eyebrows elevate, and confirmation would accompany the statement with a vigour of gesture commensurate with the truth's importance. Even when the preacher was passive, Steve's procedure was unchanged. The preacher furnished the oration; the old man supplied the action. Strange preachers were disconcerted when they came to Rosehill. Stephen monopolised their attention. "Antics," they thought his movements at the outset, but, ere the service ended, they knew that one, at least, had been an interested auditor.

Stephen Stevens was not a native of those parts. No one knew from whence he came. When the Excelsior Works had been enlarged, workmen skilled in specific mechanical branches were required. Applicants came from far and near. Stephen was one of these, and one of the fortunate. He came alone. His odd and cleanly dress had attracted David Dale, and his simple statement of his capabilities won the confidence of the engineer. His years were fifty, but his sight was keen, and his faculties vigorous. Till his sixtieth year, his name was on the pay-sheets. Then he was "pensioned off" through his employer's bounty.

On the first Sunday morning succeeding his engagement, Stevens entered the chapel on the mount. Much amusement was created by his mode of exhibiting agreement. There were those in Rosehill who were accustomed to ejaculate. Stephen alone was wont to gesticulate. Ten years' experience of the old man's "way" had reduced the comicality to a commonplace.

It was thought by some that he might leave the district when he had secured his old-age gratuity. Old Steve continued to lodge with Widow Thompson. Morning by morning he was seen taking an easy walk, dressed in his factory-clothes—the fustian trousers, the thick, dark, woollen shirt, the hairy waistcoat, the blue linen jacket, and the reefer above. It was understood that of kith and kin he was destitute. During all the years, no visitor had inquired for his whereabouts. That he neither wrote nor received letters were facts vouched for by his garrulous landlady. She had done her best to unearth the years which lay behind him, but he had nothing to tell. A quiet life he lived, with no engagements save the Rosehill week-night meetings. He never missed the class, and was better than punctual at the mid-week preaching. It was not unusual to find him in his place when the choir was being practised.

There were some with tender insight who commiserated the old man's friendlessness. That he was lonely was their generous suspicion. They greeted him cordially, as occasion offered, and helped to assure him that he was living amongst friends.

No eye, save the eye of the preacher, noted the panic of Stephen Stevens. It was the Sabbath night, and the middle of the sermon. Forms were in the aisles for the overwhelming congregation. The interest was breathless, for the word was light and fire. "What I have written, I have written," was the text, and, in the treatment of the Reverend Caleb Kent, Pilate's speech became an exposure of grim fact and a conscience appeal.

"What I have written, I have written," repeated the speaker. "In the narrative it is a report of an historical statement. In actual life it is the announcement of a law—the law of the past's irreparableness.

"What I have thought, I have thought. I cannot unthink it. Try as I may, the effort is futile. I wish it were otherwise. The wish cannot tamper with fact.

"What I have spoken, I have spoken. I recall the word. Fool that I am! It is spoken. It cannot be unspoken. I weep in the bitterness of the recollection. I beat my hands in the air. I will do anything to unfact the fact. I am undone."

Stephen Stevens never diverted his gaze from the face of Caleb Kent. His mind was alert for the advancing truths, and his hand was energetic of gesture.

"What I have done, I have done," pursued the man in the pulpit. "I wrote that cruel letter, and posted it. The moment I slipped it into the pillar-box, I knew my soul was fiendish. I will get it back, tear it into shreds, and burn it piece by piece. It cannot be done. The postal authorities taunt me."

Old Stevens gesticulated appropriately.

"My friends," Caleb Kent exclaimed, "here is the law of life's irreparableness, defying denial, controverting sophistry. Actions pass beyond control. Our very iniquities round on us, and get hold of us at last. We are the masters of origins; we are the slaves of sequels. Consequences are relentless. Sin never forgets. Evil never forgives."

The old man in the side gallery was gesticulating wildly.

The paragraph which confounded Stephen was not in the preacher's manuscript. It was a lightning flash.

"Years ago, you remember, you tempted that soul. It was the devil's game, and you enjoyed it. The remembrance is a torment now. The guilt has been forgiven, for you have repented, confessed, and prayed. Is the deed undone? What of the soul you tempted?"

The eyes of the preacher, scanning his hearers, were riveted when the old man met his view. Steve had attitudinised, and was on the point of completing the action. The words of the preacher arrested the gesture. "What of the soul you tempted?" Fear blanched the face of Stephen Stevens, his lip quivered, his hand trembled in mid-air, his arm fell helplessly to his side; he crouched dejectedly. Half of the sermon was yet unuttered. The preacher pursued his theme, and shot shafts in many a heart. The gesticulations were ended. Steve sat to the sermon's climax, with his hands tightly clasped, with his head upon his bosom.

When the Dales drove down to Rosehill on the morning of the Sabbath, they did not return to Woodlea Hall till the evening. In a house adjoining they took their meals. Thus David Dale, his son and daughter, were able to attend the school, and Mrs. Dale was free to visit the aged and sick.

At noon on the Sunday following that to which reference has been made, the engineer and his family were seated at table. The absence of Stephen was the topic of the talk.

"He wasn't at the class on Tuesday!" the master observed.

"The poor old fellow must be ill!" Bob declared. "He has never missed a Sunday service since he came to the works. Mother, you had better call upon Mrs. Thompson and inquire about him!"

"I wish we had known sooner," Miss Dale sympathetically murmured, taking it for granted that he was poorly.

Bella Thompson had a guilty look when Mrs. Dale crossed her threshold.

"Stephen was not at chapel this morning, Mrs.

Thompson," her visitor observed, after the usual introduction.

"No, he wasn't!" the widow rejoined in an injured tone.

"How was that? Is he ill?"

"There's somethin' the matter with him, certain sure!" the landlady asserted, "but what it is, you're as wise as me."

"What did the doctor say? You would call him in?"

"What for the doctor?" Bella Thompson sneered. "It wasn't his body that was bad, the trouble's on his mind, or in his heart. He was like a man demented. I was glad when he went off!"

"Went off!" Mrs. Dale repeated in genuine surprise and distress. "When did he go off?"

"He went on Monday morning, if you want to know. Last Sunday night he was his usual when he went to chapel. When he came in, he was 'dotherin'' all over, and as white as a ghost. What was 'troublin'' him I cannot say. He's the closest man-body that ever was. I only got to know where he had gone from the clerk at the station. He had taken a ticket for Birmingham."

Three weeks later, the Congress of Mechanical Engineers was held in the Iron City of the Midlands. David Dale was in attendance. It was Friday morning. The homeward train was timed to leave at 9.15. Throwing the dailies and weeklies upon the seat, he waited on the platform till starting-time.

"Good gracious!" he mentally ejaculated. "Surely that's Stephen Stevens! No! Yes! Who can that woman be?" and on the instant he was walking hastily to the place where the old couple were standing.

Stephen's face, when Mr. Dale accosted him, was the face of the fearful, the surprised, and delighted.

"Maister Dale!" the old man faltered, the handbag slipping from his fingers, "wherever have ye come fra'?"

"You're not the only traveller with business in Birmingham!" was the smiling response.

Steve was obviously uneasy.

"This is my missis, Maister Dale!" he said, looking at the engineer. "Becky, this is the maister I worked for, an' the gentleman that pays my pension!"

The woman timidly turned her eyes when thus addressed. Her lips moved, but no sound was audible.

The whistle recalled David Dale to the actuality of the journey.

"Are you coming back again, Stephen?" he asked, preparing to return to the carriage.

"Becky an' me's goin' there now!" the old man replied, picking up the hand-bag.

"Then come with me!"

A word with the guard, and privacy was guaranteed.

The train sped on. A hundred miles were covered, and David Dale was no nearer to an explanation. The papers lay unopened. With rare discrimination, the engineer had put Stephen at his ease, and even prompted speech from Mrs. Stevens. By-and-by, she rested in the corner with tightly-closed eyes. She was a woman of sixty, was the thought of David Dale as he looked at her face, pale and thin and deeply wrinkled. Old Steve followed the master's eyes, and his were full of pain as they rested on the features of his wife. He turned to find the eyes of David Dale kindly bent on him.

Suddenly he unbosomed his secret. Leaning forward, laying a trembling hand on the master's knee, he hoarsely whispered: "Becky an' me were wedded thirty-six years ago. I was the boss of a gang in one of the iron-shops, an' made a mint o' money. If I'd had the sense that I got after, I could have pensioned mysel' an' many another. Drink is the workin'-man's curse. Mornin', noon, an' night, it was drink, drink, drink. . . . Becky was religious. She'd never been onythin' else. She was a choir lass when I married her. . . . Poor soul! She made me sign teetotal, an' was happy as a queen. . . . I fooled her, start and finish."

It cost him much to tell his tale. Ever and anon he glanced to her face to assure himself that she was sleeping.

"Then I did what the minister said. I tempted her. I held the glass up to the light, and put it to her lips. She drank it every drop."

The old man's face was overshadowed. There was silence in the compartment.

"It's bad for a man to drink, but worse for a woman. They're made of finer stuff, an' the drink plays havoc with them. . . . She was worse nor me. . . . And so we lived for years. We never had childer for a blessin'. I was gettin' golden guineas, an' we lived in a dirty flat."

Again the old man peered at the face of his sleeping wife.

"Then I got converted, an' signed the pledge for fairs. It was a Gospel Temperance Mission, so I went for both, and got them. I wanted Becky to join me, but she wouldn't be on. Then I rued that I had tempted her. She flung it in my teeth. 'Who held the glass up to the light?' she would say."

The tears were raining down his face.

"I could say nothin' to that. Try? I tried all ways. I prayed an' pleaded, but she always had her answer ready. . . . She was willin' to shift to a bigger house, an' was fond o' the brand-new furniture. . . . It went to the pawnshop at the finish."

"Blame her? I dinna blame her. The fault was mine; but she tried my patience sorely. I wished that we were dead, but it isn't the folks that want to die that get the chance. . . . One night, she never came back, an' I jumped at the hope of rescue. She had left me of her own accord; no further claim she had on me. I knew that I was lyin' to mysel'; but it suited me better than truth. I left her all there was, and went afieid. I worked awhile, an' got made decent, an' then you started me at the Excelsior. . . . I banished her from my thoughts, and succeeded over well. I'm shamed to say that all these years she's never had a cent from me. Whether she was livin' or dead I knew not, and cared not. . . . I thought I was religious, and others thought the same. But the minister guessed my secret. He looked me clear in the face. I was frightened to death when he asked the question: 'What of the tempted soul?' I partly knew. She was either in hell, or on the way, and it was me that sent her. . . . Oh! that Sunday night! I cried like Peter, an' was minded to follow Judas. . . . To find her out and bring her back, that was my notion. . . . She was there where I had left her—but different. The moment I saw her I knew she had got religion. My leavin' her had frightened her. She has never tasted liquor all these years. She's been workin' for her livin' all this time."

His voice faltered in the shame of the recollection.

"When I had enough and to spare, she was cleanin' offices. . . . She's forgiven me, an' was willin' to come. We cannot well be blithesome with the knowledge of all that's past, but we have reason to be thankful,—and we are."

Old Steve sighed, grateful that at length the tragedy was recited.

The old woman was on her feet. Her cheeks were wet with tears. She faced David Dale.

"It's the truth he has told you, maister," she passionately declared. "True, every word; but not all the truth. You're a stranger to me, and I cannot be confidential, but if you knew all you would believe that heavy as was his blame, mine was the heavier still. If only he'd had sense when I had sense, or if I had gone back to religion when he got religion, things would have been different. But life's contrary, and wills are stubborn."

It was David Dale who compelled them to secrecy. Why should the curious be gratified?

One of the Rosehill cottages was prepared for their habitation. They live there still. The past is not forgotten, but mention is never made. They live in prayer, and all their prayers are psalms.

The Reverend Caleb Kent was the preacher last Sabbath morning. He had a great text—and a beautiful. "He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. . . . Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him."

Old Steve was in his place with Becky at his side. The preacher, with the remembrance of the arrested gesture, was glad to see that the old man's facility of gesticulation was unimpaired.

Dr. Berry's Last Voyage.

A REMINISCENCE.

I WAS a fellow-passenger of Dr. Berry on the Germanic, on the occasion of his return late in 1897 from his Peace and Arbitration mission to the United States. To be in his company was to have a delightful time. He was grateful for the cordial reception he had everywhere met with in America—Washington included. He referred thankfully to the spirit of goodwill and real brotherliness that the Americans had everywhere exhibited towards England, and was exuberant in his confidence as to the success of his mission, which he evidently regarded as amongst the best work of his life. He was a most genial companion, considering everybody before himself—making friends of all and pleasure for all. One could easily observe, however, that he was by no means in good health. He could scarcely walk ten minutes at a time upon the deck without excusing himself, that he might rest by leaning over the bulwarks or taking a seat somewhere. A rest with him meant always a re-start for the companionship and pleasure of others.

It was my privilege to spend one day with him on deck—the day of the great storm. We were side by side, roped in to prevent collision with the bulwarks, and in that position we held to the ropes. We stood most of the day and watched the awful turmoil of the elements—the towering, breaking, foaming waves. It was a sublime and solemn spectacle, and a day to be ever remembered. We felt no fear, and shared the blessed fellowship of faith. I repeated snatches of Wesley's hymns, or of Watts'—especially one verse of the latter:—

"This, this is the God we adore,
Our faithful, unchangeable Friend,
Whose love is as great as His power,
And neither knows measure nor end."

The Dr. responded with his usual felicity and apt-ness with passages from the Psalms of David, specially that one which says: "Thy way is in the sea, and Thy path in the great waters," and then, as the old steamship lurched and seemed to drop into the trough of the waves, he would add—"There shall be no more sea." Dr. Berry was at home in the storm; there seemed for him enjoyment in the very danger.

It was on this trip that we had his last sermon at sea. He preached on the Sunday morning previous to the storm upon Eutychus, the young man who slept under the preaching of Paul. Many listened, and some were deeply affected. It was a timely utterance, and full of brave and brotherly appeal. He pointed out that this Eutychus could sleep while the greatest preacher of all the ages was preaching, and also while the greatest themes of all times were being discussed. To many in that saloon the appeal was most appropriate. Commercial men, men who live by travel, speculators, company promoters, old naval men, with sundry of those who seek pleasure by vainly endeavouring to get away from themselves, formed that congregation. More than one of those men must have found his soul waking up under the keen, and yet affectionate, applications Dr. Berry made. It was a worthy effort. It was the last sermon he ever preached at sea.

Most affecting of all was our arrival in Liverpool, and his boyish and beautiful eagerness as he scanned the faces of those waiting on the deck. It was then for the first time I had pointed out to me, in his own humorous way, the brave lady who mourns his loss. He said to me as we looked down from the upper deck on the smiling face of Mrs. Berry: "Odell! Look here; that is the little boss that manages my home." It was evident to all that Dr. Berry would have but little rest. The reporters were there, and they were irrepressible. He could neither evade them nor shake them off. Some of them, I believe, accompanied him to Southport, where he went to spend the evening and meet his family.

A few days later I met him at the Temperance Institute in Birmingham. The American Consul presided, and Dr. Berry gave a report of his visits to the American cities and Churches, and of the impressions received. A great wave of enthusiasm passed over the meeting. Men who had stood comparatively alone—representative members of the Society of Friends and others—rejoiced at what they heard with very great joy. That meeting seems to me now to have been a happy forecast, or, more properly, a real prophecy of the new and better understanding between ourselves as English people and the great American nation, that even now obtains.

I considered that Dr. Berry was at his best in his effort—oration one might fittingly call it—at the Beecher Memorial Service in Plymouth Church, as the spokesman of multitudes of English ministers in acknowledging indebtedness to the unique preacher whose work as a teacher and leader of thought he described and eulogised. For an English minister to pay homage to the work and worth of Henry Ward Beecher is always a sure method of capturing the American heart; and Dr. Berry captured it on his last visit through his Beecher Memorial discourse. I was present at this wonderful service, though at the cost of some time and trouble; for I had rather foolishly neglected to use my friends in order to secure easy entrance and so had to take my chance with the long queue that lined the pavement and reached round the corner into Fulton Street. But at last I managed to get seated where I could both see and hear. I knew the Dr.'s utterance must have been largely extemporised. He had been busy and pressed with very much work before he left England, and the outward voyage on the Teutonic gave him no chance of preparation. But his resource and readiness, with a little quiet, gave him at last the necessary basis for a beautiful and most acceptable deliverance. I have personally many friends in Plymouth Church, and in domestic and social intercourse with these, I found there was cherished and expressed, most grateful appreciation of Dr. Berry's discriminating eulogium of Henry Ward Beecher.

JOSEPH ODELL.

THE LATE DR. MACFADYEN'S STUDY.

Browsings in My Library.

II.

S I look through the book-room window I see the skeleton branches of the trees at the bottom of the garden tossing about, and the southing of a rising gale disposes the impressionable mind to melancholy. The ground is sodden with February rains, and the sky is lowering. Delia, however, has just entered the room and poked the fire, making a cheerful blaze, and she demands my attention.

"I shall be glad when summer comes again," she says. "Winter is all very well for you, buried here among your books, like those creatures that go to sleep in the autumn and wake up when the sunny days come again; but winter brings all sorts of worries to a woman. There is no end to making fires all over the house, and when there are fires everywhere there is always a dusting and a cleaning up. Then the children come in from school with jackets drenched and muddy boots. Oh dear! who would be a woman if she knew what a woman is expected to do?"

Delia is usually very well satisfied with her little kingdom, in spite of the cares of administration, and I can only conclude that the depressing weather has had its effect even on her bright spirit. And, truly, a damp "muggy" winter day is excessively trying. A crisp frost, with a clear sky, makes us all optimists. The spirits are high and the heart is light, and we feel that life is a bright and a joyous thing. Shakespeare says, "There was never yet philosopher that could endure the toothache patiently," and one needs to be a very great philosopher not to grow a little pessimistic on a dull, damp day, when the streets and roads are muddy and miserable, and the fields and gardens are bare, and the wind, as now, is moaning like a giant in pain. We need to take the year as a whole, and regard the winter as the necessary preparation for the unfolding glories of the spring, and the boundless opulence of the summer, in order to appreciate it in its various disagreeable aspects. I have only known one person—and that, by the way, a lady—who really liked to be out in a drenching downpour of rain, a dank, winter fog, or a riotous gale, and she got quite exhilarated by her experiences. But Delia, like most ladies, is different.

It happens that I have been reading again a volume of the essays of that cheery American philosopher, James Russell Lowell, whom I once heard speak delightfully when he was American Ambassador in London. I treat Delia to a few specimens from that charming "Good Word for Winter." And this reminds me of the genial counsel of that prince of bookworms, the late James Hain Friswell, who said, "When a man is at home and happy with a book, sitting by his fireside, he must be a churl if he does not communicate that happiness. Let him read now and then to his wife and children. These thoughts will grow and take root in the hearts of the listeners. Good scattered about is indeed the seed of the sower. A man who feels sympathy with what is good and noble, is at the time he feels that sympathy good and noble himself."

But to come back to Lowell. He begins by quoting Shelley's saying, "Men scarcely know how beautiful fire is," and he is "apt to think there are a good many other things concerning which our knowledge might be largely increased without becoming burdensome," and one of these is winter. He "thinks the old fellow has hitherto had scant justice done him in the main."

"We make him the symbol of old age or death, and think we have settled the matter. As if old age were never kindly as well as frosty; as if it had no reverend graces of its own as good in their way as the noisy impertinence of childhood, the elbowing self-conceit of youth, or the pompous mediocrity of middle life. As if there were anything discreditable in death, or nobody had ever longed for it! Suppose we grant that winter is the sleep of the year, what then? I take it upon me to say that his dreams are finer than the best reality of his waking rivals.

"Sleep, Silence' child, the father of soft Rest' is a very agreeable acquaintance, and most of us are better employed in his company than anywhere else. For my own part, I think Winter a pretty wide-awake old boy, and his bluff sincerity and hearty ways are more congenial to my mood, and more wholesome for me than any charms of which his rivals are capable."

Lowell is cunning, however, in selecting the frosty aspects of winter rather than the driving or drizzling rains and the pea-soup fogs for his eulogies, and the poets whom he quotes show the same discrimination. Perhaps when a Ruskin or a Wordsworth arises who shall bring out the esoteric beauties of general sloppiness and murkiness, we shall all get as much satisfaction out of these, at present unpromising features, as we do from Winter, the king, of whom Cowper sings:

Thy scattered hair with sleet-like ashes filled,
Thy breath congealed upon thy lips, thy cheeks
Fringed with a beard made white with other snows
Than those of age, thy forehead wrapt in clouds,

A leafless branch thy sceptre, and thy throne
A sliding car, indebted to no wheels,
But urged by storms along its slippery way:
I love thee, all unlovely as thou seem'st,
And dreaded as thou art.

"Talking about Ruskin," said Delia, "I was glad to read that the dear old gentleman was well on his eightieth birthday, and that he was able to receive the address from his admirers. What a beautiful writer he is! I sometimes take one of his books from the shelves and sit down for an hour's enjoyment of it in the evening when you are not at home, and the children are in bed, and though I do not understand all his teaching, and some that I do understand does not seem very practical, yet his lovely language and his deep earnestness and perfect sincerity are irresistibly winning. Nobody can read Ruskin without being a better man or woman."

"Why, Ruskin will make a bookworm of you yet. Be careful!"

"I am not so sure of that. Ruskin is different from all these," and Delia swung her arm round towards the shelves, with their crowded tenants, of whom a good number, it must be admitted, seemed from their clothing, or want of clothing, to be very poor relations indeed to the stately volumes of Ruskin. But, as I am always impressing on Delia, you should judge books from the inside and not the outside. "Most people," the owner of a bookstall once said to me, "buy covers and not books." I prefer to buy books—books that will be cheerful and wise companions—and I like them none the worse because they wear shabby coats. Who would not rather spend an evening with an out-at-elbows wit or a philosopher who should keep you continually entertained with good talk than with a pompous fool or a frivolous rattlepate in dress of superfine broadcloth, and the latest Bond Street style? If you can get your books well-dressed, perhaps, so much the better, and yet I should scarcely like to part with some of my dog-eared, worm-eaten, and time-stained volumes, with faded names on the fly-leaf, for all the glories of the latest éditions de luxe.

Ruskin has something to say which strikes me as appropriate on this dull day. We are apt to forget that God makes the darkness as well as the light, the storm that ravages and the floods that sweep over the land as well as the smiling sunshine and the softly fanning breezes. Modern theology has been too apt to regard only the God of the summer and the day of calm, and to pass over the sterner aspects of the Divine Nature. In "Stones of Venice" Ruskin says:

"I understand not the most dangerous, because most attractive form of modern infidelity, which pretending to exalt the beneficence of the Deity, degrades it into a reckless infinitude of mercy, and obliteration of the work of sin; and which does this chiefly by dwelling on the manifold appearances of God's kindness on the face of creation. Such kindness is, indeed, everywhere and always visible; but not alone. Wrath and threatening are mingled with the love, and in the utmost solitudes of nature, the existence of Hell seems to me as legibly declared by a thousand spiritual utterances, as that of Heaven. It is well for us to dwell with thankfulness on the unfolding of the flower, and the falling of the dew, and the sleep of the green fields in the sunshine; but the blasted trunk, the barren rock, the moaning of the bleak winds, the roar of the black, perilous, merciless whirlpools of the mountain streams, the solemn solitudes of moors and seas, the continual fading of all beauty into darkness, and of all strength into dust, have these no language for us? We may seek to escape their teaching by reasonings touching the good which is wrought out of all evil; but it is vain sophistry. The good succeeds to the evil as day succeeds the night, but so also the evil to the good. Gerizim and Ebal, birth and death, light and darkness, heaven and hell, divide the existence of man and his Futurity."

Ruskin has studied his Bible and studied Nature with equal seriousness, and his religion is no mere vague optimism, but a mingling of infinite awe and infinite admiration of the great Creator and His works of revelation—and in the works of revelation he includes Nature as well as the Bible. In this age we are apt to be conceited with our knowledge, contemptible though it be in comparison with our ignorance. Ruskin administers a bitter but wholesome corrective. He says:

"It must be felt at once, that the increase of knowledge, merely as such, does not make the soul larger or smaller; that in the sight of God, all the knowledge man can gain is as nothing: but that the soul, for which the great scheme of redemption was laid, be it ignorant or be it wise, is all in all; and in the activity, strength, health, and well-being of this soul, lies the main difference, in His sight, between one man and another. And that which is all in all in God's estimate is also, be assured, all in all in man's labour; and to have the heart open, and the eyes clear, and the emotions and thoughts warm and quick, and not knowing this or the other fact, is the state needed for all mighty doing in this world. And, therefore, finally, for this, the weightiest of all reasons, let us take no pride in our knowledge. We may, in a certain sense, be proud of being immortal; we may be proud of being God's children; we may be proud of loving, thinking, seeing, and of all that we are by no human teaching: but not of what we have been taught by rote; not of the ballast and freight of the ship of the spirit, but only of its pilotage, without which all the freight will only sink it faster, and strew the sea more richly with its ruin. There is not at this moment a youth of twenty, having received what we moderns ridiculously call education, but he knows more of everything, except the soul, than Plato or St. Paul did; but he is not for that reason a greater man, or fitter for his work, or more fit to be heard by others, than Plato or St. Paul."

Delia thoroughly agreed with this, and observed, as I thought a little maliciously, "That ought to be printed in letters of gold and hung up in every library." The gale by this time was howling furiously, and we watched its behaviour through the window. The trees were straining to the full extent of their bending capacity, and it seemed fortunate that they were destitute of foliage which would have lent a dangerous surface to the wind. With their ramification of branches and twigs they looked exquisitely graceful. No artistry of man can approach this delicate artistry of God in Nature. And all man's artistry, after all, is the imitation of God's works. Ruskin found in a tree, a cloud, an Alpine peak with its cap of virgin snow, effects of art such as no National Gallery on earth can show, yet these effects are missed by most people because they never suspect and never seek them. The artist eye is necessary to find the art. Delia was watching the skeleton trees, and said, "I never noticed before that they were so beautiful. Why, they are like the finest lace. I could sit watching them for an hour."

"Have you ever read," I ask, "Ruskin's description of the olive tree?"

"No, I don't think I have."

"Well, here it is."

"I challenge the untravelled English reader to tell me what an olive tree is like. I know he cannot answer my challenge. He has no more idea of an olive-tree than if olives grew only in the fixed stars. Let him meditate a little on this one fact, and consider its strangeness, and what a wilful and constant closing of the eyes to the most important truths it indicates on the part of the modern artist. Observe, a want of perception, not of science. I do not want painters to tell me any scientific facts about olive-trees. But it had been well for them to have felt and seen the olive-tree; to have loved it for Christ's sake, partly also for the helmed Wisdom's sake which was to the heathen in some sort as that nobler Wisdom which stood at God's right hand, when He founded the earth and established the heavens. To have loved it, even to the hoary dimness of its delicate foliage, subdued and faint of hue, as if the ashes of the Gethsemane agony had been cast upon it for ever; and to have traced line by line, the gnarled writhing of its intricate branches, inlaid on the blue field of the sky, and the small, rosy-white stars of its spring blossoming, and the beads of sable scattered by autumn along its topmost boughs—the right, in Israel, of the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow,—and, more than all, the softness of the mantle, silver grey, and tender like the down on a bird's breast, with which, far away, it veils the undulation of the mountains; these it had been well for them to have seen and drawn, whatever they had left unstudied in the gallery."

Delia sat with her head leaning on her hand and her elbow on the side of the easy chair. She has the artist's soul and instinctive taste, and the matchless glory of Ruskin's prose entranced her. She sat silent and absorbed for some minutes, and then, with something like a sigh, she said, "I am proud to be an Englishwoman, and to be a countrywoman and a contemporary of Ruskin. His words are like the pearls and diamonds that fell from the good fairy's mouth. Nay, rather like those pearls and diamonds set into jewels fit to grace the head and neck of the loveliest princess that ever wore coronet and necklace."

"Charming! Why, he has inspired you with some of his eloquence, and all from an olive-tree. But what do you think of this word-picture—like a masterpiece of Turner?"

"A city of marble, did I say? nay, rather a golden city, paved with emeralds. For truly, every pinnacle and turret glanced or glowed, overlaid with gold, or bossed with jasper. Beneath, the unsullied sea drew in deep breathing, to and fro, its eddies of green wave. Deep-hearted, majestic, terrible as the sea, the men of Venice moved in sway of power and way; pure as her pillars of alabaster, stood her mothers and maidens; from foot to brow, all noble, walked her knights; the low, bronzed gleaming of sea-rusted armour under their blood-red mantle-folds. Fearless, faithful, patient, impenetrable, implacable—every word a fate—sate her senate. In hope and honour, lulled by flowing of wave around their isles of sacred sand, each with his name written, and the cross graved at his side, lay her dead. A wonderful piece of world. Rather, itself a world. It lay along the face of the waters, no larger, as its captains saw it from their masts at evening, than a bar of sunset that could not pass away; but for its power, it must have seemed to them as if they were sailing in the expanse of heaven, and there, a great planet, whose orient edge widened through ether, a world from which all ignoble care and petty thoughts were banished, with all the common and poor elements of life. No foulness, nor tumult, in those tremulous streets, that filled or fell beneath the moon; but rippled music of majestic change or thrilling silence. No weak walls could rise above them; no low-roofed cottage nor straw-built shed. Only the strength as of rock, and the finished setting of stones most precious. And around them, far as the eye could reach, still the soft moving of stainless waters, proudly pure; as not the flower, so neither the thorn nor the thistle could grow in the glancing fields. Ethereal strength of Alps, dream-like, vanishing in high procession beyond the Torcellan shore; blue islands of Paduan hills poised in the golden west. Above, free winds and fiery clouds ranging at their will; brightness out of the north, and balm from the south, and the stars of the evening and morning clear in the limitless light of arched heaven and circling sea."

"What a pity," was Delia's only remark as she left the library on household thoughts intent, "that Ruskin is not fifty instead of eighty."

The pieces I have read are the perfection of that mysterious quality, "style" in writing. To some extent style can be cultivated, as music can be cultivated, but the greatest of writers, as the greatest of musicians, is so "by the grace of God." Ruskin has many disciples, but his style is so woven of the elements of his soul that it is incommunicable and inimitable. Happily he sits on his summit alone, with no little Ruskins—one-thousandth Ruskin, and nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths Brown or Robinson—to reflect ridicule upon their master.

LIBRARIUS,

The Methodist Minister's Wheel of Fate.

BY REV. S. J. WALLIS.

II.—THE METHODIST HOTEL.

WE left our readers standing at the doors of the Methodist Hotel, and promised to introduce them within its hospitable interior. In this pilgrim's inn (which rays from Tabor and Calvary have gilded, and which is wholesome for the soul but to breathe its atmosphere), at every meal the table becomes a paradise of eatables. Is it breakfast? The tall coffee-pot stands smoking altar-wise on the table; the cream-jug is filled with rich, yellow cream; plates are piled with home-made bread, white as snow and light as a feather; in one dish are beefsteaks piping hot, thick, tender, and full of juice as an orange; in another are savoury slices of pink ham, well-fried with the golden yolks of eggs, and so fresh that the hens which laid them may still be heard from the dunghill telling of the feat, which is really (h)enchanting. Is it the noonday meal? Grace is pronounced; and then the minister sees his dinner, viz., jellies shaking as with cold; puddings, rich enough for the table of a Cardinal; soup made from as good calves' head as ever wore a coronet; pigeons put to bed in a pie, and covered in with a counterpane of crust; a boiled turkey as big as a little sheep; a mountain of beef, with rills of gravy running red, encircled with a forest of greens, and the smoking leg of an apoplectic pig, fragrant with sage and onions, tempting enough to make the mouth of a Jew water, and exclaim, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian."

Is it surprising when so many heads go to the block, and so many innocent throats are cut to provide the parson's dinner, that when he approaches the house, every little white porker should set up a squeal as if he had got brand-new lungs and windpipe for the occasion; that the frightened ducks should quake too much to quack, and suddenly be found swimming in the distant pond; that the geese, not wishing to be prayed over by him, and then preyed upon to fill his cannibal stomach, should hurry away to the common, and that even new-fledged rooks should take wing from the circling elms (that keep the old house a secret), and not without some caws.

Is it dessert? Nuts are introduced as brown as the squirrel whose teeth crack them; strawberries red and tempting as childhood's lips; grapes, ruddy and mellow as any that ever crowned the head of Bacchus, reminding us of Fcote, the actor, who, when offered a bunch of these melting rubies, fresh blushing from the vine, said, "No, thank you, I don't take wine in pills." No, indeed, for he used to be a wine-cask in the morning, and a cask of wine at night.

"Not only drinking just when dry,
But lest he should be, by and by,
Or any other reason why."

Is it the hour for the social cup that cheers but not inebriates? Upon the table may be descried tartlets with honeycomb crust, and nesting within them, lovely preserved cherries, like kisses in amber; delicious cakes, large as full moons, which have blossomed out in the kitchen especially for the minister, while saucered cups of amber tea, vivifying and fragrant with the flowers and scents of the warm East, are supplied from the bubbling urn, and sweetened with smiles as well as with sugar, by the Lady Bountiful of the household, whose face, shaded by a cloud of golden hair, is of as pure a red and white as the roses in her bosom, which she gathered in the garden with the earliest songs of birds, so that she is no dormouse to sleep out her eyes, or a mere animated doll, but with hand hard with labour, and heart soft with pity, is as busy all day as a bee among apple-blossoms, for she can shake hands with a saucepan as well as a tea-urn, and hold the cup to the lips of fever in the poor man's cottage home. And as at the table, as many good things are said as are swallowed, delighting the ears at the expense of the sides, leaving an "air of wit" about the room for days after, cake, tea, and time vanish with equal celerity.

As for the "prophet's chamber," it is a little gem of a room, which opens on to a lawn, with necklaces of young geese upon it, and where peacocks, like old gossips, stand and spread such tails—a chamber in which the tired limbs can repose on a bed of softest down, with sheets white as snow, and smelling of lavender. In fairyland there is no measurement of time, and in this chamber of peace, soon as the balmy pillow is kissed by the good man's cheek, sweet slumbers fall upon his eyes as unbidden as the dews, which are only opened to find the sunbeams quadrilling around his pillow, and the roses peeping in at the window, and blushing to find him still in bed.

It is said to be unhealthy to sleep in feathers; pshaw! look at the spring chicken you purchase and see how tough he is. In reference to the parsonage, which has been christened "Laburnum Villa," of course, it is well furnished and big, surrounded by the green stillness of the country, where you can hear the heart of Nature beat; where the perfume of flower and tree, and carol of Nature's winged musicians, greet its inmates when they wake, with the blue sky overhead, bending, like God's love, over all things.

As a minister is set up as an example to his flock, should he not have the best house in the congregation?

In this sweet, laughing, summer abode, the sky-pilot of the people resides, and with no more idea of going out than a cow in a field of clover, when lo, like a clap of thunder in a clear sky, from the Quarterly Meeting comes notice to quit, which ends in his removal to one of the poorest stations in the Dan-to-Beersheba District.

Connexional Biography.

REV. CHRISTOPHER STOCKDALE.

THE Rev. C. Stockdale was born at Thirsk, in Yorkshire, in the year 1836. His parents were Primitive Methodists, but his grandparents, by whom our friend was brought up, were Wesleyans. He was taken to the Sunday School at a very tender age, and continued his connection therewith until quite a young man. He was for several years a member of the chapel choir in his native town. When about seventeen years of age that greatest of all changes came, viz., his conversion. Having lived an exemplary moral life, under the pious influence of Christian parents and grandparents, and safe-guarded in his youth by the environment of a Christian home and Sunday School, his conversion was not so apparent as some. He was mercifully preserved in his youth from contracting baneful habits. He was converted one Sunday night after a powerful sermon.

As was frequently the case in those days with young men of energy and piety combined with intelligence and a special aptitude for preaching, our friend's name was soon placed upon the circuit plan, and he was appointed to go to the surrounding villages as a local preacher. His home-circuit requiring a hired local preacher, let it be said to his credit, he was selected for the post. It is said that "a prophet is not without honour save in his own country," but in this case the proverb did not apply. Occasionally in those days the time spent on a circuit as a hired local preacher was afterwards counted as a part of the active ministry. This was the case with Mr. Stockdale. So his ministry really commenced on his own circuit in 1858, when he was twenty-two years of age. He subsequently travelled in the following circuits:—Pontefract, Malton, Pateley Bridge, Halifax, Burnley, Silsden, Horbury, Ripon, York (twice), Knaresborough, Barnsley, Bristol (twice), Swindon and Southampton Second. He had an attack of influenza while at York the second time, which left him weak and prostrate; and during the three years he was at Swindon, he suffered much from rheumatism and bronchitis. It was feared that he would be compelled to seek superannuation while at Swindon, but it was hoped that a pastorate, with no travelling, together with the genial air of Southampton, would enable him to complete his forty years of active ministry, and probably prolong his life to enjoy an evening of rest after a long and arduous ministry.

But it seemed good in our great Father's sight to order things differently. He never preached after the Easter Sunday morning of 1897; and for about sixteen months he was laid aside, gradually getting weaker, until on Sunday afternoon, August 21st, 1898, at 3.30, he passed peacefully away, surrounded by all the members of his sorrowing family. He was a man of indomitable energy and very strong will—this, together with good nursing, undoubtedly prolonged his life. He had a passion for his ministerial work. The saving of souls was not a mere sentiment with him, it was a passionate longing. His was no perfunctory work performed with automatic precision and stereotyped formality and coldness, it was a self-consuming passion. He probably laboured five or six years after most men would have given up. Many a time has he sat on a wall or a style writhing with agony and great fatigue, when, to use his own words, he could have "cried with pain," while returning from his appointments. He was often really hours when he ought to have been only minutes returning home.

He was remarkably conscientious—the very soul of honour. Straightforward and upright in all his dealings—too straight for some people, and, of course, did not please everybody, very few of us do. But some one has said, "He who makes enemies can make friends." That is very true. Those sleek, supple, bland sort of people who face every way, make no enemies perhaps, but they make few staunch friends; whilst a candid, fearless, and manly man may sometimes stroke our fur the wrong way, but we prefer the boldness of the lion to the creeping, sinuous snake, which stings us while it is still fawning upon us. Our late friend was every inch a man. He was the very soul of generosity. He lived a very prayerful life, and was in every sense a good man, and a very successful minister. His sermons were above the average, and always delivered by a man who felt that he had a message direct from God to deliver to dying men. He was a successful soul-winner, hundreds having been brought to God through his instrumentality. In him the sick and poor had a faithful pastor and tender friend.

Not long before he passed away, the venerable superintendent of the South Front Church Sunday School visited him, and asked him if he had any message to send to the children and the Y.P.S.C.E., and he said, "Give my love to them, and tell them to hold fast and to follow me." He said very little for some time before he died, being so very weak, but one day he feebly said, "One page of precious book," and the last words he was heard to utter were "Light—higher!"

Ah! dear soul, he was tired and weary, and wanted rest and quiet and light and the love which never dies. He wanted the perfect rest from pain and fatigue which his Saviour alone could give him, and so he sweetly breathed away his soul to the keeping of his Lord and Master until the Resurrection morning; and we could sing of him:—

"Home at last, thy labour done,
Safe and blest, the victory won;

Jordan passed, from pain set free,
 Angels now have welcomed thee."

Farewell! brother Stockdale, farewell! Thine was an unselfish life, spent to the glory of God, and for the good of mankind. Death to thee was only the root of life. Peace to thy memory. Thou hast gained thy long-sought rest, and when the world's greatest morning shall dawn, we will greet thee; till then, farewell.

He was interred on Friday, Aug. 26th, in the beautiful cemetery at Southampton after the body had been taken into the South Front Church; the Revs. S. Hooson, J. H. Harradine and others assisting the pastor. Many Nonconformist ministers were present at the church, and also at the grave. A memorial service was conducted in the above church on Sunday evening, Sept. 4th, by the writer, in the presence of a very large congregation. Many letters of condolence were sent to Mrs. Stockdale and her sorrowing family; but space prevents our quoting from them here. Among the numerous ministers who wrote were the following, some of them old colleagues:—Revs. A. Popham, T. Tanfield, J. Thompson, S. Ainsworth, A. Hebblethwaite, S. Hooson, G. Wood, J. E. Leuty, J. Leach, E. R. Pullen, T. Dowson, D. Moore, etc.

JOHN BAILEY.

MR. AINSWORTH ELTON.

ON Thursday, October 22nd, 1896, the Haslingden Society lost one of its oldest members in the death of Ainsworth Elton. He had a long and wearisome affliction, but his end was peace. Our brother was blessed with godly parents, who were deeply attached to our Church, to which he was taken in infancy. When only seven years old his parents removed from Helmsore to Turton, but he continued to attend our school, walking a distance of six miles to be present. The superintendent often remarked upon Ainsworth Elton walking so far but never being late. His parents feared these long walks would be too much for him, and often tried to induce him to stay at home. He would sometimes put his boots on outside the house so that he could leave for school without his parents knowing.

At the age of thirteen he gave himself to God, and at once joined the Church, receiving his first ticket from the Rev. M. Lee in 1852. He held at different times many offices. He was a class-leader for many years, Sunday School superintendent, a local preacher for some time, society steward, choir-master, organist, but his most delightful work, in which he greatly excelled, was teaching in the school. He had a most retentive memory, and when too ill to read he found wonderful comfort in repeating psalms and hymns. He was one of the most regular attenders at the public means of grace.

E. SHEPHERD.

MR. WILLIAM BEBBINGTON.

BROTHER WILLIAM BEBBINGTON was born at Whitchurch, Salop, in the year 1816. The family of the Bebbingtons have stood closely associated with Primitive Methodism in Whitchurch for over fifty years. Our late brother was one of the first members of the Society formed in that town. He was converted at a lovefeast held after the annual Camp meeting, in August, 1841. In his conversion he consecrated all to Christ. In 1843 he was appointed the leader of a class, and in 1844 he became a local preacher. In those days, in that part of the country journeys were long and homes few, but our brother frequently took three services on a Sunday, walking twenty or thirty miles to do so. As a class leader he manifested the deepest interest in the welfare of his members, and as a local preacher he was well received throughout the circuit. He was earnest and faithful. He preached to save men. He was regular in his attendance at the means of grace. For more than fifty years he never missed a camp-meeting at Whitchurch. In his younger days he was fond of singing, and possessed a good, strong voice, and was always found in the front of the procession. The Rev. Joseph Aston says, "During my ministry in the Whitchurch Circuit I was intimately associated with Brother Bebbington. He was a true Primitive Methodist. He loved to talk of the old ministers, and his greatest joy was to learn that the Connexion was prospering. He was a brother to be relied on. I loved him as a brother, and ever looked upon him as a true friend. In his removal the Church has lost a consistent member; earth is poorer, but heaven is the richer."

During the last years of his life he resided with his daughter and son-in-law at Abbey Hulton, in the Hanley Circuit; and though age and feebleness prevented him from doing the work he was wont to do in former years, there was the same attachment and loyalty to Christ and His Church. His religious character was full and ripe. His last days were simply grand. It was a means of grace to be with him. On one occasion after a severe fit of coughing, a friend expressing sympathy, he simply replied, "Never mind, the Lord is only taking down the props of the old tabernacle. He is taking them down very nicely. I have a tabernacle above." He quietly fell asleep on Nov. 20th, 1896, aged eighty years. He was interred in Bucknall Churchyard on Nov. 25th. A service was conducted in our own chapel by the Rev. J. Aston and the writer. A memorial service was held in our chapel on Jan. 4th by Mr. Wilson Smith, our circuit steward, which was largely attended, and one soul saved.

MR. THOMAS BATESON.

THOMAS BATESON, of the Liverpool Third Circuit, was born in 1840 at Ogden Farm, near Clitheroe. His parents were farmers and connected with the Wesleyan Church, his father being a local preacher. When about fifteen years of age the son gave his heart to Christ, and some three years later was placed on the Wesleyan Clitheroe Circuit plan as a preacher, and for a few years did good service as "the boy preacher."

Thirty-two years ago he came to Liverpool, and for some two years continued with the Wesleyans, but for reasons now unknown, he joined our Church and remained to the end of his life devotedly labouring in connection with our Zion Church in Everton, where, in addition to his attention to his plan, he became an efficient teacher in the Sunday School, an assistant superintendent and class-leader. Whatever position he consented to fill, he was thorough in the discharge of the duties devolving upon him. He left nothing incomplete. No one was anxious about what he undertook, and no one had the trouble and annoyance of finishing his work.

Mr. Bateson was one of those types of local preachers which we would wish to increase in our midst. He was a reader of good sound books, and scorned the fragmentary papers so popular with many. He was a close thinker, and occupied his mind with those great eternal truths which underlie all Evangelical teaching. In the pulpit he was too slow and hesitating in his later years to be popular, but the true hearer who sought after truth would be sure to be well repaid as he listened to the thoughtful utterances interspersed with a peculiarly dry wit and caustic humour. Mr. Morris Jones, long and closely associated with him, says: "I am glad I ever met with him, and that I met him in my early manhood. He raised my taste for reading; he excited my interest in a purer and richer literature; he led me to a broader view of life and an ambition to develop talents and usefulness. This much can be also said by others of our younger people who have been under his influence and care, and have learned from him how to hold their own in the competition of life."

As a workman he has evidently had the confidence of his employers, spending thirty-two years in the service of three firms, we may almost say with two rather than three, for one was for a very short time. The way in which his late employers acted toward their sick and dying employee was proof sufficient of their own benevolent kindness, and of his moral integrity and worth.

Our dear friend had children who have grown up around him, and reflect great credit on their parentage. He has trained them to know the Scriptures, reading with them, and talking to them on the portions read. His religion was in his home-life, and it will bear its fruit now that he is no longer visible on the earth. He had a long fight with death. Sixteen months of intense pain and suffering wore him down till his life was a thread. During all this time he was heroically nursed by his wife, and he bore all with a great patience. His interest in the Church continued. He desired to keep his mind alert to the last, and he read books as long as he could hold them, and then others had to read to him. I asked him one day when very feeble if he still held to the faith, and should I tell his brethren so in the Quarterly Meeting. He said: "Yes, I hold to the faith. There is nothing else worth holding to. 'I know whom I have believed.'" In the quietude of so great a faith and patience, he slowly yielded his life to God, and on December 15th, 1896, he crossed the threshold of the higher rooms in the mansions of our Father's House.

JOHN HALLAM.

MRS. EMMA MARIA ASTON.

EMMA MARIA ASTON, beloved wife of Rev. J. Aston, and loving daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Simpon, Tiverton Hall, Cheshire, was born at Tiverton, May 17th, 1859. From earliest childhood she was surrounded with Methodist influences, the Wesleyans being accustomed to hold frequent services in her parents' house.

When the Primitive Methodist Chapel was built in the village, and a Sunday School was commenced in the year 1864, she became a scholar, and remained connected with the same until her marriage. She was led to decide for Christ when quite a child, and joined a Catechumen class. Her first ticket of full membership was given to her when she was fourteen years of age by the late Rev. J. Guest. From the opening of our African Missions she took a very deep interest in the work, and for several years was a most diligent missionary collector, during which she collected considerably over £100, the last year she worked her box it contained over £14. Her removal from the village on the occasion of her marriage was a great loss to the Society and Sunday School. She was married to the one who now mourns his loss, on Oct. 12th, 1881, in the village chapel. Their first circuit was the Southwark Mission, London, which was then connected with Surrey Chapel, and during their stay, she proved herself a true helpmeet to her husband, and by her kindly sympathy and unassuming manner, endeared herself to all. When the news of her death was reported to the Church, the following resolution was passed: "That we, as a Church assembled on Sabbath evening, Sept. 6th, desire to unanimously express our deep sympathy with the Rev. J. Aston in his bereavement. . . . We remember the bright, blessed influence of her whose loss we now mourn, and pray God the divinest consolations may rest upon the bereaved."

While at Southwark, the General Missionary Committee requested her husband and herself to go out to Fernando Po, but after earnest prayer and consultations with friends, they felt justified in declining the invite. In the year 1884 they left Southwark for Whitchurch Circuit, Salop, and after a stay of six years, removed to Nantwich and Burland Circuit. From the Quarterly Meeting of each of these circuits a resolution has been forwarded to her husband, referring to her kindly spirit and earnest work for the Church, and assuring him she left behind her a name and memory that will be imperishable in many hearts. In the year 1893 she removed, along with her husband, to the Silverdale Circuit. On all the circuits she travelled on she proved herself to be possessed of the spirit of the Master; it was her delight to be friend the poor, and to minister to the sick and needy ones.

She was never very strong, and at times suffered very severely from nervous debility. Her last illness was very brief. In the month of July she went with her children to her father's for a few weeks' holiday, a change which always benefited her. On Sunday Aug. 2nd, her husband preached in the village chapel, the evening service being a memorial service for his brother, Rev. P. Aston. She attended both services, and in the evening assisted in the choir. On coming out of chapel she took a chill, and the next day complained of feeling very unwell; but nothing serious was anticipated. The doctor was called in, and said it was rheumatic neuralgia, and advised her to stay in bed. On August 15th he informed her parents it was a serious case of typhoid fever. A special physician was called in, and everything that loving hands and medical skill could do was done, but daily the temperature kept over 100, and her strength gradually failed, until just before midnight on August 22nd, she passed away, trusting in Jesus, and entered upon the higher service of heaven.

The funeral took place on Wednesday the 26th, several friends from Nantwich and Silverdale Circuits being present. As the procession passed through the village it was noticed that the blinds were down in every house. A service was held in the chapel, conducted by Rev. W. Albert, assisted by Mr. W. Hockenhull, Nantwich, and Mr. J. Tomkinson, Silverdale. The chapel was filled with sorrowing friends. The body was interred in the family vault at Tarporley Parish Church, the service being conducted by Rev. W. Albert.

On Sunday the 30th a memorial service was held at Tiverton. Mr. Albert preached a very appropriate sermon; the chapel was crowded and the service was most impressive.

In her removal the Church on earth has lost an earnest worker and consistent member; her husband a most faithful wife; her parents a loving daughter; and her children a most devoted mother.

May the husband and five children ever be led by the hand of the loving Saviour, until at last there shall be a happy re-union in the Eternal Home, where sickness and death never come.

MR. JOHN SMITH.

MR. JOHN SMITH, son of William and Drusilla Smith, was born in Shropshire on October 5th, 1841. When quite young his parents removed to Pensnett, in the Brierley Hill Station, where he attended our Sunday School for many years. When about twenty years of age he decided for Christ, being awakened as to his carnal state through a serious accident which befell one of his work-mates in the mine. He at once joined our Church, of which his father was a member, and became a teacher in the Sunday School. A short time after, he was made a class leader, and in 1865 was put on the plan as a local preacher. The same year he removed to Staveley (then in the Chesterfield Station), where grand soul-saving times were experienced. Two years later he removed to Durham Circuit, and for twenty years in this station he lived and laboured zealously and successfully as a Sunday School teacher, superintendent, class-leader, and local preacher. Many were the trophies he won for the Master. Though not an office-seeker, he was always to be found among the leaders of the Church. He was a member of the Darlington and Stockton District Committee for some years. He was kind, peaceable, impartial, yet firm, and of retiring disposition; with a large heart and with a liberal hand he cheered many a disconsolate soul. The Rev. S. Barker writes: "We have the consolation of knowing that he was a downright good fellow, loyal to his Master, true to his convictions, faithful to his Church, whole-hearted in its service, and as a leader, teacher, and preacher, a workman that needed not to be ashamed. A true and faithful husband and a loving, indulgent parent." The Rev. R. Hind, in a letter to the widow and family, says: "You have lost a good husband, and your children a model father. His Christian character was of the most valuable kind. He could ill be spared." The Rev. William Shipley, in a letter, says: "He was a cheerful, bright Christian, ready to give a hand to anything, and to help every one. His like our Connexion can ill spare. The young amongst whom he laboured in his various circuits will long remember him. I have not forgotten the heartiness with which he used to welcome one into his home." These are only a few out of the many who have borne testimony to our late brother's worth.

Nine years ago Mr. Smith removed from Leamside to Willington, in the Bishop Auckland Station, where he soon found a door of usefulness open to him among the young people, many of whom were led into church fellowship by his influence. General regret was expressed when five years ago he decided to move to Crook, where he soon became endeared to the hearts of the members of the Church, especially the young. He was elected delegate to the District Meeting by the Crook friends, and was sent to the Chester Conference. His sudden death on December 18th, 1896, was a blow to all. His health had been failing for some time, but he was only off work three weeks. He thought he would be able to be at his duty by the end of the week. On the Friday he took a walk and called to see a few friends, and returned home quite cheerful, and sang some of his favourite hymns. About an hour after retiring he passed to his eternal rest. He will be missed in the home as an affectionate husband and father; in the Church as a useful member, and in the Sunday School as the children's friend. Our people have lost one of their most earnest and godly workers, and from my boyhood days, when a scholar in his class, to becoming a co-worker with him in the Church, I always found him to be the seven days of the week the same good man.

On Tuesday, Dec. 22, 1896, his remains were interred in the Crook Cemetery. Many paid respect from the circuits round about by being present. The funeral service was conducted by Rev. J. Moffatt (who gave an address), assisted by Mr. Parrick, Evangelist, and Rev. Wm. Kenyon, N. C. minister. His death was improved on Sunday night, January 24th, when a large and sympathetic congregation assembled to hear Rev. J. Moffatt and Mr. W. H. Hamflett speak of the faithful life, excellent character, and the sterling worth of our departed friend and brother.

MR. THOMAS CARR.

THOMAS CARR, of Physic Hall, Alston, died July 17th, 1896. He was born at Bunker Hill, Garrigill, April 9th, 1837. The house in which he was born was built in the year that the Battle of Bunker's Hill was fought. Hence the name. His parents were Wesleyans, and he attended the Wesleyan Sunday School until about his thirteenth year.

In 1851, a great revival broke out in connection with the Primitive Methodists, which spread far and wide. The late Rev. Ralph Shields was the minister at the time, and the revival is still mentioned by a few as "Shields' Revival." So great was the influence that it was stated the power could be felt as soon as the people reached Howe Hill, a place more than a mile from Garrigill. The revival power, like the ancient Pillar of Cloud and Fire, rested on the place day and night.

In this revival Thomas Carr gave himself to God along with many other lads of the same age. And being converted at the "Primitives," his parents allowed him to go there, and from that time to the end of his life in this world, he kept up an unbroken membership with the people by whose agency God had saved him. He was a person of a retiring nature, and of a calm disposition. She who was destined to be his wife was converted about the same time at a cottage meeting at Blagill, going to the service for that very purpose. The revival referred to was chiefly brought about and kept up by the holding of cottage prayer-meetings, and Thomas Carr, during his religious life, travelled miles to such meetings. He was afflicted eleven years with chronic bronchitis, and was confined to bed about six weeks prior to his death.

In his last moments, when asked if all was right with his soul, he said, "Yes, but I feel as if I would like something more than I have got. I want a greater fulness." His desire was granted. There came to him such a blessing that he cried aloud, "I've reached the celestial city." His praises were so loud that his voice could be heard outside the house.

He was ever a friend to the ministers, and was a class-leader for a long time. He was greatly interested in the District Meeting at Alston, and though ill would have two delegates. He died the death of the righteous, and had lived the life of the same. The first duty of the writer on coming to the Alston Circuit, was to attend his funeral. T. W.

MRS. ELLEN TITCOMB.

THE Purton Stoke Society, in the Brinkworth Circuit, has suffered in the loss by death of Mrs. Ellen Titcomb, on Dec. 7th, 1896. She was born at South Cerney, in the year 1839. Her father and mother, James and Dinah Newman, were both members of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, and brought up their children in the fear of God. She was converted in girlhood. Under the preaching of the late Samuel Westmacott, she was convinced of sin, but found peace during the ministry of the sainted I. S. Nullis. For many years the ministers in the Brinkworth Circuit found a home under her parents' roof at Ashton Keynes.

Soon after her conversion she accompanied her sister to take appointments, her name continuing on the circuit plan to the time of her death. She was afflicted for many years, which prevented her being so active in God's cause as she wished to be. For thirty-two years she was a local preacher. Soon after that time she was united in marriage to Mr. Simeon Titcomb, of Stoke Common Farm. As a wife and mother she was kind and affectionate. As the result of godly training, her son and three daughters are all members of the Primitive Methodist Connexion. The son is a local preacher.

She was a staunch total abstainer, and refused to take intoxicants although repeatedly advised by her medical attendant to do so. Although severely afflicted for many years she attended the services of God's house. The last Sabbath of her earthly life was spent in her accustomed place. On arriving home she became seriously ill, and on the morrow (Monday) she quietly entered into rest. She being dead yet speaketh. The superintendent of the Circuit performed the burial service in the churchyard, Purton.

The Fatherhood of God. (Hartley Lecture, 1898).

By JOHN WATSON, D.D. (1s.) Thomas Mitchell, 48-50, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

THAT this great and gracious doctrine is coming to be presented by present-day theologians with greater clearness and coherency is matter for profound gratitude and joy. In his excellent Hartley Lecture, Dr. Watson has earned our sincere thanks for a valuable, concise, and practical contribution to this important subject. The style is terse and luminous, and there is evidence on every page of careful, strenuous thinking, with a wise practicalness of purpose. After wide and patient research Dr. Watson has put before us, in concise and popular form, the salient points in the modern Christian theology of this doctrine; and we earnestly hope that the treatise will be read and re-read by all our people, for whose special benefit, indeed, the Hartley lectureship has been inaugurated. The work will find a place in our permanent theological literature, and is the first-fruits, we hope, of a harvest yet to be reaped in similar fields of enlightened Christian thought. Dr. Watson presents the doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood in such a way as to avoid the falsehood of extremes. He has no sympathy with a bald, invertebrate idea of God's Fatherhood which makes little of the Divine righteousness, little of sin, and gives us, as one puts it, a "motherly father in Heaven, and a sisterly brotherhood, and a feminine conscience on earth." On the other hand, he opposes the dualism which loses the Divine Fatherhood in certain artificial relations between the Son and the First Person in the Trinity, who is clothed in a cold, repellent Sovereignty, and whose mercy to mankind is won over by the Son's sacrifice. In common with our best thinkers, Dr. Watson shifts the centre of theological gravity from sovereignty to love. But it is the love of a righteous Father, "in which justice and grace appear with equal and undimmed splendour." In such a doctrine of the Fatherhood of God we find a synthesis which includes and harmonises all claims of righteousness, whether in God or in the human conscience, while it is at the same time the primal moving cause of redeeming grace. Happily our attention is turned to-day to what Jesus Himself taught concerning the Father, and in the light of that revelation by Him we can see how the conceptions of righteousness and grace which are of necessity so fully treated in the Epistles of St. Paul in his controversies with Jews and Romans, may be "blended in the higher concept of God as Father at once holy and gracious," who will save all that believe on His Son.

The subject opens out in a fine philosophic treatment of the immanent relations of the Godhead in which the eternal Fatherhood has root. For God is "the Father" not because of His relation to a prospective race of human beings He would call into existence, nor because of the relation He would sustain to "a Son begotten in time even though the Firstborn," but by His own essential and eternal nature, and in the intrinsic relations of the Godhead itself. Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are mutually and eternally related, mutually loving and loved. There is, so to say, Society in God. The unity of God is not a dead unity, but social and interactive. Here is the true doctrine of the Trinity, with the necessary postulate of the eternal Sonship. This gives us not only the doctrine of a real pre-existence of the Son, but heightens to our view the love of the Father in the gift of His eternally Well-Beloved. This is very well, for to our view the passion of the Father in the suffering Son has not received sufficient prominence in the general consideration of the atonement.

The Fatherhood of God as related to mankind in general is ably discussed; and this is perhaps the best part of the book. Man is not merely a creature of God, he is by nature a child of God—fallen, but still a child. The paternal relation of God towards him has not ceased. To the recognition of this, in his truer moments by every man, the Gospel makes its highest appeal. Sin is felt to be not only an offence against righteous law, but against holy love. To deny the Fatherhood of God is practically to deny the fall of man. This theomorphic conception of man is the natural corollary to what we must regard as the true view of the Divine Fatherhood. In this view, also, of the common sonship of man we find a true doctrine of the Incarnation, "for if man's nature is not essentially filial, how could it receive into it the Son of God?" Difficulty has arisen in receiving this doctrine of man's filialness, by confounding the relation of sonship with the spirit and conduct suitable to it. But the relation may exist, and yet the spirit and disposition—such as result from renewing grace—be wanting. This is just the point, and we ask our readers to follow Dr. Watson's pages in this interesting part of the subject. Perhaps an illustration from horticulture may help us. The gardener tells us he cannot graft opposites, but only affinities. The stock receiving the graft may be inferior, and must, without the grafting upon it of a higher life, remain so. But the wild briar may by grafting become the beautiful garden rose, and so with many other forms of plant life. In some such way, conversion may be said to restore man to himself, exalting and ennobling his being by giving him to share the spirit and life of Christ—the true graft of God, the prototype and pledge of our son-ship. This is possible because man—though sinful and impotent—sustains the relation of a child to the Heavenly Father, and may through union with Christ inherit all that belongs to perfect and realised sonship. This is termed “Evangelical sonship,” or put in another way, “the Fatherhood of God in relation to believers in Christ.” Dr. Watson is careful to show that this inheritance of Evangelical sonship is by faith alone and not by any developing righteousness of our own. We again thank the author for the good service he has rendered to the Church and to all thoughtful readers who may have the good fortune to possess themselves of his valuable lecture. And not the least practical result of such a setting of the important doctrine here treated is that of which “Ian McLaren” has spoken. “While piety,” he says, “imagined God as the Father of the few and the Judge of the rest, humanity was belittled, and Pharisaism reigned; slavery was defended from the Bible, and missions counted an impertinence. When He is recognised as the universal Father, and the outcasts of humanity as His prodigal children, every effort of love will be stimulated, and the Kingdom of heaven will advance by leaps and bounds.”

The Expositor. Edited by the REV. W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D. Fifth Series, Vol. VIII. (7s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE latest volume of “The Expositor” is one of exceptional interest. It contains an unusual number of articles of a pioneer character—articles which break fresh ground and are rich in suggestiveness. To enumerate all the articles worthy of careful perusal would require us to transcribe almost the whole of the table of contents. This is impossible: mention, however, should be made of Professor Ramsay’s six papers on “A Historical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians”; Professor Beet’s “Difficult Passages in Romans”; Professor Bruce’s two papers on “The Disciple Logia” and “The Easy Yoke.” Very significant too just now are Dr. Forsyth’s articles on “Sacramentalism the True Remedy for Sacerdotalism,” as also the Rev. G. Wauchope Stewart’s résumé of the published results of the researches of Harnack, Jülicher and Spitta on the Lord’s Supper. The Rev. W. D. Ridley’s “The Revelation of the Son of Man to Nathanael” is a convincing paper, making it yet more certain to our own minds that the key to the narrative of the call of Nathanael is supplied by the Old Testament account of “Wrestling Jacob.” Last, but not least, in Dr. Rendel Harris’ papers on “A Study in Letter-Writing” and “Epaphroditus, Scribe and Courier” we see how recent finds of Græco-Egyptian letters may be turned to profitable account in the study of the Pauline Epistles.

Henry Robert Reynolds, D.D. His Life and Letters. Edited by his Sisters, with portraits. (9s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row.

No one can rise from the reading of this altogether admirable biography without having received the impression that they have been in contact with a refined, cultured, intensely sympathetic and saintly man. In regard to Dr. Reynolds’ saintliness, after his death one wrote: “If Congregationalism had its saints he would be one of them.” One is ready to ask, “And why should not Congregationalism have its roll of saints, and the name of Henry Robert Reynolds be inscribed thereon?” We Nonconformists do not make enough of our saints. Readers fresh from the perusal of Dale’s life will find many points of dissimilarity between the two men—although they understood and loved each other well. There was nothing militant about Principal Reynolds, and he was about as far removed from the typical “Political Dissenter” as could well be. His strength lay rather in his lovable nature, in his power to understand the position and to enter into the experience of others—in other words, in his power of sympathy. Hence he had many true appreciative friends in the Established Church, such as Dean Vaughan of Llandaff and the Bishop of Durham. He was on good correspondential terms even with the redoubtable Dean Hook. In this regard he reminds us of Dr. Stoughton, who was also a persona grata to many of the finer spirits of the Establishment.

Dr. Reynolds was a born preacher, and loved to preach, but his health was far from robust, and after fifteen years of successful ministry, exercised first at Halstead and then in Leeds, he had to retire almost into semi-private life. But he found his true vocation as the Principal of Cheshunt College, and as such he did the great work of his life. It seems to us that Dr. Reynolds was an ideal head of a college. He was the very contrary of Dr. Dryasdust, keeping his mind fresh and his heart young to the last. In the high position he so worthily filled for thirty-five years his sympathetic nature had full play. He never lost touch with the men who passed through the college; but interested himself in their movements and welfare, and wrote and received from them long letters, breathing intensest affection—many of which appropriately find place in this worthy memorial of a noble character.

An Idyll of the Dawn. By MRS. FRED. REYNOLDS. James Bowden, 10, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

It has seldom been our good fortune to meet with such a charming and natural picture of child-life as the authoress of “An Idyll of the Dawn” gives us in the recollections of the childhood of her young brother and herself. The witchery of the old garden in which so many happy hours were spent with the young brother of the bright, rosy cheeks and dark, honest eyes; the terrors that came in the night—"the terror born of the darkness that appalled us, the dreams that stalked past, gaunt and terrible, we all the while lying prone, helpless, unable even to cry aloud." Has not every one experienced them in their own childhood? Fortunate, indeed, is the individual who can look back upon their childhood as such a time of joy as we have pictured here, and say with the authoress, "Fair were those hours of dawn with their blue and sunny skies, song of birds and frisking of young lambs; bright the memory of them returns, joyous, perhaps, who knows, with the reflection of those 'clouds of glory' we brought with us when we came." This is no ordinary book of its class.

The Crucifixion of Philip Strong. By CHARLES M. SHELDON. (2s.)

His Brother's Keeper; or, Christian Stewardship. By the same Author. (2s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row.

THERE is need to say little more than that these two books are from the same hand that wrote "In His Steps," that is having such a phenomenal sale in this country. "The Crucifixion of Philip Strong" is a sad but strong book. Messrs. Partridge's edition is all that can be desired in regard to type, price and appearance.

We have received and reserve for fuller notice:
A Commentary on the First Epistle of St. John. By ERNST DRYANDER. Translated and Edited by Rev. W. O. E. Oesterley, M.A. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

For the Lord's Table; a Book of Communion Addresses. By CHARLES JERDAN, LL.B. (5s.) Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 21, Paternoster Square.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

—The Aliwal North Station in South Africa continues its course of prosperity and extension. For the quarter ending in December last an increase of seventy-two was reported in the membership. This station now extends far into the Orange Free State; its membership goes into four figures, and what is worth noting, all with the exception of some two or three score are natives belonging to one tribe or another. Nearly thirty native young men are in the training school preparing for teaching and evangelistic work. The schools for native children are full, and in some instances have had to be enlarged. There are not many stations, either within or beyond the Home Districts, more prosperous than this South African Station.

—The last Quarterly Reports from the Home Mission Stations did not contain much of special interest. The Dover Station is progressing encouragingly, so much so, that a new schoolroom has become a necessity in connection with one of the town churches, and the need has been met and the whole cost raised. Preparation has been made for further extension on the same station, and there is promise that in a short time this station will be able to sustain its own agencies and manage its own affairs. The Walthamstow Station authorities are arranging to acquire the property in Marsh Street that they have rented for so many years, and make certain structural alterations, adapting it more conveniently for the pursuance of our work. This step forward will involve a cost of over £3,000, but subject to certain arrangements with the Missionary Committee with a view to the station becoming self-supporting in the not distant future, the committee takes the responsibility of £1,000 of the outlay; this offer on the part of the committee is also subject to the further condition that not more than £1,000 remains as debt upon the property. The arrangement for separating the Clapton Mission from the Working Lads' Institute has been postponed for a year, when it is hoped suitable provision will be made for working it.

—Special attention is being directed to the rapidly developing suburbs on the eastern side of the Metropolis, comprehending Upton Park, Ilford, and adjacent localities. A deputation appointed by the Missionary Committee to visit these neighbourhoods report splendid openings for evangelistic work. Population is being planted down by the thousand, and in the course of a single year or so a town of considerable size is added to this side of the Metropolis. The same is true of the south-east, and, indeed, of all the Metropolitan suburbs, and for that matter of all the suburbs of large towns. The problem of the future, or at least one of them, for our Connexion as well as for other Churches, is to provide for these rapidly increasing populations. The Missionary Committee would gladly render aid in this work, but the condition of the Home Mission Fund does not warrant them in holding out any hope of such aid. Unless the next few weeks prove more productive than recent weeks have done, this fund will show little improvement in the past year, and this notwithstanding the generous offer made by Mr. Hartley to give twenty per cent. on all increase. The general run of contributions sent by the stations to the Home Mission Fund are by no means creditable. Leading and important stations do not send in collections and other contributions an average of 1s. per member, and some do not reach 6d. Surely something better than this might be done by large and important stations, and if they set an example the influence of it would be felt in other stations. The need for evangelistic work in the large centres of population, and the many liabilities which the committee have had recently to accept will be likely to bring the condition of the General Mission Fund under consideration in a possibly painful form. The committee cannot turn a deaf ear continuously to the appeals made, and hence it need not surprise the churches if they find an accumulating debt with which they will be compelled to deal. It will be a prudent policy to prevent this by raising an increased revenue, which we hesitate not to say can easily be done.

* * *

—The Mission Vans continue to justify their employment in connection with village work. A considerable number of villages are visited in this way, and the evangelists connected with each van report a considerable number of conversions. The evangelists working the van in the Bradford and Halifax, Manchester and Liverpool Districts, report over one hundred conversions for the quarter. The evangelists connected with the Eastern counties van, and the van which has been removed from the Brinkworth District to the Midlands, also report encouraging success. There seems to us one thing necessary to complete the reports given of this work, and the secretaries in each district concerned could, with a little trouble, supply it—and that is a report from the stations in which the vans may work of the number added to the fellowship of the Churches. The evangelists render good service in awakening men and women and leading them to the Saviour, but it would be well to know that they are gathered into the fold and carefully shepherded. This lack in the report occurs to us as one that if supplied will afford further testimony to the value of this van agency.

—It was announced some little time ago that the Missionary Committee had engaged a lady evangelist with a special view to the visitation of our Sunday Schools, and the formation of Missionary Associations. The first report of the work of this lady, Miss Perrett, was recently forwarded to the Missionary Committee, under the supervision of which she is working; and a surprising report it is. Evidently Miss Perrett does not spare herself, but is in labours more abundant. She has visited nine stations during the brief period the report covers, held 180 evangelistic services, addressed fifteen ladies' meetings, and told in lecture form three times the story of her life. At these services thirty adults and 130 young persons professed to enter into the liberty of the children of God. Several ladies' associations have been formed. And if results can justify any course of action, this report amply justifies the Committee in employing this estimable lady. If an agency such as this could be largely multiplied, what a blessing it might be to the Churches; and we doubt not but many devoted ladies might be found to become colleagues with Miss Perrett in this work. One such evangelist is so far good, but existing needs demand many more. What a harvest might be reaped among our young people if this agency could be considerably increased!

—At Banni, in Fernando Poo, two native converts, after the usual probation, have been baptised and received into the Church, the first-fruits of toil in a field that seemed unpromising. The Rev. J. Bell gave a few years of faithful service to this mission, and cheerfully endured privation and discomfort incident to residence in the bush among a purely heathen population, pioneering the way for those who have followed him, and who now rejoice over signs of spiritual life in a region dark and dead as any district in heathenism could be. The stations on the mainland at Archibongville and Jamestown are now each under the care of a European missionary, the arrival of the Rev. N. Boocock rendering it possible for the Rev. C. F. Gill to locate permanently at Jamestown. A mission house has been erected at this place for Mr. Gill, who will now give sole attention to the work there and in the adjacent district. There will need provision on both of these stations for as efficient educational work among the native children as their condition and prospects in life may require. It cannot be expected that the missionaries can do all that is needed among these negro populations. Assistance for school work is a necessity, and will doubtlessly be supplied as speedily as suitable assistants can be secured. Possibly some such assistance may be obtained from our Fernandian Churches. At any rate it is a need that cannot be overlooked if the missions are to achieve the results desirable.

—It seems likely that the Village Appointment Fund will have to be closed. The recent balance sheet showed an income of £160 and an expenditure of £200; and the treasurer stated, that if the promises made at the Leeds Conference were all received, the demands of the year could not be met by about £160. This Fund has been of some service in many wide agricultural stations in securing a supply of the pulpits in the distant and outlying parts of these stations. But as it is dependent altogether upon voluntary subscriptions, and the spirit of voluntarism in the Connexion does not seem equal to its maintenance, the only alternative is to close it, however much such a result may be regretted, unless an appeal that has to be made for aid meets with a liberal and satisfactory response.

—The portion of the Jubilee Fund which falls to the General Missionary Committee for use in connection with the work at Home is a little over £6,000. The method of distribution so as to generally satisfy the districts has been a subject of anxious thought. It has been decided to accept as a general principle that each district shall have the opportunity of using such part of this amount as was raised within its limits. That will amount to about one-sixth of what a district may have raised. Three-fourths of the money raised goes to the College, the Chapel Loan Fund, and the Superannuated Ministers' Fund. Of the remaining one-fourth, one-third goes to the African Mission Fund, and it is the two-thirds remaining that the Missionary Committee have to deal with for work at home. This will allow to each district, as we have said, about one-sixth of what it has contributed. This proposed distribution has to be communicated to the districts, and they are desired by their respective missionary committees to name three objects at most, to which they are agreeable to devote the money, and report to the General Missionary Committee, which shall finally decide in what way the money shall be appropriated—whether to one or more of the objects named, or to some other purpose within a district.

—There has not yet been much response to the appeal for aid on behalf of the Trustees of our properties in South Wales, the funds of which suffered in the prolonged strike among the colliers there. Mr. Hartley generously offered to give fifty per cent. upon what the Connexion contributed for this purpose, and the General Chapel Fund Committee offered to do the same. We regret that in neither case so far will any great demand be made upon those making these generous offers. It is sadly evident that Connexionalism does not count for much yet with our churches. Many trustees in the stations affected by the strike have been unable to meet the current demands necessary to keep the chapels open, and hence have considerable arrears to overtake, and this with impoverished resources.

Under these circumstances it was expected that a fair response would have been made by other parts of the Connexion which had not experienced the disastrous effects of the strike, but so far there has been disappointment. It would be no great matter for some four hundred stations to give from ten shillings to a pound each, and this, with the percentage offered by Mr. Hartley and the General Chapel Fund Committee, would relieve the difficulty. Rev. J. Stephenson, Ashby Road, Loughborough, is appointed to receive subscriptions. A word to the wise is sufficient.

—The General Chapel Fund Committee had two very special cases under consideration at the recent meeting at Retford. One was the case of Dunchurch, a considerable village in the Rugby Station. Here we have been able to form a society and build a chapel. But territorial and ecclesiastical influence is powerful, and the society has suffered much by removal and death, so that for a few years past the Rugby Church, in addition to managing their own liabilities, have had to carry Dunchurch as well. This is felt to be more than they can do, and so an effort is to be made to reduce the debt upon Dunchurch property. We are the only Free Church in the village, and it would be no disappointment to the ruling powers if we ceased to exist there. The Nottingham District is prepared to render assistance in maintaining and strengthening our interest in this village, and the General Chapel Fund Committee have also promised help. And, possibly, help may be furnished from other sources. In face of an ecclesiasticism not too evangelical, we must not retreat from a village in which we are the only representative of the Free Churches.

—The other case was that of Quarry Bank, a colliery village in the Cradley Heath Station. This village is, of course, the creation of the industries pursued in the locality, as it was necessary that men employed in colliery and other work should reside near the place of their employment. All the land in the neighbourhood belonged to Lord Dudley, and those building houses had, of course, to purchase from him. But while selling to others the surface, he reserved to himself the right of working out the minerals underneath. The land upon which our chapel was erected was subject, along with other building land, to this reservation. In the exercise of this right, Lord Dudley has taken out part of the coal underneath part of the village, and as the seam which has been worked was not far below the surface, the consequence is a serious subsidence, wrecking the buildings which had been erected on the surface beneath which the coal had been taken out. And so several who had invested their savings in property found their property rendered about worthless, and they had no redress. After lengthened negotiations, Lord Dudley has consented to leave a rib of coal at the foot of the dip, and to sell this and the four or five seams lying beneath the one worked for £1,000, and so prevent further subsidence, and hard as this condition may be, the poor folk concerned have no choice but to accept it if they wish to be able to make their property safe to live in. The trustees of the chapel and school have suffered seriously in connection with their own property, which they have to restore, and also to pay a proportion of the £1,000. It will take some £2,000 to rebuild the chapel, and they felt themselves unable to face the whole responsibility. They have kept the Church together, and restored the schoolroom, but they wanted help in meeting their proportion of this charge of £1,000. They will use the schoolroom for worship till such time as it is safe to rebuild the chapel, and then they will face this outlay of £2,000. The Chapel Fund Committee could not refuse help in such a case, and the aid requested was unanimously granted, which, with such assistance as may, it is hoped, be secured from the Insurance Company, will enable these men to overcome their difficulties and permanently secure the property. It is, however, very evident that when such a case as this is possible there is something radically wrong in the law governing the possession of land. Legal and moral right ought to coincide, but in this case, legal right is a moral wrong, and unfortunately there is much in our laws which bears this character.

* * *

—Grants were made in some twelve other cases of varying need. This Fund, as we have more than once pointed out, is doing a splendid work with small means. More liberal support would enable the Committee to do still greater service, and that could be easily provided if trustees, whose properties are in easy circumstances, would devote a portion of their surplus income to the relief of their less fortunate fellow-trustees.

* * *

—The North Shields Station authorities have established services at Whitley, a rapidly growing seaside resort in South Northumberland. It has become a favourite residential place for many Newcastle tradesmen, and it has been surprising that no effort has been made to establish a cause in the place before now. However, arrangements have been made to occupy the Assembly Rooms, and the initial services have been well attended. There is no reason why a strong and influential Church should not be raised in Whitley. Some members of the Connexion are already resident there, and the way to success seems open.

The Wider Outlook.

—Parliament has assembled again, and the customary speech from the throne has been read, and, as usual, was bald and meagre in its statements. The significance of the speech lies more in its omissions than in its contents. It is in vain that we look for any mention of old-age pensions; or of any reference to the burdens under which the rent-devoured and overcrowded workmen in our large towns are crushed: and yet these were both questions upon which members of the present Government had much to say, and in relation to which they promised a great deal when appealing for the votes of the electors. The new leader of the Opposition put his hand upon these defects in the speech, and said nothing too strong when he declared the silence to be scandalous after so much had been promised. In 1895, when votes were wanted, nothing was easier than to devise and establish a scheme of old-age pensions, and now, in 1899, not a word is said, and the question is again quietly shelved. Not a hint is even given of any attempt to amend the Poor Law in relation to the treatment of the aged poor. An ominous silence is maintained, that is all. Then, as to Housing Reform and other social reforms, not a word, though much was made of them in 1895. Social reform was to be the main work to be done, and on this cry the present Government largely sailed into power. But little of this work can be seen in any measures they have passed. Of course, it could not be expected that, indebted as the Government were to the liquor interest, that they would touch Temperance reform, but as to Old-Age Pensions and Housing Reform, it might have been reasonably expected they would try their hands, but they have dropped both like hot irons. Not a word in the speech relative to the crisis in the Church, and notwithstanding Mr. Balfour's utterances during the recess, the Romanist University for Ireland is significantly passed over. In fact, the speech to thoughtful persons is more informing by its silences than by its utterances. The questions that really need to be touched in relation to Home policy are questions that this Government of the interests are not likely to meddle with. Well, the reckoning will come in due course, and then it will be seen what the country has to say.

—The crisis in the Church grows in intensity.

The great meeting recently held in the Albert Hall showed how deeply the laity of the Episcopal Church were moved. The ritualistic party have represented the meeting as simply a gathering of Dissenters and Liberationists. Nothing, however, can be further from fact. The immense building was packed as it has never been packed before, and with few exceptions, the audience consisted of communicants and adherents of the Established Church. This was evident from one very significant occurrence during the course of the evening. One of the speakers suggested that they should seek the co-operation of Evangelical Free Churchmen, but this suggestion was received in utter silence. There was no response. If the meeting was mainly made up of Dissenters and Liberationists this silence is inexplicable, for the suggestion is the very thing that they might be supposed to have received with welcome. We very much regret that silence, for such co-operation seems to us not only desirable, but necessary if the Protestant Episcopal Church has to be made Protestant in fact as well as in name. However, the silence shows that the assertion of the High Church papers that it was a meeting of Dissenters and Liberationists is contrary to fact.

* * *

—Sir W. Harcourt, on his departure for the Continent, has furnished the Bishops with sufficient material for some days' serious thought. He takes as text a plea of Mr. Balfour's, that the Bishops should have time given them for action. He says they have had time plenty for action if disposed to take it. They have delivered their charges; and met in Synod; they have defined in their way the law of the Church, and have distinctly prohibited certain acts as unlawful for the clergy to practise. But here they have stopped. Not a single step have they taken to enforce the law they have defined, or to restrain the clergy from breaking it. The deliverances of the Bishops have been treated by the lawless clergy with contempt, and they have gone on their way as usual, and the Bishops have made no sign, but quietly accepted the snub administered in this way by the recalcitrant clergy. After this, what place is there for this plea for time? The Bishops hope if they don't move the agitation will die down. This is evident from the address of the Archbishop of Canterbury in Convocation. He proposes that he and his brother of York shall form a kind of court of appeal; cases of lawlessness are to come to the Bishop of the diocese in the first instance; if his decision is not satisfactory, then the case may be argued before the Archbishops; and so a case may hang on for no one knows how long. For the whole proposal is conceived with a view to delay and to prevent anything really being done. However, the heads of the Establishment will, in this case, find themselves mistaken. The agitation means business, whether the Bishops think so or not, and they had better recognise the fact and seek to put their house in order if they can.

—The regard the Bishops pay to their own definitions of the law of the Church has been strikingly illustrated by the Bishop of Lincoln. The Bishops in their collective wisdom and authority have condemned the use of incense as contrary to the law of the Church. Now, it might have been expected that a Bishop, at any rate, would not have in any way countenanced a disregard of this deliberate pronouncement of the Episcopate. What, however, is the case? Simply this, the Bishop attends a service in a Metropolitan Church when he knew incense would be used; simply making it a condition of his attendance that he should not be censured. Sir W. Harcourt likens this proceeding of the Bishop to the action of a magistrate taking part in the doings of a gang of law-breakers on the sole condition that they would not pick his pocket, but they might do as they liked with the rest of mankind. Use incense as you please, said the Bishop in fact, only don't censure me. When the Bishops treat their own definition of the law of the Church in this way, where is the prudence of Mr. Balfour's plea for time? His plea, like Dr. Temple's address, is put forth in hope that the agitation will die down.

* * *

—Sir W. Harcourt suggests that steps should be taken to ascertain exactly the extent to which Romanising practices are adopted in the Established Church. That this should be done systematically from month to month, and that cases should be brought under the notice of the Bishop of the diocese in which they occur. The Bishops now have power, if they will use it, to cite these law-breakers in their own ecclesiastical courts, and if they will not observe the law of the Church, to suspend, or deprive them of their benefices; and the sentence, subject to appeal, will take effect. It is the Bishops who now stand between the clergy and the laity and prevent the law of the Church being enforced. So that the plea for time simply means that the Bishops shall be allowed to continue their masterly inactivity. But it will not do, the nation is rapidly making up its mind to end the business, which means the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church.

—In his latest letter Sir William tells the Bishops, the lawless clergy and their sympathisers a bit of wholesome truth. Disestablishment when it comes will come in a very different shape to what they contemplate. An unoffending clergy disestablished on the principles of religious equality would naturally and properly be treated with liberality and generosity. But these considerations would not apply to a body of men dismissed by the nation on account of their lawless conduct. Such men need not lay the flattering unction to their souls that they will be allowed to carry off the Protestant plant of the National Church in order to carry on their Romish manufactures. They would not be allowed to retain the parish churches or the Cathedrals in which to erect confessionals, and celebrate there without restraint their Masses; nor would they be secured by life incomes as commutation and compensation in the work of Romanising England out of the funds of the Protestant Establishment. These are considerations on which the Bishops and the clergy may reflect with advantage. If they continue their present course, Sir William sees clearly enough that disestablishment and disendowment are inevitable, and however unpalatable it may be, he plainly tells the Bishops so. It remains to be seen what effect this plain speaking of wholesome truth will have. Not much, we fear.

—The Free Churches of this country were startled by the announcement that Dr. Berry, of Wolverhampton, was dead. For some time his health had been precarious, but it was hoped he might be spared for some years of work yet, and possibly had he been less strenuous and eager in the service of the Church, that might have been the case. His death was sudden and, in some respects, tragic. He died while taking part in the funeral service of a friend, and while invoking for the family of his friend the comfort and help of God. It was his large heart and generous disposition which led him, contrary to the wishes of many of his intimate associates, to take part in this service. His friend had, as he thought, been misunderstood. He knew him, and knew more of his inner life than any one else, and he felt that he must go and say what he knew. And he did, and when he had done this service to the memory of his friend, and while speaking to God for the family, God called and he was not. Sudden and tragic, but a glorious entrance upon the higher service. He went from the post of duty to the possession of reward. Dr. Berry stood in the front rank of Congregationalism. He possessed splendid gifts of intellect combined with great depth of affection and brotherliness of nature, and he gave of all he had to the service of Christ. His Church recognised his worth, and duly honoured him, but popularity made no difference in him. Those who knew him best testify to his humility and brotherliness. Gifts of mind, position in the Church, influence among and over his fellows, were only of value to him in so far as by means of them he could glorify his Lord and serve his brethren. Called to the highest positions in which the Church could place him, revered and honoured in the town where he lived, he remained the same unaffected, loving, generous-hearted man. Dr. Berry's nature was one that fortunately could not be spoiled, and especially so when enriched and ennobled by the grace of God. He has left a place that cannot be filled, but, nevertheless, the work to which his life was so unreservedly given will go on, even though it be by workmen of other type. Berry has gone, but his work will be taken up by other hands, and the purpose of God in the ministry of His Church will not fail. His sun has gone down at mid-day, and yet he had done a full measure of work. Life is estimated by deeds rather than years, and thus estimated Berry had lived long. Those whom this bereavement has touched most closely, his family, the Church he loved so well, will be remembered sympathetically, both on this and the other side of the Atlantic, for he was almost as well known, and as much beloved in America as in this country.

—On Feb. 8th, John Ruskin completed his eightieth year, and continues, despite the fourscore winters and summers he has seen, in fair health. The postal authorities at Coniston had a busy time that day, for telegrams and letters from nearly all parts of the world poured into the little lake village on their way to Brantwood. Ruskin as a teacher occupies a unique position among men of letters. No influence has been more potent in art and literature during this century than his. He has outlived his contemporaries, and in the quiet seclusion of the Vale of Coniston, he waits the call that all men have sooner or later to obey. The ideas he promulgated have penetrated and influenced, to some considerable extent, our political life; they have inspired the social movements by which this age is characterised, and they have imparted a humanising influence to economic science that was much needed. Though an apostle of art and literature, Ruskin has been above and beyond that a religious teacher, and there are not a few who revere him for the spiritual lessons they have learned from him by which they have been ennobled in nature and character, and introduced to a closer fellowship with the unseen. It was meet that the foremost men and women in every department of our modern life should vie with each other in doing honour to one of the greatest teachers of the century on completing his fourscore years of life, and of life so worthily and usefully lived.

—Dr. Maciaren, of Manchester, completed his seventy-third year on the 11th of last month, and though past the threescore and ten, continues his pulpit work with remarkable vigour and energy. He not only preaches at considerable length on Sundays, but conducts the whole service. On Wednesday evenings he gives with great regularity the expositions of Holy Scripture with which his name has been so long associated, and in which he excels. He is one of the grand old men of the Free Churches whose life and work constitute one of the greatest blessings continued to this generation in the goodness of God.

—Plymouth Church, New York, has secured a successor to Dr. Lyman Abbott, who, through stress of other duties to which he felt himself called, surrendered the pastorate. The new occupant of this historic pulpit is Dr. Hillis, of Chicago, who succeeded Dr. Swing in that city, whose breadth of teaching separated him from the Presbyterian Church. Though accepting a call to Dr. Swing's pulpit, Dr. Hillis did not sever his connection with the Presbyterian Church. Theologically he is broad, though not so broad as his predecessor in Chicago, hence his continued fellowship with the Church from which Dr. Swing separated. He is described as a large-hearted, generous and lovable man, and a most attractive preacher. He will find a splendid sphere of work in Beecher's old church, and from the position he will there occupy be able to exercise a good influence upon the political, municipal and social life of New York. No sphere of work offers such facilities for doing good on a wide scale to a minister possessing the mind of Christ as do the large cities that have grown up in all civilised lands.

—An excellent sample of Romanist casuistry was given recently in a lecture by the Jesuit, Father Smith, at Haverstock Hill. The purpose of the lecture was to refute Dr. Horton's statement that Romanist moralist teachers consider prevarication allowable where the interests of the Church are involved. Father Smith, instead of refuting Dr. Horton's statement, gave it practical confirmation, for he maintained that an expediency of statement was not only allowable, but warranted by the ordinary practice of society. Right-minded men were in the habit, he said, of using the phrases, "I do not know," "It is not," with restriction and reservation, so that they could keep their secrets and yet use the words in a sense true in itself, and perceivable as true by those to whom they were addressed. His illustrations were, however, a bit unfortunate.

Take this for instance. Was there any untruth, Father Smith asked, in saying to a caller that Mrs. A. is not at home, when at the same time she was really in the house? And replying to his own question, he said, No, there was not, because such an answer was understood to mean that Mrs. A. was not at home to receive visitors, and it was true she was not at home for that purpose. But this sophistry is brushed aside at once by the question, Why, if this is the understanding, not give it explicit declaration at once? If it is understood that Mrs. A. is at home, only not disposed to receive visitors, why veil it under words which say absolutely she is not at home? Any extent of lying may be justified in this way. Take again. When A. says to B., Do you know if it is a fact that C.'s finances are in an unsatisfactory state? B. answers, No, I do not; knowing all the time in confidence that they are in an unsatisfactory state; does B. tell a lie? Father Smith says, No; because as A. had no right to expect him to divulge what he knew confidentially, he was justified in supposing A. to mean, Do you know, with any knowledge which is not confidential, how C.'s affairs are? And so when he says he does not know, he simply means that he does not possess any knowledge which is not confidential, and so speaks the truth. If this is not a justification of lying when it does not please a man to speak the truth, it is difficult to say what would be a justification of this practice. Teaching like this strikes at the very ground of confidence between man and man. If language may be invested with double meanings in this way no one can be trusted; for saying one thing a man may mean the very contrary. According to Father Smith, prevarication, or, in other words, lying, is taught as part of the moral code of Rome, when lying lies along the line of what a man may regard as his interest, or the interest of any man or institution relative to which he is in any way concerned, and Dr. Horton stated nothing more, and stated it no more plainly.

REV. W. THORNLEY.

Rev. W. Thornley.

HE Rev. W. Thornley belongs to that class of ministers who, by persistent plod and unheralded self-sacrifice, have done so much to build up our Church, and to make it the power it is in establishing the Kingdom of God in the world, and who have a more enviable record on high than in the annals of fame below.

We know next to nothing about his ancestry, and we have not taken the trouble to trace it.

We care little for those who "by ancestry are but the shadow of a mighty name." Our position in this paper is that of Sir Philip Sidney, when he said, "I am no herald to inquire of men's pedigree: it sufficeth me if I know their virtues."

Mr. Thornley was born near Chorley, Lancashire, and is now in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the thirty-sixth of his Connexional ministry. He was a scholar in our Sunday School, West Street, Chorley, and was respected for his sedate demeanour and thoughtfulness. He was brought to decision for God under the ministry of the late Rev. Ambrose Kirkland, in a revival which resulted in many being added to the Lord and to the Church. He gave himself to Christian service, and to such studies as were calculated to render his service more efficient. His advance in intelligence, in Christian character, and in spiritual power was such that the authorities of the Church constrained him to become a local preacher. The circuit was wide, including at that time what are now Wigan and Skelmersdale Circuits, but he took a good share of work all over the station, and was everywhere esteemed for his personal qualities and ministerial worth. There could be no better evidence of this than the fact that his own circuit called him into the ministry. This step, however, was somewhat premature, not on our friend's part, but on the part of the circuit, for the terrible Lancashire cotton famine, consequent on the American War, immediately followed, and so affected the circuit finances that the third preacher had to be given up. This was a great grief to the Churches, for Mr. Thornley had won the confidence and love of the people, and given signal promise of great usefulness. He was subsequently employed as a hired local preacher in the St. Helen's and Preston Stations. The General Missionary Committee pledged him at the Conference of 1863, and stationed him at Paisley. He spent a happy year with the North British friends, and was then removed to Chester, which at the time included what are now six circuits. From Chester he removed to Bury, in Lancashire, where he finished his probation. He was received into full Connexion at the Conference of 1867, made a superintendent in 1870, and has been a superintendent ever since. It speaks well for him that he has returned to four of his stations a second time. He is at present in Bacup for a second term, and invited for a third year. The whole of his ministerial life, except four years, has been spent in the Manchester and Liverpool Districts, which, by association and sympathy, are still regarded as one.

Mr. Thornley is of medium stature and well-proportioned. He has had remarkably good health, never having been laid aside from work, except for a few weeks after repeated attacks of influenza. He is still "sound in wind and limb," and, humanly speaking, is likely to remain at his post for many years to come.

He has a healthy and well-balanced intellect, under a discipline which keeps him from sinking into a morbid pessimism on the one hand, and from being carried off his feet "in wandering mazes lost" on the other hand. He is one of those who were called into the ministry before the Connexion could afford the expense of a previous training, and who had to go direct from the plough, the mine, the forge, the factory, or the shop to the pulpit to do the most momentous and far-reaching work in which any man can engage. Those who know from experience what that means are thankful that those days are passed. Mr. Thornley had many disadvantages in his youth and early ministry, but he resolved as far as possible to surmount them. From the beginning he has been a reader and student, and has attained to an intellectual status of which neither he nor his friends have any reason to be ashamed. He has not yet reached the stagnant stage, but is still strengthening his intellectual life by absorbing and assimilating the best mental food within his reach. He does not live in the past, but in the ever-living present.

As a preacher, he can declaim, quote poetry, and give wings to his imagination, but his sermons contain more teaching than declamation, more sober reasoning than poetry, and more appeals to the conscience than to the fancy. One member of a congregation said to another, "Our minister never preaches without dropping some pearl." "True," was the reply, "but I often wish he would drop a potato." Mr. Thornley can drop pearls, but he drops more potatoes than pearls. His sermons are generally well thought out and prepared with scrupulous care, and always with the view of converting sinners from the error of their ways, or of helping Christians to more completeness in Christ.

His Christian character is strong, devout, and symmetrical. His conduct is manly, considerate, and transparent. He is beloved in all his circuits by the people who really know him.

He is modest and retiring to a fault, but when inspired by a sense of duty he can rise above constitutional diffidence and make his power felt. He does not shirk responsibilities laid upon him by the Church, though he has a tendency to shrink from high official positions. He has twice represented his District in Conference, been General Committee Delegate, and in York and Liverpool Districts acted as secretary of the Orphanage Committee. The duties of these positions he discharged with conscientious accuracy.

As a superintendent he is very prudent and painstaking. He does his work methodically, carefully, and well, and has been blessed with a fair amount of success. He has the knack of pulling disaffected parties together, and bringing discordant elements into harmony. In many of his circuits he has done a good work in reducing chapel debts and improving the financial condition generally. We think that every Quarterly Board under which he has served would say that he left the station healthier and stronger than he found it; and almost without exception, he has removed not from necessity, but from choice. He has a wholesome fear of tarrying too long.

He is unswerving in his loyalty to the doctrines, polity, and discipline of our Church, and his highest ambition is to serve it in fidelity to Jesus Christ.

When leaving a circuit some time ago, one of the public prints, referring to his departure, said: "Mr. Thornley has proved himself to be a good preacher and administrator of his circuit and Connexion. He has been most regular and exemplary in the discharge of his pastoral duties, evincing great interest in Sunday Schools, Bands of Hope, etc., and putting himself to no end of trouble to place the various chapel properties within the circuit in an easy financial position. What is still better, in accomplishing these varied objects, he has succeeded to an extent that is quite creditable to him. His relations with other ministers and other churches have been of the most cordial character, and he will be followed to his new sphere of labour with the good wishes for his future welfare by hosts of friends." We believe he deserves all the good things said of him, and hope that in the good Providence of God he may serve the Church and Kingdom of Jesus Christ for many years to come.

God Provideth for the Morrow.

Lo, the lilies of the field,
How their leaves instruction yield!
Hark to Nature's lesson, given
By the blessed birds of heaven;
Every bush and tufted tree
Warbles sweet philosophy;
"Mortals, fly from doubt and sorrow,
God provideth for the morrow!"

"Say, with richer crimson glows
The kingly mantle than the rose?
Say, have kings more wholesome fare
Than we poor citizens of air?

Barns, nor hoarded grain have we,
Yet we carol merrily.
Mortal, fly from doubt and sorrow,
God provideth for the morrow!"

"One there lives whose guardian eye
Guides our humble destiny;
One there lives, who, Lord of all,
Keeps our feathers lest they fall,
Pass we blithely then the time,
Fearless of the snare and lime,
Free from doubt and faithless sorrow;
God provideth for the morrow!"

CHAPTER X.

FATHER RITZOOM'S PLANS.

FATHER SHEEN stared at the Jesuit like one demented. Being but a simple-minded old gentleman, and knowing little of Jesuitical sophistry, he could not see his way through the subtle windings of the other's brains. He therefore waited, open-mouthed, for him to proceed.

Ritzoom lit his second cigar, and again closed his eyes, as though he were thoroughly enjoying himself.

"Whatever your taste in other matters, Sheen," he said, "in cigars it is beyond praise. These are simply lovely."

"Bother the cigars!" cried the old man, somewhat testily, "tell me what you mean."

"Surely you can see."

"No more than the dead."

"And yet as a Catholic priest you profess to be a student of human motives."

"But give me some clue."

"Clue! Why, Sheen, you are a child. Let me ask you a few other questions, and in so doing you will see what my plans are."

"Ask questions by all means."

"Well, first of all tell me about Rutland. You say he is twenty-six?"

"Yes."

"And minister of Tudor Chapel, which you say is the most important Nonconforming meeting-house in the town?"

"He has the largest, the most intelligent, and therefore the most influential congregation of any Church in the town. People of all sorts crowd to hear him."

"He is a scholar?"

"He is an M.A. of the London University. He took both his B.A. and M.A. during his six years at the Theological College at which he studied."

"A gentleman?"

"I should say so, certainly."

"And good-looking?"

"Yes, one of these distinguished-looking fellows. He is tall and lithe. His face is rather pale. He wears no beard, and his features are what you may call clean cut. He has a fine head of dark hair. He would be noticed in any crowd."

"He's not married, you say?"

"No. I hear he has no marriage entanglements. I suppose half the girls in his congregation worship him."

"Of course; but he is seemingly a pronounced bachelor?"

"Yes."

"Splendid. Nothing could be better. Nothing.

* Copyright in the United States of America.

And you say he is humorous, sensitive, and passionate?"

"If you had heard him you would have no doubt about it."

"You say he has met Miss Alison Neville?"

"Of course. I told you of the affair of last Wednesday night. Alison saved him from the anger of some of our people who were—very enthusiastic in the Church's cause."

"This Miss Alison Neville is a faithful child of the Church?"

"I verily believe she would die for it."

"So I judge. It was she who incited you to give that series of addresses, and to accept Rutland's challenge?"

"It was," replied Father Sheen, sighing bitterly.

"What does she think of Rutland?"

"She hates him!"

"Good. She says so, does she?"

"Yes, she is very bitter towards him. Alison, you know, thought I should be able to—to——"

"Wipe him out, as he wiped you out."

"Yes," replied the old man lugubriously.

"And as a consequence was all the more bitterly disappointed at your failure."

"That's it."

"And now hates him like poison?"

"Yes. I never knew her feel so bitterly towards any one."

"How old is she?"

"About twenty, I think."

"Just so. I have never had the pleasure of meeting her. Of course, I know of the family. The Nevilles are among the few who remain true to the Church in the important Houses of Lancashire. I should judge from what you say that she is an ardent Catholic, but of an inquiring mind. That she is impulsive, sometimes rather unreasonable, but still faithful to the Church. She almost worships you, I suppose?"

"I believe she is very fond of me, and trusts me implicitly. That is natural; I have been a friend of the family for over——"

"Yes, yes. Has her ladyship arranged for her marriage?"

"No, not definitely. As you know, that matter presents many difficulties. There are so very few eligible young Catholic gentlemen in these parts. And I am sure Alison would not marry a heretic."

"Just so. I think you said she was good-looking?"

"A beautiful girl."

"High-spirited, well educated, fairly widely read, fascinating, romantic."

"Yes, all that."

Ritzoom again sat with closed eyes for a few minutes, then he threw the cigar end into the fire and lit another. As he did so he laughed with evident enjoyment.

"This is splendid, Sheen," he said.

"Still—I—I don't understand you," stammered the old man.

"You will in a minute. Now, just another question. Lady Neville is a devoted daughter of the Church?"

"You know that, Ritzoom. She has been our chief stay and support in the town. She is the only important person of our faith in the district. She pays for two nurses, she has built a convent, she gives large sums of money for our work every year. The whole Church has no truer child than she."

"Yes, I knew all this pretty well, but I wished to be perfectly sure. Women are peculiar creatures, and sometimes change without apparent reason. But all is well, all is well. These are really fine cigars, Sheen," and again the Jesuit closed his eyes, and blew huge volumes of smoke from his mouth.

"But what—what are you driving at, Ritzoom? Why have you asked all these questions?"

"To get you out of your scrape, and to win a host of converts to the faith."

"But how?"

"Well, I will tell you. Things must take their course on Wednesday; but you must not attend. You say there is a mid-weekly paper, and you must pen a few lines, or I will for you, saying that in obedience to the commands of your medical adviser you had to stay at home."

"But I shall be the laughing-stock of the town."

"No more than you have been; and even if you are it cannot be helped."

"Then you go and say a few words. Ask a few questions in your own peculiar way."

"I had thought of that, but it will not do. I am a stranger, and Rutland will be fully primed. No, let him have his own way. He will have only Protestants to speak to, that is if he sees fit for a meeting to be held."

"Oh yes, I see."

"Well, then, we must arrange for Rutland to be invited to the Priory."

"But why?"

"Because he must fall in love with Miss Alison Neville."

"Good heavens, man, you must be mad! What good will that do?"

"You will see presently. She must be very gracious with him. I also will meet him there again and again. We will show how kind we Catholics are in forgiving all the hard things he has said about us; we will say nothing about our faith; but it shall be presented to him in the most glowing colours. He shall see it at its best. It shall be represented to him in one of the finest old homes in England. He shall see it through the medium of refinement, culture, and an old name. More, he shall see it in the person of a beautiful, educated girl. And she shall be very winsome, very gracious. All the conversation he shall hear, shall lead him to see ideal Catholicism. He shall be overwhelmed by the greatness of our Church, he shall see the grandeur of our purposes, he shall understand the magnificence of our outlook, and everything shall be beautiful to him because at every turn he will see the beautiful girl he will learn to love."

"And then?"

"He will be fascinated, bewildered. He will begin to compare the littleness of the paltry sects with our great Church. He will be touched by our antiquity, our tremendous history. I will be there to explain those dark periods of that history. Not ostensibly, but apparently by accident. And he will yield, he will as surely come to us as the traditional fly walked into the spider's parlour. All arguments of the ordinary nature will fail with him, I saw that by glancing at his speech. The critical faculty is strongly developed in him. But he is young, he is ardent, and he will fall under the spell of a woman's eyes."

"Well, go on."

"Sheen, there should be no need for me to go on. You are an Irishman, and not an Englishman, and thus should not need all these explanations. The marvel to me is how this blockheaded English race should have made such progress."

"Never mind the English race. Tell me the rest of your plans."

"Well, as I said, he will fall in love with your Miss Alizon Neville, he will become but as clay in her hands. He, in spite of his education, is a commoner, while she is the daughter of one of the oldest families in England. And mind you, the most democratic Englishman that ever breathed, loves what is termed noble families. For a time he will flounder, and then, because she continues to be kind and gracious to him, he will make a confession of his love, will ask her to be his wife."

"And then?"

"Then, why, she will tell him that she cannot wed an enemy to her faith."

"Naturally; but afterwards?"

"Then all our preparatory work will take effect, and presently he will resign his position at Tudor Chapel. After that he will declare himself a convert."

"My word, Ritzoom!"

"After that you will have a great day at Lynford, for this skilled opponent of yours, this man who has, from an argumentative view, used you as a mop, will stand up in that very hall, before the assembled thousands, and declare himself a convert to the Catholic faith."

"That is fine, but if he were to marry Alizon, I say 'if,' because she is the centre not only of your hopes but of your difficulties, if he were to marry Alizon, I say, the people would say that he renounced his faith only to marry a rich and noble woman. We should say the same if we lost anyone under similar circumstances."

"But he will not marry her. When his declaration is made, she will refuse him."

"And then he will turn back again."

"No, he will not, he dare not. And even if he did, his influence would be gone."

"Heavens, Ritzoom, I could never have dreamed of such a thing. Still, I see difficulties."

"Of course you do. I believe you must be an Englishman. Their great characteristic is that they see difficulties."

"But they overcome them, you can't deny that."

"Anyhow, what are your difficulties?"

"First, you could not get Alizon to consent to such a plot. Even I dare not suggest it to her. She is the soul of honour, and were I to hint at such a thing I should lose influence with her. English Catholics are not like those on the Continent."

"Unfortunately they are not; but in this case it does not matter. All she would be asked to do would be simply to be kind and gracious. We should tell her that we wished to convert him, and that it is her duty to assist us. She will not think that we intend him to fall in love with her, she will never dream of it, and we must not hint at it."

"I see, and her ladyship?"

"Leave her to me. I will tell her all it is safe for her to know. I must sum up her character. But I do not think it will be necessary for her to know. As a good Catholic, however, she will feel that it is her duty to convert the man who has proved such a formidable opponent to the Church in the town."

"Yes, she would, she would. Moreover, it is plainly her duty to assist us. Ritzoom, you are a genius!"

"Thank God I'm not an Englishman," he said fervently.

The two men sat quietly for some time without further speech.

"And suppose Rutland falls in with your ideas," broke in Father Sheen presently, "suppose everything turns out according to your plans, what is to become of him?"

"Impossible to tell until I've seen him. That is a mere detail. As you know, with us Jesuits the man is nothing, the truth is everything. Rutland is only a pawn on the chess-board. For the time he may seem a knight, a bishop or what you like in the game we are playing. In reality, however, he is only a pawn, and a chess-player pays but little attention to the pawns."

"Still——"

"Oh yes, I quite understand you," said Ritzoom, as though he had fully divined what was in the other's mind. "From what you say, I should think he has the making of a priest in him. Once let us get him to renounce his faith, well, then we've got him. Of course it will be impossible for Miss Alizon Neville to marry him. It would never do. Nothing would be gained, and much lost, by such a course of procedure. She will, she must refuse him, and then I should not be surprised if he, crushed, bewildered, heart-broken, does not seek to solace himself by entering the priesthood."

"If that could be done, it would be a wondrous triumph!" exclaimed Father Sheen.

"The more so, as up to now, we can point to no single instance where a Nonconformist of any standing whatever has joined us. To convert a pronounced heretic, a Protestant champion, and to make him a priest—well, it should be paragraphed in every newspaper in England. I would see to that."

"Yes, yes," said Father Sheen, fairly carried away by enthusiasm. "It is a splendid scheme, splendid. All the more so because it is so natural, so simple. If well worked out it will atone for my shortcomings. Yes, Rutland must be invited to the Priory, where Lady Neville and Alizon must be kind. I am sure they will gladly, eagerly agree to it. And Rutland, he will be fascinated, charmed—exactly. But you will have to stay here a few weeks?"

"I can do no good at present, but later on I can give the matter just six weeks," said Ritzoom.

"Six weeks, can this be done in six weeks?"

"My part of the work can, easily. But understand, for the present I appear in your midst as a Catholic layman. As such, too, I go to hear Rutland on Wednesday night."

"What, are you going to hear him?"

"Certainly. That is I shall go if he decides to hold a meeting."

After this the two men sat a long time talking, during which Father Ritzoom smoked many cigars.

CHAPTER XI.

AT THE PRIORY.

ON the following Wednesday morning, a letter appeared in the Lynford Observer, stating that owing to medical advice, Father Sheen had yielded to the wishes of the authorities of his Church, and had decided not to take part in that night's debate. The letter was carefully worded, and a medical certificate appended, so that to an outsider it would seem as though the priest had after much persuasion foregone a duty which would have yielded him great pleasure. The inhabitants of the town, however, thought otherwise. Many jokes were passed in the factories, while many conjectures were offered as to the course things would take.

"I thowt Rutland gave Sheen a 'eadache last Wednesday neet, aw spoase oo's noan got over it yet," said old Matthy Bray as he read the letter.

"Yi, aw spoase oo'l be sittin' in his arm-cheer wi' a vinegar cloth tied araand his 'ead," said the man to whom the old weaver spoke. "Weel, aw'm glad aw voated for Rutland comin' to Tudor. Oo's just the man for us."

"Yi, and so am I. Some foak sead as aa oo wur too young. But aw seed as aa the lad 'ad gotten brains. Tell tha, lad, the chap as baits Rutland 'll 'ave to geet up middlin' early. Oo'll noan 'ave mich time for breakfast."

"Thou'rt near right, Matthy, but sitha, wot's yon?"

The two men were on their way to dinner. They had just left the factory, and were passing through the principal street in the town.

The object which attracted their attention was a huge placard, announcing that as Father Sheen had declared that he would be unable to take part in the debate, and as nearly two thousand tickets were sold for the same, Mr. Rutland would give a Lecture on "The Right of Private Judgment in Religious Matters."

The weavers laughed gleefully as they read it.

"Oo's noan lost much time, Jonas," said Matthy Bray.

"Nay, the lad's made up his mind middlin' quick. Art a baan?"

"Yi, aw am an' all, aw would'n miss it for summat. Aw doan't think many people 'll stay away cause Sheen isn't coming."

"Except th' Cathlicks," remarked Jonas.

"Thou'rt reight, Jonas," said Matthy, "Cathlicks 'll noan coom to-neet. All th' same, th' 'All 'll be full."

"Yi, aw shall geet middlin' early."

As the weaver had predicted, the Hall was crowded, although no Catholics appeared on the platform, and, as far as could be judged, very few were in the main building. Only a few of the people noticed a dark, clean-shaven man, with large square features, who sat in the middle of the hall. Except that his face denoted remarkable strength, there seemed no reason for paying him particular attention. He was dressed in dark serge clothes, and his short, double-breasted coat accentuated the broad shoulders, and powerful chest. He spoke no word to anyone, but seemed to observe the character of the meeting closely.

When Rutland walked on to the platform, and the people rose en masse to cheer him, not a muscle of his face moved, but his keen, dark eyes were fixed on the young minister, as though he were much interested in him. Throughout Rutland's address the man noted his every movement, listened to every word he uttered, and marked with evident interest the impression he made upon the audience. The people laughed, cheered, shouted, and became indignant, scornful, and enthusiastic in turn; but this man never altered the expression of his face. That he was interested no one could doubt; but what he thought of the eager young speaker who swayed the multitude at will, no one could gather. He was as silent as the Sphinx, and his face was as immovable.

When the Lecture was over, a man, who was sitting next to him spoke in a friendly way, characteristic of Lancashire people.

"Yo're a stranger to Lynford, aw reckon?" he said.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Aw doan knaw wot th' Cathlicks will say after to-neet," remarked the Lynford man. "Rutland's fairly showed up the result of priests tryin' to hinder people thinkin' baat religious matters."

"He has, indeed," said the stranger.

"That lecture 'll be a reg'lar knock-downer for Father Sheen, an' all th' Cathlicks, won't it?"

The man did not reply, but rose and left the hall, not deigning to listen to the men who got up to propose a vote of thanks to Duncan for the valiant stand he had taken. He walked some distance down the street, when hearing the Town Hall clock chiming he turned and looked in that direction.

"A quarter past nine," he said. "I shall be in good time."

He went to a cabstand and entered one of the conveyances.

"The Priory," he said quietly.

A little later the cab drew up before the entrance of Lady Neville's old home.

Evidently the visitor was expected, for he was immediately ushered into the room where Lady Neville and Alison sat, together with Father Sheen.

"You are back early," said Father Sheen.

"Yes, I came away as soon as Rutland had finished his lecture."

"Well, and what was your impression of him, Father Ritzoom?" asked Lady Neville.

The Jesuit was silent for a few seconds. He looked at the two ladies, and at Father Sheen, as though he wondered what had passed between them during the evening.

"I think it is a great pity that a man possessing such talents should remain outside the Church," he replied.

"It is, indeed," remarked Lady Neville, "but what can be done with him?"

"Can't you think?" asked Ritzoom, eyeing the occupants of the room keenly.

"I wish I could," she replied.

"It is no use denying the matter, he has struck our Church a heavy blow," remarked Father Sheen pathetically.

Alison said nothing, but listened eagerly to what was said.

"Father Ritzoom," said Lady Neville, "I wish you could think of some means whereby the harm he has done could be nullified."

"It would be better still if it could be made to render us good service," remarked the Jesuit quietly.

"Yes, yes, of course; but that seems impossible."

"Didn't you think him conceited, pedantic, and—and arrogant to-night, Father Ritzoom?" asked Alison somewhat impatiently.

"Perhaps, slightly," replied the Jesuit, "but not unduly so. I remembered that he is a young man, and that the applause of the multitude was enough to make him a little—well, over certain."

"Was his lecture able?" asked Father Sheen.

"It was a very dangerous address, a very dangerous address," was the reply. "It appealed to those qualities which are characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race."

"I THOWT RUTLAND GAVE SHEEN A 'EADACHE LAST WEDNESDAY NEET."

"And they?" asked Alison.

"They may be all summed up in a word, self-importance. He played upon this, flattered it, fostered it, glorified it. He made the authority of God's ordained priests a very difficult matter. I should not be surprised if many of Father Sheen's flock go astray."

"Oh, it's a shame, a shame!" cried Alison hotly, "cannot something be done? It makes one long for the power of the Inquisition."

"Yes, it helps one to understand some of those deeds which Protestants make so much of. But we are in England, and we are but a weak, struggling people here. We want a new Reformation."

"And that seems impossible," remarked Lady Neville.

"Pardon me, I think not," remarked the Jesuit quietly.

"You think not," cried her ladyship somewhat astonished. "I hope you may be right; but I see no loop-hole anywhere. I had hoped that this debate would have helped us; but instead of that, it seems as though the enemies of God are triumphant. Whatever we may think, it is generally accepted that the Protestants have won all along the line. Could you not, Father Ritzoom, answer him? You are skilled in all these matters."

"It is a great mistake to think that these great subjects can be dealt with on the public platform amidst clamour and excitement," replied the Jesuit. "The holy St. Paul tells us that spiritual things are spiritually discerned. It is not arguments that will win converts, but grace. In one sense this debate has been a colossal mistake; still I trust we may use it as a weapon which will vanquish the enemies of the Church, and win numberless converts."

"But how?" cried Alizon.

"By converting Mr. Rutland," said Ritzoom quietly.

He had seen that Father Sheen had been discreetly silent during his absence, and thus he was able to introduce his plans in his own way.

"Convert Mr. Rutland!" cried the girl.

"Just that, Miss Alizon."

"Impossible."

"Is the grace of God confined, Miss Alizon? Is the power of the Church limited?" said the priest, fixing his eyes steadily upon the girl. "Here is a great work for us all! By leading him into the fold, we save his own soul from hell, and we save all those who will follow him. I can see in that young man a possible defender of faith, I can see him pleading for the very things he has condemned; I can see him in that very hall denying the things he has proclaimed, and telling his present congregation that their only hope is in our Holy Church."

The Jesuit spoke in low impressive tones, and the girl felt that he had cast a kind of spell upon her. For the moment she seemed to have no will but his. He seemed to possess a kind of mesmeric power.

"If it could only be," she murmured.

"It can, if you, Miss Alizon, and you, Lady Neville, will help," said the priest.

"As far as our help is concerned," said her ladyship, "of course, you can depend on it; still, I cannot quite see how it is to be done. He is a pronounced heretic, a militant heretic, and what is more, he is an educated man."

"He is a heretic, Lady Neville, because he has never really understood the Church. He has never seen it, therefore he does not know it. He has been reared in an atmosphere in which we are regarded as enemies to God. He has been fed upon Protestant history. Let him feel the lies of Protestantism, let him feel the truth of the Church."

"Yes, but how? Where?"

"Where? Here."

"Here!" cried her ladyship in astonishment.

"Yes, here. Let him see our religion where such as he should see it. Let him feel its power in a refined, beautiful home, let him see it expressed in beautiful lives. Let him breathe the atmosphere which ever pervades this historic house, and all things will become new to him."

"Do you really think so?" asked her ladyship, scarcely knowing what she was saying.

"If the whole teaching of my life is not a failure, if thirty years of close observation, and thirty years of careful study of men and women be not the foolishness of fools, it will be so. When I read his speeches, I thought it possible, probable, but after seeing him, and hearing him to-night, I am sure. As I said, it has been my business for thirty years to know men. To you it has been no secret, Lady Neville, and thus I can speak plainly, although I have never been privileged to know you till yesterday. You know that I have had to deal with delicate questions, and have been led into the society of all classes of individuals. In order to serve the Church, I have been obliged to study men and motives closely. Well, I have had a special opportunity of understanding Rutland, for there is no place where a man's strength and weakness can be so clearly seen as on a public platform."

"And what is your estimate of Mr. Rutland?"

"The most casual observer can see that he is highly sensitive, and emotional, and yet not so emotional but that his critical faculties are much in evidence. At first I thought he was that kind of man who will do anything for popularity, and that this debate might be an expression of that trait in his character. But that is not so. He is deeply and sincerely conscientious. With him truth is before everything. He is spiritually-minded, too; and I am as certain as I can be of anything that the barrenness of a Protestant sect does not, cannot satisfy him. He possesses the historical spirit, too. He knows something of, and longs more for the science of history. He has a logical mind, and yearns for the deepest and truest expressions of a spiritual idea. The Church is to him a great spiritual idea, and in his heart of hearts he longs for its visible manifestation. At present he does not feel the poverty of the bedraggled, torn, tattered, miserable caricature of the Church called Protestantism; but it will come. All his bitterness towards us is a matter of education; but when he sees us, and realises our ideals; when he understands how truly the Catholic Church expresses his own deepest longings, he will come to us as a lamb comes to its mother."

Alizon Neville's eyes fairly glistened for joy as the priest spoke. His words lent wings to her imagination too, and she saw what the Jesuit intended she should see.

"Mother, mother!" she cried, "it would be glorious!"

"We must make him feel that the Catholics are kind and forgiving," went on the Jesuit; "he must know that although we are grieved at his attack, we are not angry, that we have no bitterness towards him, but that we pity all that are away from the light. We must not act the superior person, and make it appear that we regard his Protestantism with scorn; we are simply believers in the great Church which the Founder of Christianity established, and which has through the ages nurtured and comforted untold millions of souls. We must not do this by protestations; but simply, unostentatiously. He must see our faith, not by argument, but by simple deed. Presently he will begin to ask questions, he will take an interest in our ceremonials, our purposes, our ideals. Then, if he can be made to feel that this home of the Nevilles is also his home, where he is kindly, ay, lovingly welcomed, the spell of truth will be cast upon him, and he will be saved."

For a long time they talked, each referring to the Jesuit in everything, and he, naturally, taking the place of teacher and adviser. To Lady Neville the plan seemed good, and holy, especially as it was advocated by a renowned priest of the Church. She felt it her duty to do her part, and she could see no objection to her falling in with all that was required of her. As for Alizon, she was fascinated by Father Ritzoom, and moved to admiration by his desire to win a heretic back to the truth. She did not dream of the results, she felt no premonition concerning the possible tragic outcome of what they were discussing. Neither did it enter her mind that she was regarded by the priest as the principal actor in the drama.

"Very well," said Lady Neville, as the priests left the Priory that night, "every thing shall be arranged as you suggest."

CHAPTER XII.

THE FIRST LINK IN THE CHAIN.

"WEEL, aw think things ev settled daan middlin', Mester Rutland."

It was old Matthy Bray who spoke to Duncan on the steps of Tudor Chapel. They had just come from one of the meetings of the Church, and were on the point of going home. Several days had elapsed since the night when Duncan had given his lecture.

"After storm comes a calm," laughed the young minister.

"Aw doan't understand it," remarked the weaver.

"No' moor do aw," said Jonas Dixon, who with two or three others had come out with them.

"Don't understand what?" asked Rutland.

"Sheen and the Cathlicks bein' so quiet; it's noan like 'em. Aw reckon they've summat else in their sleeves."

"What can they have?"

"Aw doan knaw; but ther's not one of 'em bin writin' to th' papers, and nobody's said a word. We all knaw as aa tha gived 'em a rare licken, but they'd a noan settled daan so quiet, ef they 'adn't bin tould to. Aw knaw 'em too weel for that."

"Yi," chimed in Jonas Dixon, "aw doan't forget thet Boggart Clough job. Why doan't ee tell all th' truth baat thet job, Mester Rutland?"

"Because,—well, there are good reasons."

"Yi, aw spoase soa. But theer, aw'm noan afeard of a good raa. A dog as barks rarely isn't as ugly as th' one what 'angs 'is yead and growls; and it seems to me as aa thet's what Sheen's lot are doin'. What dost thaa think, Matthy?"

"Aw think thou'rt reight, Jonas. Weel, we mun kip aar een oppen, that's all. But mind, Mester Rutland, foaks of all soorts are watchin' thee. Tha'st put thysen on a 'igh plaace, and naa, church foaks, and Cathlicks, as weel as all th' chapel foaks, 'll watch all tha dost. We look on thee as a sooot ov defender of th' faith, and if tha maks ony slips, the very chaps as shaated praises baat tha, and said thaa wert 'champion,' 'll be the first to call thee naames."

"Yes, I expect so."

"Yi, Lancashire foaks are the best in th' world, aw reckon, but we ev aar failin's, we're noan but 'uman. We're bit like th' owd Jews. One day they shaated 'Hosanna,' and th' next 'Crucify Him.' But theer, thou'rt noan baan to mak a fool o' thysen, art a?"

"I hope not."

"Well then, my advice is this and aw've noan lived i' Lynford better nor fifty year for nowt. Thee be careful if ony o' th' Cathlicks maks friends wi' thee."

"Yes, I'll be careful," laughed Duncan, but he had no fears.

"And theer's another thing. Thou'st kept away fro' the lasses rarely, since thou'st bin here. If aw wur thee, aw'd geet wed."

Duncan laughed heartily. "I've never seen a suitable wife yet," he said.

"Well, that's thy fault. Ther's plenty o' nice lasses as belongs to Tudor, that thaa could 'ave for the axin, and lasses wi' brass an' all. Ther's Ashton's lasses, naa. Th' owd Ashton 'll gi' 'em ten thaasand apiece, aw'm towld, and Alice 'ud be a champion minister's wife. But theer, thet's noan aar business. 'Appen yo've got a lass somewhere."

"No, I've not."

"Well, aw wish tha wert wed. Foaks talk less abaot a passon when oo's wed."

Matthy Bray and Duncan had by this time left the rest, and were walking in the direction of the young minister's lodgings.

"Ya see, Mester Rutland," went on the old weaver, "we oal 'oap as aa tha't stay at Tudor mony a year, and we think as if tha had a good wife fro' th' church, tha would have a stake in th' place so ta spaik. And ther's nowt like 'avin' a stake in a place."

"You think not?"

"It's th' great cure for moast things. Aw reckon if aw were a rich man aw could kill moast o' th' socialism in a week."

"Indeed."

"Yi, aw could. Ef aw wer to give a cottage to every socialist, it 'ud stop his maath. Aw've seen it a lot o' times. It's chaps wot's got nowt who are socialist. When they've gotten a bit o' brass, their socialism goes."

"I dare say; but what has that to do with my getting a wife?"

"Ay, if thou'st gotton a wife fro' Lynford, thaa would 'ave a stake 'ere. The roots o' thy bein' would be fastened 'ere. Besides, thy missis could go wi' thee to th' young fowks' meetin's, and thet 'ud stop gossip."

"Why, have people been gossiping about me?"

"Ther's nobody been talked abaast as much, but not i' that way. Aw'm only thinking baat the future. Thee look aat for a nice lass, Mester. One with a bit o' brass, and thee settle daan at Tudor for life. But mind, oo mun come fro' Tudor."

"Must she?"

"Yi, oo must. Tudor foak 'ud noan put up wi' a lass from th' other chapels."

"Good-night, Matthy. I'm afraid you are a dangerous adviser," laughed Duncan.

"Noa, aw'm on th' reight track. Aw've cut all my teeth, Mester, an' aw'm wot th' lawyers ca' Kompus Mentle. Aw reckon thet's it, but aw'm noan a Greek scholar, so 'appen tha't be laughin' at me."

"You are quite right," laughed Rutland, "good-night," and he entered the door of his lodgings.

A good fire was burning in the grate, otherwise the young man's study was in entire darkness. He did not trouble to light the gas however; instead he drew an arm-chair before the fire and began musing. In spite of himself the weaver's words affected him. It was very lonely sitting night after night in his room. True, he could spend as many of his evenings out as he desired, for every door in the Church was open to him, but after he had been to the meetings he felt no desire for the company of people, with many of whom he had no tastes in common. Besides, all men, especially Englishmen, long for a home of their own. While he was at college he felt no loneliness. There was always a host of fellows ready to talk to him; but now—well, after six months of lodgings, he wished he had a home. As the old weaver had said, there were perhaps true, good-hearted girls at Tudor Chapel who would not object to become his wife. But he had paid but little attention to them. The truth was there was no one in the Church to whom he had given a second thought. Alice Ashton, the girl the old weaver had named, was the eldest daughter of a wealthy manufacturer. She was a tall, buxom young woman of five-and-twenty, healthy, good-tempered, and of tolerable intelligence. She had been as well educated as was common among the wealthy people of the town, and would doubtless make a faithful, loving wife. She had been especially kind to him too, and always seemed pleased to be in his company. But he did not care for her in the slightest degree. By nature he was romantic, and had dreamed dreams of the woman he would love, and of the sensations which would possess him. This girl did not make a pulse stir quicker; there was no more romance in meeting her than in meeting Jonas Dixon the weaver.

He was suffering a reaction, too, after the excitement of the debate. He missed the thundering plaudits of the people, and longed for those emotions which possessed him when he rose to answer Father Sheen. It was true his work at Tudor Church was wondrously successful, and he loved that work beyond words, and still he felt something wanting.

And so he went on dreaming, thinking, until it struck him that he might as well light the gas and read for half an hour before Mrs. Nutter brought in his supper of bread and milk, which was his invariable meal before going to bed. No sooner had he lit the gas, however, than he saw a letter lying on his study desk which had come in by the night's post. He noticed that a Lynford postmark was stamped upon it, and then opened it languidly.

"One of the churches asking me to preach, I suppose," he thought, and then he caught sight of the writing. "It's from a lady, I wonder who it can be from?"

This was the letter which reached him that February night:—

The Priory, Lynford.
Feb. 13, 189—

DEAR MR. RUTLAND,

It has struck me, as it has doubtless struck you, that there is a good work which ought to be done in the town, and in which all the churches could take part. There are four cab-stands in Lynford, besides those at the stations, and the only places of shelter which the cabmen have are the nearest public-houses. This, for many reasons, is undesirable, especially as it has a tendency to lead men to be intemperate, who would otherwise be sober. I would, therefore, suggest that the representatives of all the principal churches should meet to consider the advisability of building a sufficient number of convenient and comfortable cabmen's shelters. It is probable you may think the Priory a rather inconvenient place of meeting, nevertheless, I shall be very glad if you will come here on Friday night next, (I understand that Friday is the night on which ministers are least engaged), so that we may, I trust, form some definite plan of action.

With kind regards,

I am, yours sincerely,

HELEN NEVILLE.

N.B.—Time of meeting, 8 o'clock.

Duncan read this letter through twice, and then laughed a little nervously.

"Of course Father Sheen will be there," he thought, "but I can scarcely refuse. Tudor is the oldest and largest Nonconformist Church in the town, and ought to be represented. The object is a good one too. I have often pitied those poor fellows standing around in the pouring rain. It will be awkward meeting Father Sheen and Lady Neville, but it is evident they bear no ill-will, and I see no reason why I should be awkward. Yes, I'll go."

"SHE HELD OUT HER HAND AND GREETED HIM WITH A KIND SMILE."

He immediately scribbled a hasty acceptance of the invitation, and then went to the pillar-box which stood near his own door, and posted the letter.

"I wonder whether Miss Alison Neville will be at the meeting?" he thought as he came back to the house. "Scarcely, I should think. I have an idea that she will never speak to me again."

When Friday night came he found his way to the Priory; he was rather late owing to the fact that just as he was about to start someone had called asking him to visit a sick woman. It was therefore nearly half-past eight before he arrived at the house. He was immediately ushered into the room where a number of people sat, including Father Sheen.

Lady Neville's greeting as he entered was most cordial and he could not help feeling that he was regarded as a person of importance in the meeting. On more than one occasion Father Sheen directly asked his opinion, and on his giving it, immediately advocated its acceptance. Indeed, the most friendly and genial person in the room was the old priest. He told several funny stories with considerable spirit, and caused roars of laughter by them. For there is no part of the country where people are so easily moved to laughter as in Lancashire. Let a dozen men and women, of whatever degree, get together, and the poorest witticism will produce laughter, while a funny story will almost cause convulsions. Lancashire people are what is generally termed "hard-headed," they are as keen at driving a bargain as the proverbial Yorkshireman, they will seldom err on the side of generosity when business is concerned; nevertheless, they are simple-minded, tender-hearted people, as easily moved to laughter and tears as little children. And it is difficult to bestow higher praise than that in a cynical and callous age."

Presently the business of the meeting came to an end. Rutland's suggestion that a subscription list be opened, that her ladyship be the treasurer, and the town-clerk the secretary, was passed without a dissentient, and a working committee was elected on the spot.

Immediately this was done Father Sheen called Rutland aside and asked him a question on a matter which seemed to the young minister of but little importance, but which apparently exercised the old priest's mind greatly. Indeed, so interested did he become concerning the matter, and so earnestly did he talk, that Rutland for courtesy's sake, was obliged to listen, and consequently a few minutes later he found that the rest of the members of the meeting had departed, and that he was alone in the room with the old Irishman.

At this juncture Lady Neville entered the room.

"I am so glad you are not gone, Mr. Rutland," she said graciously. "I was anxious that you should not slip out without my having a chance of speaking to you. Alizon was telling me the other day that you were very fond of old houses. I thought you might like to look over the Priory."

"I should be delighted," replied Rutland, almost without thinking.

"It is rather a fine old house in its way, I suppose," went on her ladyship, "and has many interesting associations. There are secret passages, secret cells, places where traitors have been hidden, and outlaws sheltered. There is a haunted room, where the ghost of Sir Thomas More is supposed to appear, and a royal chamber where Charles I. is said to have slept. I shall be delighted to show you through."

"You are very kind," said Duncan. "I am afraid you have fastened upon a weakness of mine. I am simply a child when I am brought into contact with things old and mysterious and superstitious. But I am afraid I am taxing your ladyship's kindness far too much by accepting."

"Oh no, do not mention it. It will be a real pleasure to show you through the building. But what time is it, Father Sheen?"

"It is half-past nine," replied the priest.

"Oh, I remember now. We dined very early to-night in view of this meeting, Mr. Rutland, and all this talking is exhausting. I am sure, Father Sheen, you will be glad of some slight refreshment, and I hope Mr. Rutland will consent to join us at a little supper. He will need it to fortify himself against the ghosts;" and her ladyship laughed pleasantly.

Before he realised what he was doing he found himself in another room speaking to Alizon Neville.

The young minister felt his heart beat faster as she held out her hand, and greeted him with a kind smile. Everything was so different from what he had expected. Instead of being cold and haughty, she was kind and gracious. He could not help feeling how beautiful she was. There in the glow of the lamplight, her finely-moulded form revealed itself to advantage, while her somewhat heightened colour, and bright, shining eyes were the accompaniments of a face, which to the young man was lovely beyond words. The great masses of wavy chestnut hair, which glistened in the light, seemed to the romantic young minister almost like a nimbus, and at that moment he forgot that he was a commoner, while she belonged to one of the oldest families in England, forgot that he was a Protestant, and that she was an ardent Catholic.

In spite of the socialistic tendencies of the age, England is a conservative country, and there is much truth in the old saying that an Englishman loves a lord. He does, and always will, I suspect, while we are a nation and remember that we have a history. Not that Rutland was a worshipper of aristocracy. Far from it. He was too sensible a fellow for that. And yet he was influenced by the fact that Alizon Neville came of a race which had influenced the life of the country. Although he did not know it, those old rooms, the quaint antique furniture, and the fact that the Priory was associated with some of the important epochs of the English race, had a strange effect upon him.

They talked about books, pictures, plays, and men, and the time sped by on the wings of the wind. When they rose from the table, Father Sheen looked at his watch.

"It is nearly half-past ten, Lady Neville," he said with mock seriousness.

"It is?" cried Rutland, "I had forgotten—that is I had no idea it was so late. I am afraid I dare not tax you to take me over the Priory to-night."

"It is rather late," said Lady Neville. "It would take at least two hours. You must come some other day, Mr. Rutland, come early. Can't you decide upon an afternoon now? Almost any day next week, I shall be delighted to see you."

Rutland was fascinated, bewildered. Scarcely realising what he was doing he mentioned a day on which he would be at liberty.

"That will be delightful," said Lady Neville graciously. "You and Father Sheen will be able to go back to Lynford together; but there is plenty of time for you to smoke a cigar before leaving us."

She led the way into the library, and the two men smoked and talked, while Lady Neville and Alizon joined in their conversation. Rutland felt that this was the most delightful evening he had ever spent.

"Next Wednesday, then, at three o'clock, I shall expect you both," said her ladyship. "You will then be able to go over the house before dinner quite comfortably. Good-night."

The two men walked towards Lynford, while Lady Neville went back to Alizon.

"He is really a delightful young fellow to know," she remarked, as Alizon sat looking into the fire.

"Yes," replied the girl.

"I had no idea he would be so interesting. He is really worth knowing apart from every other consideration."

"Do you think all this is quite right, mother?" asked the girl.

"I do, indeed. We are simply kind to him, and—that is all. If he is led to the truth, he will thank us throughout his life. Besides, it is our duty."

"Do you think he will ever become a convert?"

"Yes, I think so, don't you?"

"No," replied Alizon, "I do not believe he will ever be a Catholic."

"I believe you are quite mistaken," replied Lady Neville. "You will see that I am right in a few weeks."

The Garden of Yorkshire.

IV.

It is on the soft moorland slope behind the Nab, here called Sled-dale beck, that the Esk begins its meandering course. Some years ago a Primitive Methodist minister, returning from Kildale with his little boy, lost the bridle-path in a fog on this dreary spot, and had to camp among the rushes and bracken until the morning dawned, when he found he had been within a few yards of the path all the time—"So near, and yet so far." When fog or storm comes sweeping o'er the moors keep to the main road and avoid short cuts, they often prove to be very long roads indeed. But the said minister hates moralising upon the incident, for as he says, "The same God who sent the fog protected and allowed us to get home, no worse for the exposure, and a wakeful night under such circumstances was not all lost time." What a boon it is to have a philosophic temper!

Fogs vary in pace very considerably, some appear as slow-moving as the glacier; but we have seen others envelope the whole range of the moors in a minute or two, their thick, banky folds wiping out hill after hill in a grandly gigantic manner. Its uplifting is just as impressive. It is indeed a beautiful thing in all its movements, but a treacherous, dangerous companion whether on land or sea. The seaman would sooner face a gale than a fog off the English coast, as it is almost impossible to locate sound; you think it is to your right or left, where the fog is more dense, when it is perhaps straight in front, and it travels and passes through its interstices or thinner folds. We have seen a captain who has sailed the East coast for forty years completely baffled as to the position of a steamer which afterwards proved to be coming towards him almost at right angles on his starboard side, when to him and ourselves it seemed absolutely certain she was either coming straight towards us, or even a little on the port side. To our surprise she passed across our bows within two hundred yards, and we full speed astern, quite near enough for an experience, and with 200 or 300 passengers aboard. In tracing the sound of her foghorn a mistake of at least ninety degrees had been made, and they had probably located ours in a different place to where she was. So thick was the fog that, though at the minute of sunrise, the boat was quite indiscernible except to the man on the fore-castle. The sound of a bell carries more direct than a foghorn, which is fuller and, as it were, more rotund.

It was a merry day's outing to go over Highcliffe and on to Cook's Monument a blueberrying. Those who expected us to take any home were to be pitied for their misplaced faith. Those were the glorious days of freedom, when care and restraint were unknown, and when we literally lived from hand to mouth. To-day I can see the women and children going over the moors on the same errand, but not with the same motive; theirs is a more serious business—the business of making a few shillings while the little dark blueberry lasts. May they reap a full harvest this afternoon. Is it true, as reported, that now when the keepers meet with the women or bairns they take their hard-won harvest from them and destroy it? I hope no keeper is capable of such a shabby trick, for surely no material injury can be done by them to anything on these wild moors. If they have instructions to act in this brutal manner, then the great lords of the land, knowing, as they ought to know, the condition of the poor people, should be thoroughly ashamed of their meanness. The question of game is doubtless at the bottom of the restriction, as it has been at the bottom of many a feud between the classes. But in all reason, what injury can be done to the grouse in the berrying season? Many of the children I see running and shouting across the hill will remember these free, happy days on the moors, and be soothed and glad once again at the memory when, perhaps, with broken spirits in the years to come, they are tossed hither and thither on the restless sea of life.

Dark, voluminous packs of smoke show where Middlesbro', youngest and most enterprising of Vulcan's offspring, carries on its mighty trade.

BLAST-FURNACES FROM THE RIVER, MIDDLESBROUGH.

Some of these hamlets were venerable when their names were written in Domesday book, but this young giant of yesterday eclipses them all in numbers, wealth and enterprise. In the early part of the century nothing was to be seen save a solitary farmhouse in the midst of a dreary marsh; and even in 1851 the population was only 7,630; now it has a population of probably upwards of 90,000, with docks, huge iron and steel works, shipyards, chemical works, engineering works, wire, nail and tube works, salt and soda works, a big town-hall and rates to match, of which the least said soonest mended; what can't be cured must be endured. The South Bank steel works are among the largest in the world, and if the stranger should pass the blazing blast furnaces for the first time in the night he will probably have a feeling of uncanny bewilderment if not of actual fear.

With the exception of the four openings towards Middlesbro', Redcar, Saltburn and Whitby respectively, the picturesque vale of Guisbro' is enfolded by hills the sides of which are covered with woods and bosky thickets. As the hills rise abruptly, a good surface view of the woods presents itself: in the foliage season they have an appearance of massive grandeur. They have their own peculiar beauty in the winter too; without their graceful and delicate lines the hills would appear stern and forbidding. I have often admired the curve where the Belmont hill runs up to the Nab and sweeps out again at right angles just below it in a beautifully rounded, sloping spur. The angle of the hill and the spur has a concave appearance, and is suggestive of a warm, cosy refuge under the brow of the bleak promontory. On the Hutton side of the spur, and under it, Sir Joseph Whitwell Pease has built Hutton Hall. I should think there are at least a dozen places in Cleveland with the prefix Hutton—hut-town. Two thousand years ago there were many hut towns on these hills. On the Hutton side of the Nab nature has kneaded and contoured a snug little cove which is a veritable fairylund. At the top of the cove, just under the hill, there is said to be a village named Codell where the estate workmen live. It seems, however, to be only an arcadian dream. You naturally look for the fairy rings in the woods and meadows where the merry little elves dance throughout the joyous moonlit hours without a care to fret their lives. If working-men do in fact live here, think of the vast difference between their surroundings and those of their toiling brethren in the large towns. Sir Joseph being a member of the Society of Friends, we believe the noble principles and traditions of his faith will dispose him to make the lives of his dependents as free from care as possible. In the palmy days of the Guisbro' priory there was a leper hospital here. Improved conditions of life and sanitation have removed the necessity for such places. Though in the case of some of the old leper hospitals, as, for example, that of Sherburn, near Durham, the charter and endowments remain, and are administered as charities and dispensaries. Building, charter, and endowments have all gone with the leper, however, from Hutton.

It is not difficult to imagine the sea rolling in from Redcar right up to the Highcliffe range and away into the Stokesley plain. Roseberry would then be a magnificent promontory indeed. Eston, Marske and Skelton hills would form a triangle of small islands. But if Marske hill is ever to be an island the sea will have to hurry up, for the miners are tearing it to pieces to feed the iron monsters at Middlesbro' and make railways to spread civilisation and other things in Africa, India and China. Upleatham, one of the loveliest hamlets in England, is already in ruins, along with our little chapel where we suffered and made others endure the agony of a first attempt to preach. God bless the dear, kind souls, they did not ask for much, and had a word of encouragement to give. Quite fresh and audible to-day are the sympathetic groans with which the local preacher, the late Mr. James Dunning, punctuated the "very broken remarks."

The sea has certainly been here, not only at the base, but covering the high moorlands. Tons of marine fossils, cockles, mussels, cat's faces (so we called them), etc., have been dug out from under this very Highcliffe. What mighty cockles there were then, fifty times the bulk of our modern pigmy! I have heard a good Christian man affirm that as death came by the sin of Adam 6,000 years ago, therefore all the mineralised creatures, hidden fathoms beneath the surface, under many and various strata, could not possibly have died before that time. And another old miner declared, with the emphasis of unshaken conviction, that if such so-called fossils were really there before Adam's time they had never been living organisms, but that the Almighty had created them in stone. "Surely it is as easy," argued he, "for the Creator to make an image of living creatures in stone as to make the living creatures themselves." Quite true, old friend, and it may be a trifle easier; but did He? Counter arguments were useless; it was another case of,

"Nay, we are seven."

Such views of what was held to be essential to a right interpretation of the Word are probably now little more than faint echoes, or even memories. Let there be no bitter quarrel over such matters. "Knowledge and vital piety" are the two golden keys which will unlock the mysteries of the two books and show that they have never been at variance.

Three hundred years ago Sir Thomas Challoner opened out on these hill-sides the first alum works in England, but they have long since been abandoned as unprofitable. The huge pink-tinted shale hills at Belmont and Slapewath show their extent. Old mother nature is, however, inexhaustible; she invited her children to dig deeper and knock more persistently, and then rewarded them with her iron wealth. And when all this is used up she will open another door in her great storehouse whereby her sons may have work and bread. The waste products of fifty years ago and less are to-day a considerable source of employment and wealth. The old discarded alum shale may have its day of prosperity again. Who knows? There was a Spa at Slapewath which in its time was believed to have curative virtues. The mines have drained the water off and it is now dry. When they are worked out and forgotten it may come again. God rotates His blessings. Every loss is a gain, and every gain a loss.

The Cleveland miner has had a hard time of it now for many years, but his trade has brightened up a bit lately. The ore is about the poorest worked, but being near the great iron producing centre it commands a market. That centre is its creation, and it seems unnatural for the child to leave its maker to languish in want while it enriches another country by its importations. Competition is the secret of it all, and its loss is a greater gain to a larger number. Expansion, progress, salvation are only possible through sacrifice. The cross embodies a universal law of life to which there are no exceptions. Some of the royalties are worked out, and others nearly so; and in time Cleveland will be exhausted of its iron riches. Iron to make good blood, say the doctors, but it is the blood that is given to make the iron here. It is shocking to think of the men and lads that have been mangled under these hills. The Challoners, the Whartons, the Episcopal Church through its Commissioners, and others have added immensely to their income through the royalty rents. But how have the men been rewarded who have done this for them by dangerous and almost inhuman toil? Think of their slaving ten, eleven, and twelve days in dismal, wet places for thirty shillings, and often less! And remember, to do this many of them walk from two to five miles a day to and from their work. It has not always been the greed of the mine-owner which refused the poor fellows an advance of 1d. or 2d. per ton. Between them and their men there have been bitter feuds, but the real cause of their troubles is often the man or institution that holds royalty claims. To refer to another mining district for a moment, it is said that hundreds of thousands of pounds have been paid out of the Durham coal mines alone to support curates, vicars, canons, deans, churches, cathedrals and what not at the other end of the country. The amount of religious or other kind of work contributed to the weal of the community in return is best known to the recipients. It is a scandalous shame that labour should thus be handicapped and compelled to uphold institutions with which it has no direct relation. It was reported in the papers only recently that a dignitary of the Episcopal Church had said his official income was £2,000 per annum, and that he spent £3,000. And a fortunate man he was in having it to spend. If this divine has never heard of the widow's mite, let him read his New Testament more carefully, and cease his ostentatious prating about spending £1,000 per annum out of his private pocket. Never a man living between the north and south poles ought to draw £2,000 a year from taxed labour, as a minister of the Gospel, while labour is so ill-paid. How many have to live with their noses on the grindstone in order that gentlemen of this class may build their churches, and gull the simple by their charities.

"There's something in the world amiss, Shall be unriddled by and by."

The sooner the better, for it is high time the unriddling was begun in the matter of underpaid labour and hampered trade through excessive royalties. It is neither easy nor pleasant to write in this manner, but the injustice done to the workman, along with the snobbery and boastful benevolence of those who derive their substance from his toils and sufferings, make it imperative that some word should be said.

New Discoveries and Explorations in their Bearing on the Scriptures.

X.—THE MINER IN THE BOOK OF JOB.

BY ROBERT HIND.

THE difficulty of determining the exact date of the Book of Job, the country in which it was written, and the name of its author is sufficiently well known. Even to-day, notwithstanding the large results that have been obtained from biblical research, scholars refuse to speak on these matters with any degree of certainty. The whole question, indeed, is likely to remain hypothetical for some time to come. Still, little by little, fresh light is being brought to bear upon it, and every additional piece of information will be welcomed by those who have experienced the charm of this fascinating literary production, and had occasion to brood over the problems of which it treats. A recent number of the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund calls attention to the very minute and graphic account of the miner and his work contained in Job xxviii. The writer of the article, whilst he does not think that a study of this part of the book will settle the question of its date and authorship, is of the opinion that it should contribute somewhat to this end. Perhaps it should be noted that in this part of his argument Job does not discuss the nature of divine wisdom. Only in his closing sentence does he venture on a brief definition:—"Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding." Both the thought and phraseology here are so much like certain passages in the Book of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes that they cannot fail to suggest either that the Book of Job is by the same author, or, if by another, one of the two must have had access to the writings of the other. At least, the meaning of Job's philosophy of life is apparent; the highest wisdom is to live so as to obtain the highest moral results, and these can be realised only in so far as men allow the fear of God to restrain them from all evil, and to inspire them to noble conduct.

But the chief interest in the chapter lies, not in his brief and cogent summing up of his philosophy, but in the ingenious illustration he uses of the method by which men are likely to reach the conclusion he has adopted. This first argument is to the effect that the wisdom that will enable men to make the best use of life is not discoverable by any amount of cleverness and labour. And he seems here to have cast about in his mind to discover the best conceivable representation of intellectual ingenuity combining itself with hard, courageous, persevering toil. He discovers what he wants in the person of the miner, who, undaunted by difficulty and danger, seeks for precious metals in all manner of strange places; silver is not found in the surface soil of the field, but is hid in veins that strike down perpendicularly through the strata towards the earth's centre, the veins often taking curious turns, and again the silver thread ceases for yards and miles, so that it is difficult to find another beginning. Gold is not lying ready to be gathered in a refined state (v. 1). Iron, although, being more plentiful, is more easily found, has to be separated from the dust; and copper, embedded in the hard rock, can only be purified by fires that reduce the whole into a molten condition (v. 2). Into the natural caverns of the earth, deep and dark, man penetrates with his candles and lamps, in search of these precious metals (v. 3). And concluding that the object of his search may be found in the underworld where there have been no convulsions to rend the rocks and create caverns, he makes them for himself. He sinks a pit or opens the level drift into the mountain side (v. 4). Just at this point in his description the ancient writer gives a pathetic touch relating to certain conditions under which the miner toils. He brings into evidence the loneliness of the man's position. "He breaketh open a shaft away from where men sojourn; they are forgotten of the foot of the passer-by" (v. 4). In sinking the shaft he has cut through a layer of gold, a shot of silver without noticing it, but in passing up and down the sheen of it strikes his eye. It must not be lost, and so hanging on ropes fifty fathoms from daylight at the top, and fifty fathoms from the solid ground beneath, he plies his calling. "They hang afar from men, they swing to and fro" (v. 4). Then follows the passage—"As for the earth, out of it cometh bread; and underneath it is turned up as it were by fire. The stones thereof are the place of sapphires, and it hath dust of gold" (vv. 5, 6). By which is meant that the obvious use of the earth is to produce corn for bread and grass with which to feed cattle, but man is not satisfied that it should only thus serve him, "as it were by fire" "it is turned up," that is by some kind of blasting, and compelled to yield not food alone, but sapphires and gold. "That path no bird of prey knoweth, neither hath the falcon's eye seen it. The proud beasts have not trodden it, nor hath the fierce lion passed thereby" (vv. 7, 8). The eagle, the vulture, the falcon, the hawk, how keen is their vision, but the miner has seen what they have never looked upon, and even wild beasts, stalking for their prey, the lion and the tiger, although at times driven by stress of hunger have ventured into strange places, have not followed the miner in his explorations, brave as they are they will not venture where he has travelled. Nothing escapes him. The rock is as hard as flint, but he shatters it to atoms and grinds it to powder (v. 9). Deep and strong are laid the foundations of the mountains, but the miner compels them to give up their secrets (v. 9). He taps a hundred springs and rivers of water come in upon him, but he makes new rivers underground and so saves himself (v. 10). But he also uses the channels he has made in the rock to cleanse the ore. By infinite care and labour they are made watertight, and every nugget and grain of the precious metal is discovered (vv. 10, 11). Could a finer description of the miner's toil, his strong determination, his marvellous skill, his admirable courage be imagined? No difficulty is sufficient to prevent him from laying his hands on the metal. His intellect is strained to discover where it is; he risks life and limb to get it. The eagle, keen-sighted as it is, does not see what the miner discovers, and not the most courageous of wild beasts will brave the risks which he voluntarily undergoes. Job recognises in this man's ingenuity and readiness to toil in his search for what he desires, but even these qualities will not enable him to lay hold of Divine wisdom (v. 12).

This description of the miner's work is the most marvellous part of a marvellous chapter, but for the sake of completing the argument, the remaining sections may receive a passing notice. Superior skill and persevering labour will accomplish much for men, and the possession of fabulous wealth often will do still more. Can wisdom be bought with gold? In verses 13-19 the precious metals, gold and silver are named, and rare stones, corals and crystals, the onyx, the sapphire, the topaz, and the ruby are named, but the wealth they represent cannot teach a man wisdom.

Once more the patriarch changes his point of view and looks in another direction. Will a large and varied experience bring this valuable thing into his possession? From its very nature it might be thought that where skill and labour will fail and material wealth prove of no service, the years might be supposed to show a man how best to order his life. In verses 21 and 22 the whole range of human experience is covered by two brief statements. Verse 21 refers to the earthly life of men. Considering the large variety of circumstances in which they are placed, the joys that fall to their lot, the pains that they suffer, through their own sins, the sins of others, and from causes that are distant and hard to trace, it might be thought that the accumulated experience of the generations would teach men the high art of wise living. But "it is hid from the eyes of all living" (v. 21). To-day, at the end of the ages, folly is rampant. There are other than earthly experiences through which men pass. In the land of darkness and death they learn lessons to which the living are strangers. They are brought nearer to a knowledge of the truth on the subject in passing through the land of shadows than by any other merely natural means. It is possible for men to be thoughtless about it in health and prosperity, but as they pass away from the earth its value becomes evident even though its nature is not understood. "Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears" (v. 22).

In the last resort, true wisdom, the knowledge of the highest way of living for men, belongs to God alone (vv. 23-27). Man, called to act quickly, in emergencies, ever and anon in entirely new situations, cannot see all things at a glance, or measure to the utmost the issues of all that happens. He sees farther than the eagle, but how limited is the range of his vision after all! But God sees the ultimate issue of all from the beginning. Even the things that to men are most variable and uncertain, the wind and the rain, He governs by absolute unchanging law. Nay, even that current of lightning, so erratic in its course, so sudden in turning in a new direction, has had its zig-zag path through space cut out by Jehovah. With Him nothing is uncertain or accidental either in the material or moral realm.

Still there is comfort for the good man. He cannot hope ever to have the wisdom that will enable him to choose the path that he perceives will bring him the greatest blessedness. But the secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him. In cherishing the fear of God that produces perfect obedience lies man's highest wisdom, for though often he will only see one step before him, he will know by faith that this course at last will prove not only right, but wise and profitable.

Men Worth Remembering.

III.—REV. JOHN SMITH.

By REV. W. A. HAMMOND.

In the minister's vestry of the Temple, Great Yarmouth, is a tablet taken from the old Priory Plain Chapel, sacred to the memory of one of the grandest men who ever did service for the Church of Jesus Christ. In plain and simple language it sums up the character of one of our earliest workers, and records his abundant success in turning men to God.

In Memory of
JOHN SMITH,

Who for 27 years laboured as a Primitive Methodist Minister, with untiring energy, self-consuming zeal, and abundant success in the conversion of sinners.

Entered into rest

Dec. 7th, 1851, aged 50 years.

"The memory of the just is blessed."

"Old" John Smith, as he is affectionately and familiarly called by those who remember him, perhaps more to distinguish him from the present General Missionary Secretary, than to suggest any decrepitude or weakness of age, was a mighty worker for God in the Eastern Counties half a century ago, and no name is more fragrant in the memories of elderly members of our Church than his. How they delight to talk of his mighty spiritual power, his stirring appeals, his masterly rebuke of sin, and above all, of his wondrous power in prayer. There were giants in those days, and truly John Smith was one. Like a mighty soldier of the cross he swept over Norfolk during the thirties and forties, winning hundreds to Jesus Christ from the service of sin, and leaving his memorial behind him in the regenerated lives of many, some of whom continue to this day.

A tall, fine-looking, strongly-built man, with hair cut and brushed in thoroughly orthodox fashion; strong voice and piercing eye, he was a born leader of men. With natural courage that knew no fear, and an unmistakable consciousness of his Divine call to the Christian ministry, he was indeed valiant for the truth, and though scorn and opposition met him in his work, he could fearlessly say, "None of these things move me." That eye counted for much. Few could withstand its piercing look. It seemed to look one through and through. Before its steady gaze the fiercest opponent would tremble and quail, and when lighted up with the sacred glory of the Divine presence within, it flashed and glowed until large congregations were held spell-bound beneath its gaze. He had rare magnetic influence, which, sanctified by Divine grace, gave him immense power over large masses of people.

Like most of his companions in early missionary work he could preach. It would have been impossible for them to have accomplished such results as were accomplished if they could not. They knew how to attract the masses and hold them when they came. To arrest the attention of indifferent men, and arouse within them desires after good—to convince them of the folly and danger of sin, and turn them into paths of righteousness,—these were fine triumphs of oratorical power. Not so eloquent as Robert Key, nor so refined as Richard Howchin, nor so methodical as William Wainwright, John Smith was nevertheless a powerful preacher of the Divine Word, a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, presenting it with remarkable clearness and wonderful power. The three R's constituted the sum and substance of his preaching. Ruined by the Fall, redeemed by Christ, regenerated by the Spirit. These were the subjects of his ministry. Perhaps another ought to be added. For on no subject did he delight to dwell more than on the power of Faith. "Have faith in God" was a favourite text—faith in God's existence, faith in God's providence, faith in God's promises, faith in God's redemption, and as he preached on these lines he only set forth what he experienced and knew.

To Him God was a real ever-present Person. His promises were Yea and Amen to those who believed. No uncertainty lingered in his mind respecting their meaning or application. There they stood, and to those who grasped them, accepted them, they became real and were fulfilled. Preaching at Hemsby one night, he startled the congregation by saying, "Christian friends, we have frequently related to you instances of persons in various parts of the circuit to whose sudden conversion we have been eye- and ear-witnesses. Now some of you doubt the accuracy of these statements and others wonder how we can tell when people are converted, and a few desire to witness such scenes here. Well, listen to me, we are going to hold a prayer meeting in Mr. Harvey's house, and I believe God will convert sinners and save souls to-night. So you unbelievers and wonderers may all come and see for yourselves, then I hope you will be satisfied. And come, poor, desiring, penitent souls, for Jesus has got life and salvation to give you, yea, He will save this very night." It was a bold venture of faith. All the circumstances seemed against it. Primitive Methodism had not done much in the village. Hyper-Calvinism reigned supreme. Even our preaching services were held in the same building as the services of the Particular Baptists, the effect of which was that controversy rather than conversions was the order of the day. As the congregation left the chapel discussions on points of doctrine were started, and such knotty questions as redemption, limited or full, election, conditional or unconditional, were eagerly discussed, not always to the edification of the people. No wonder Mr. Smith's daring statement aroused excitement and surprise. He says, "It was like the shock of an earthquake." But away they went, from the Baptist chapel to the lowly cottage of Mr. Harvey. Some doubted, some were sceptical. Mr. Smith himself was beset with temptation. It was late, none would come, failure was certain. But still he clung to the promise, and resolutely held his confidence in God. The cottage was soon filled, prayer quickly commenced. For a quarter of an hour the conflict went on, as on Carmel's mount, then victory crowned the servants of God. "The Lord came down in the power of His Spirit, the place of His feet became glorious; some were smitten to the floor, others cried for mercy, and a few rejoiced in God, three or four received the Spirit of adoption, and two others received the blessing of perfect love." Thus victory was on Israel's side, the victory which overcometh the world—even faith.

Mr. Smith knew what it was to believe God, and delighted to dwell in all his preaching on the power of faith. But whatever subject was announced, or text chosen, all led up to the Cross. He found Christ as easily in the Pentateuch as in the Gospels. Preaching from Gen. i. 11-12, "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, and it was so," he had no difficulty in finding the gospel of Jesus Christ in the text. "Look at His almighty power, look at His wonderful working, and look at His unbounded love. God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son. If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by His life; and therefore we are commanded to be not faithless but believing. He is able to save to the uttermost. His blood cleanseth from all sin, and He pardoneth iniquity, transgression, and sin, and having all power in heaven and on earth, it does not depend on length of time, but on faith in Him." As all roads lead to London, so all texts pointed to Christ with these devoted men. Christ was indeed all and in all, and every sermon was a powerful presentation of Christ's saving power, whilst faith was the one requirement ever pressed as the condition of receiving all spiritual blessings.

But it was not so much in the pulpit as a preacher that he revealed his power, as in prayer. Like Elijah he was a man of prayer, of strong, urgent supplication. For hours he would wrestle in prayer with God, and like the Puritans of old, come forth from the chamber of devotion strong enough to do exploits for God. When he went to Lynn in 1831 the circuit reported 536 members, which was an increase of over 200 during the preceding three years, but Mr. Smith could not rest without further additions. It was a wide and extensive station, and when the brethren came together at the Quarterly Meeting, Mr. Smith asked them to covenant together with God that at least fifty souls should be won to Christ during the quarter. Covenanting together with God was no formal business. It was the most solemn and complete declaration of faith that could be made. "I think it is easier for you to believe than it is for me," said Mr. Smith to his wife one day as they sat in holy conversation, "and you are able to bring Divine influence down upon us. But," said he, "I never tell God that I believe but it stands for something." And truly it did. And when these men covenanted together with God, it stood for something—fifty souls in one quarter. Nothing less. And forth they went with this vow and covenant resting upon them, only to realise its fulfilment in successful service for Christ during the quarter. For when they gathered together at the end of the quarter, Mr. Smith himself reported that he had had the joy of witnessing seventy persons turn from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God; and that year an increase of members to the extent of 234 was reported to Conference. It was this power in prayer that made him strong. How he would wrestle in prayer, like Jacob wrestling with the angel, vehemently saying, "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me," and holding fast until the blessing that he wanted came. After wrestling thus in the old Priory Plain school-room one night, he went out, and as he crossed the market one of the friends present remarked to him, "Why, Mr. Smith, you stagger like a drunken man." "Yes, yes," was the reply, "drunk with the wine of the Kingdom," like the disciples on the day of Pentecost, "filled with the Spirit." John Smith's prayers are remembered more than his sermons. He seemed to live in the very presence of God, and whether in the public service or private devotions of the home he had power with God, and prevailed. After preaching one night at N. Creake, he went to spend the night with Mr. Thomas Walker, with whom the preachers stayed for many years, and before retiring to rest he said, "Let us pray." For more than an hour those two men wrestled in prayer, until Thomas Walker said, "We shall have it." "Have what?" said Mr. Smith. "The revival," replied Mr. Walker. "Yes," replied Mr. Smith. "You will have it, for it is begun." And surely there came to that circuit a mighty revival of religion through which hundreds were led into the enjoyment of saving grace.

One night clouds and darkness seemed to surround him. He was conducting a fellowship meeting in Priory Plain Chapel, Yarmouth. The meeting opened with power and liberty, but suddenly gloom and heaviness rested upon the meeting. There seemed to be no power. Mr. Smith had been expecting "a salvation meeting," but the meeting seemed to "get worse and worse, until the thought took possession of his mind, 'There'll be none saved to-night.'" This thought distressed him beyond measure. He gave himself to prayer, and presently a friend came to him and said, "That woman wants saving," and as he went to her, saying, "Woman, you will be saved," she fell down upon her knees, implored mercy, and in a few minutes rejoiced in the assurance of sins forgiven. Near by sat a man to whom he spoke, but from whom he received no answer. One of the friends near explained the reason by saying, "He cannot speak." "Never mind," said Mr. Smith, "God can make him feel," and as he spoke the man wrung his hands and smote his breast, whilst tears coursed quickly down his cheeks. Prayer was offered on his behalf, and strong faith exercised until the aspect of his face was changed, and joy lighted up his countenance instead of sorrow. Though he could not speak, he evidenced the change which had taken place within through trusting in Jesus Christ. Thus were the clouds scattered, and the victory of faith realised.

Perhaps his greatest power was in personal contact with men. Here his great magnetic influence stood him in good stead, and he seemed as though he could control men at his will. The glance of his eye cowered the mightiest opponent. The commanding authority of his voice overawed the most turbulent disturber, and the strange prophetic vision that seemed to be his, amazed and confounded many. He never thought of consequences when engaged in his Master's work; he was an ambassador for Christ, and above all else, he must be faithful. Visiting a farm-house in Norfolk, he was warned by the farmer that his son was a wayward boy, wicked and daring, and had no sympathy with praying people. "He knows you are coming," said the farmer, "and he says he shall have you on, but don't mind him. He is reckless, and will do as he likes, but don't let him trouble you." Soon the young free-lance came in, and with language more vigorous than polite, more vulgar than polished, saluted the newly-arrived preacher, and ended his rough welcome by saying, "Ah, well, never mind, let's shake hands." But he had reckoned without his host. He did not know the new-comer well enough. He had not rightly measured him. Accepting the proffered hand, Mr. Smith gripped it as in a blacksmith's vice, and looking at him straight with flashing eye, said, with steady and pathetic voice, "Let us pray." Father and son fell down upon their knees whilst Mr. Smith began to pray as few but he could do. The young man trembled with fear, wept hot, bitter tears, pleaded for forgiveness, and rose from his knees a better man than when he entered the house. It was useless to attempt to play with men like John Smith. Going to his appointment one day he overtook a man going along the same road. Instant in season and out of season, he began to talk with him, when the man confessed that he was unsaved, and would like to be saved. "If you are sincere and really anxious to be saved," said Mr. Smith, "God will save you before we reach the next milestone;" and with all his wondrous power he began to pray and urge the man to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. The man prayed too. Walking and praying until just before they reached the milestone on the road, the man shouted, "Hallelujah! Glory! He has done it. I'm saved, I'm saved." Thus intent upon the Master's business, in crowded congregations, or by the wayside, he was successful in bringing men to Christ. Six hundred and fifty added to the Lord on Yarmouth Circuit in three years, and yet he says, "Some places continued low and were never otherwise, and a few others declined." So that, like all earnest workers, he knew the pain and sorrow and humiliation of defeat at times, and was thrown into a very agony of soul because of it.

Born at Sound Heath, Wrenbury, near Nantwich, April 26, 1802, he was converted to God when seventeen years of age, under the early pioneers of Primitive Methodism who missioned Burland. Within four years of his conversion he was called out to travel by his native circuit. In 1820 he was appointed to Norwich Circuit in the newly formed Norwich District, and for twenty-two years rendered splendid service for Christ in the Eastern Counties. Twice he travelled at Norwich, Lynn, Yarmouth, and Fakenham, and once at Upwell, now Downham Circuit. It was whilst travelling at Yarmouth the second time that his health failed, and very quickly the end came. Thirteen months of severe prostration, and then the end. "You have done too much," said the doctor as he saw that nothing could save the ebbing life of the vigorous warrior. The strong man was bowed low. The mighty warrior was exhausted in the conflict. His herculean labours were enough to wear out the strongest man, and his intense struggling and wrestling with God in prayer must have drained his nervous energy. But if he died in the prime of life counting years only, it was not so when his work was measured. If it be true that "We live in deeds not years, in thoughts not breaths, In feelings not in figures on a dial"

then John Smith lived long. For into those fifty years he had put deeds of valour and devotion such as few men have done, he had felt such throbbings of thought and feeling and desire as few men know, and had rendered such service to the Church of Jesus Christ as few men can render. Robert Key said at his decease, "I feel as though a star of the first magnitude had fallen from its orbit, as though a great river had been dried up."

And many felt the same. The workman died, and was buried, but the work goes on. Societies that were formed under his ministry live and flourish to-day. Families whose forbears were lifted out of the gutter of sin and evil still stand connected with our Church, and render splendid service in many a Norfolk town and village. He rests from labour, but his works follow him. On Sunday, Dec. 7, 1851, he calmly passed away, and on the following Thursday, devout men carried him to his burial in Yarmouth Cemetery. To many still living his memory is exceedingly precious, and though nearly fifty years have passed away since he was laid to rest, yet

"He lives again
In minds made better by his presence."

THE PROMISE OF SPRING.

Tho' fickle Nature's moods and passions are,
In ev'ry gesture, sound, and look betray'd;
In smiles that burst o'er sea and land afar,
In sudden frowns that hide them both in shade,
We, who by such are gladdened or dismay'd,
But Hope, with Joy see alternate to-night
In her blue eyes whose soundless depths inlaid
Are with the sunset's peaceful, mellow light,
Telling of sorrow past, and happiness in sight.

So calm her aspect is, from Winter's grasp Released awhile. Altho', as if in pain,
At morn we heard her moan, and cry, and gasp,
To-night, with suffering hearts that may regain
That passiveness which in all such must reign
When tempests cease on common, wild, and lea,
On ev'ry upland and receding plain,
We see her smile as if in ecstasy,
And hear her murmur, "Spring is near—the Spring to be."

That murmur hear the flow'rs, and lift their heads
To listen—daisies, snowdrops, daffodils,
From lip to lip, from heart to heart it spreads,
And, lulling all to sleep, the west wind fills
The eve with whispers low; pulsating thrills
Of love thro' Nature pass, felt in the notes
Of thrush and wren that, by the purling rills
Mid swaying osiers, tune their warbling throats
To swell the lark's last strain which from the ether floats.

Spring, beauteous Spring! With all things do we smile
At thought of thee, and at a time like this
We think how human hearts might reconcile Themselves to suffer when the guerdon is Such rest and calm, such hope and perfect bliss,
O Life! O Light! O Immortality!
All, all are near! Is not the promise His?
Who in yon sky and ev'ry budding tree, Gives promise of the Spring—the Spring that is to be!

MIMICRY IN NATURE AND IN MAN.

MIMICRY is imposture in Nature," wrote the late Professor Drummond in his "Tropical Africa." Every tropical forest swarms with impostors and most accomplished hypocrites. Carlyle in his blackest visions of "shams and hum-bugs" among human kind, never saw anything so finished in hypocrisy as the naturalist finds in every tropical forest. There are to be seen thousands of creatures whose very appearance, down to the minutest spot and wrinkle, is an affront to truth, whose every attitude is a pose for a purpose, and whose whole life is a sustained lie. Before these masterpieces of deception the most ingenious of human impositions are vulgar and transparent. They are certainly most interesting deceivers, or may be, it is more euphonious to call their deceptions "contrivances of Nature." The clever contrivances are the outcome of keen contest for places, and to secure the best place a vast variety of contrivances have been developed. The weak by curious tricks make up for want of power. The defenceless adopt strange methods to make up for the absence of weapons of war. They personify the fortunate; they simulate the powerful; they evade their enemies by deceit and pretence by copying their appearance and movements, and when it suits their purpose they even "sham death." They get their living under false pretences; they escape destruction by swindling. They are, in fact, a set of fraudulent beings. This is all very shocking, no doubt, to the moralist, but, after all, it is not pleasure or amusement, but hard, stern necessity that drive them to circumvent their enemies and undertake these disguises. It is the only safeguard of their existence.

Protective resemblance is one of the commonest, as it is one of the most wonderful contrivances in Nature. A naturalist who has studied the bird-life of North Africa, says, "That even within the limits of a day's journey, the colours of the various forms of animal life change in tint in a very remarkable way. You may actually trace the gradation of colour as you travel slowly South. As the sandy soil of the desert is approached the various birds that live in the wilderness get browner in plumage, and as the desert itself is reached, these colours become even more emphasised. The Larks don a richer brown, the Marmot wears the same brown livery; whilst the Lizards have ceased to display the brilliant green skin which is common to them, and have assumed a coat of desert brown, and the snakes are the exact colour of the ground." From the sandy deserts of the sultry South to the snowy wastes of the Arctic regions the same universal law prevails. The animals that live among the snow are almost invariably white of dress. The Polar bear, the Arctic fox, the hare and the ermine are dressed in white. Our own Highland ptarmigan is a fine example of protective colouring, for its summer plumage so exactly harmonises with the lichencovered stones among which it delights to sit, that a person may walk through a flock of them without seeing a single bird; and, when it changes to white in winter, it is equally protected amid the snow which covers the mountains. In the tropical forests the birds are of brilliant green plumage exactly suited to the vegetation which they haunt. The beetles, moths, and butterflies are arrayed in hues similar to the plants and flowers, the bark and stones among which they live and on which they rest. The creatures of the sea conform to these laws equally well. The flat-fish are coloured on their upper surface exactly like the mud and sand on which they lie.

Many of the protective resemblances among insects read more like fairy-tales than sober truth. We have beetles that can only be distinguished by the closest scrutiny from seeds of plants. We have locusts and grasshoppers that bear marvellous resemblance to twigs and branches and dead sticks. We have butterflies with wings like leaves, every detail of their appearance faultlessly copied, even to the bits of mildew and fungus, and tiny holes, which poise so deftly on the branches as to defy discovery. We have ants which cut pieces out of leaves and carry them over their heads umbrella fashion so that it is almost impossible for their enemies to find them out. In the insect world alone there are thousands of these mimetic frauds being perpetrated in every forest. One of the most interesting and curious is the grass-stalk insects which take on the very form and colour of the grass; they live exclusively among the long grass which occurs in patches all over the forests and often reaches a height of eight or ten feet. During three-fourths of the year it is dried by the sun into a straw-yellow colour, and all the insects are painted to match, so that you cannot tell grass from insect nor insect from grass. They appear both alike. Another class of insects imitate twigs, sticks, and the smaller branches of shrubs. The commonest of these is the walking twig, three or four inches long, covered with bark apparently, and spotted all over with mould like the genuine branch. The imitation of bark here is one of the most perfect delusions in Nature; the delicate striation and the mould spots are reproduced exactly. A still more elaborate set of forms are those which represent leaves, broken sticks and flowers. "Our Buff-tip Moth (Pygæra bucephala) so contracts its wings that it looks exactly like a thick piece of broken stick, the yellow patch at the extremity of the wings giving the appearance of the freshly-broken end (Fig. 1). The Lappet Moth (Gastropacha quercii) when it rests so disposes its rich brown wings as to resemble, both in shape and colour, a dead leaf

FIG. 2. THE LAPPET MOTH.

(Fig. 2). The little Orange-tip Butterfly (Anthocharis cardamines), although so conspicuous on the wing, is perfectly concealed when resting in the evening in its favourite position among the flower-heads of the Wood Parsley (Anthriscus sylvestris)" (Fig. 3). Lichens, Mosses, and Fungi are also constantly taken as models by insects, and there is probably nothing in the vegetable kingdom, no knot, wart, nut, mould, scale, bract, thorn, or bark which has not its living counterpart in some animal form.

The instances of mimicry we have so far considered are all copies of inanimate objects. There is another class, even more marvellous, which copy animate creatures. There are flies which dress up like bees, so that they may enter the nests of these insects undetected and lay their eggs, where the larva, as soon as it is hatched, may feed on the larva of the bees. There are beetles that copy wasps, and locusts that pass off as beetles. We have perfectly harmless flies dressing up as venomous wasps, inspiring dread of a sting they do not possess, and spiders are known to imitate ants, profiting by the forgery in escaping their natural enemies.

In most cases the forgers are weak and helpless creatures which seek safety by these cunning artifices.

Dr. Macmillan suggests that, "In the New Testament there is a significant allusion to a case of vegetable mimicry in the parable of the Tares and Wheat. It is commonly accepted that the Tares of Scripture is the bearded darnel of our British fields. And between the bearded darnel and the wheat there is a very strong resemblance. They both belong to the tribe of Grasses, and to the special group of Triticinae, or wheat-like grasses. They are alike in structure, in mode and conditions of growth; when in the blade you cannot distinguish between them; and it is only when the fruit is formed that the impostor is detected by its smaller and darker ear. Hence the significance of Christ's command to the servants, 'Nay, lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them.' But though the appearance of the two plants is so remarkably similar, their properties are widely different. Wheat is the staff of life; it is wholesome, pleasant, strengthening, necessary. Darnel is poisonous, causing nausea, giddiness, difficulty of articulation, paralysis, and in extreme cases, even death. It is recorded that 'the whole of the inmates of the Sheffield workhouse were attacked, some years ago, with symptoms supposed to be produced by their oatmeal having been accidentally adulterated with darnel.' Resemblances such as that which subsists between tares and wheat are very numerous in all departments of Nature. Among plants we find poisonous species, belonging to the same genera as wholesome species. The Potato plant is a Solanum as well as the deadly Nightshade. The drastic Colocynth-gourd of the Dead Sea resembles the wholesome Prophet's Gourd so closely that on one remarkable occasion it was gathered and cooked by Elisha's servant in mistake for it, and had very nearly poisoned the party. Our edible mushrooms have to be picked out carefully from poisonous species that imitate their hue and form so closely as to deceive the unwary."

We find, alas! in crossing over into the spiritual and the human realm the same features of masquerading. Jacob stands out in history as the pre-eminent type of the deceiver—the man who put on the appearance of his brother Esau for the purpose of deceiving his father. We do not blame the insect for practising fraud in order that it may get the benefit of help and food, but we do blame the man who practises imposture and deception. They get credit for good actions that are simply "put on." All such moral frauds will certainly be discovered and exposed sooner or later. The veneer will peel off in the wear and tear of life; the varnish will blister; the wood that is painted to imitate iron, will rot; the whitewash will be easily discovered by the pitiless storm and stress of life; and the white garment that is simply "put on" to hide the ugliness beneath will one day be torn to rags. God has built His world on the principle that all hypocrisy shall be found out and punished.

The most terrible words in the Bible were uttered by Christ against the Pharisees who passed through the world getting praise of men on false pretences. They are of their father, the devil, and he has proved himself the most consummate mimic the universe has ever produced; he cannot create, he is never original, he is not even inventive—he is only imitative. "Sin is not a distinct creation, it is a violation of what God has created—an aberration from the true path, a depravation of what is proper to man's true nature and lineage; evil is not a generation, but a degeneration. The kingdom of darkness is a mimicry of the Kingdom of Light. One of the most comprehensive names given to Satan is Dei Simius, 'ape of God.' All that he has ever done has been a perverted imitation of the Divine economy. When God became Incarnate, Satan must imitate the incarnation, and so proceeds at once to inhabit human beings. They become 'possessed of the devil.' Satan is ever endeavouring to caricature the plans and purposes of God." In the sanctuary he transforms himself into an Angel of Light. The image of the King of Zion is minted in base metal; the hall-mark of Heaven is stamped on brass and lead; the trade-mark of the Divine Merchantman is assumed, to pass spiritual goods that are worthless. Satan throws a deceiving glamour over sin, shows the face of sensuality, which looks so wan and haggard in the daylight of truth, as beautiful in the flickering lamp-light of passion. "Sin rarely comes as ugliness, disease, death; in the masquerade of life it is the most cunning dissembler of all, flattering our vanity, confusing our judgment, firing our passions. A certain legend relates that one of the Biscayan mountains is accursed, and that Satan dwells there. The grass is withered, a sinister hue rests upon everything, the sounds are mournful, the mountain stands a dark phantom in the midst of bedecked nature. But this is not the method of evil. The mountain up which the devil took our Master, and up which he takes us, is bathed in purple; in its rocks gleam jewels, its dust is the dust of gold, in its clefts spring flowers, and from its crest is seen the vision of kingdoms and the glory of them. Things, principles, maxims, amusements, creeds, ideals, utterly base and vile are decked out by evil in fictitious splendour. We are never invited to sin; the things which have ruined generations are pressed upon us as nature, freedom, spirit, knowledge, gallantry, beauty, love, and we are deceived through the legerdmain of passion and fancy. The only safety for our blinded souls is in loving God's Holy Book. Here on the pages of prophets and Apostles is the euphrasy to purge our vision. The lover of that Book shall be delivered from the power of false ideals; he shall see light in God's light; he shall be kept from every false thing and every false way."

Live in the daily companionship of God's Son—earth's truest soul. No falsehood can for one moment abide His searching glance. All evil drops away at His presence. The false and rotten shrivel at His touch. What a penetrating glance He has! What a revealing vision! What a convicting word! The eye that looks on Him cannot be deceived. When evil would confuse you, the fashions of the world betray you, go to Christ and try all things by His example, His word, His Spirit. Do not resort to the "protective resemblance" so often practised in regard to character. For the sake of living unobserved some Christians try to disguise their Christian profession. They want to live in the shade, to be silent Christians, to be for ever dwelling under the fig-tree, hiding away from the valiant life that Christ calls us all to live. Do not resort to silence and secrecy. Your safety lies in the boldness of your testimony. You triumph over all by daring all. "The Reformation of the sixteenth century was saved by holy resolution and outspokenness. At the Diet of Spires the timid Melancthon was on the point of agreeing with the Catholic princes, that the Lutherans should be silent, preaching no more, writing no more, if they were guaranteed immunity from persecution. Luther wrote instantly to his nervous, temporising colleague, 'If you put the eagle in a sack, I will soon let him out.' Luther knew that the Word of God must not be bound, it must be boldly declared and defended; he overcame by the word of his testimony." The victory is ever with the martyr.

Let your light shine. Do not attempt to deny or conceal it. The pathway to the overcoming life is through your boldness of testimony. Do not dodge. Do not masquerade for the sake of immunity from notice, or criticism, or persecution. Live out in the open the full life of a Christian man.

"Stand up! Stand up for Jesus!
The trumpet call obey!
Forth to the mighty conflict,
In this His glorious day:
Ye that are men now serve Him,
Against unnumbered foes;
Your courage rise with danger,
And strength to strength oppose."

ALFRED J. CAMPBELL.

An Old Case of Persecution Retold.

II.—THE TRIAL AT LAW.

AS was stated at the conclusion of our former paper, Mr. Wood brought an action against Mr. Groom for assault. The case was heard at Chester, on April 27th, 1813, before the Hon. R. Dallas and F. Burton, Esq., Justices of the Peace. The plaintiff was represented by Mr. Cross and Mr. D. F. Jones; the defendant by the Attorney General and Mr. Williams. Damages were laid at £500.

Mr. D. F. Jones opened the case, stating that the defendant, on the 14th day of June, 1812, at Audlem, in the county of Chester, assaulted the plaintiff, and tore his clothes. The second count is for a common assault, and the damages were laid at £500.

Mr. Cross then addressed the jury. "The defendant," he said, "in this case was Mr. Groom, an attorney-at-law, resident at Audlem, and the assault, it would be satisfactorily proved, was committed, and under circumstances too of peculiar aggravation. On a Sunday, when the plaintiff was in the act of worshipping his God, with a number of others—when his situation alone should have sheltered him from the shafts of malevolence—it was then, and in such a situation, that he was attacked, dragged upon his knees, and thrown into a ditch; and this outrage against every law, religious and civil, was committed by the said Mr. Groom, attorney-at-law. It was not for him (Mr. Cross) to say whether this defendant was or was not acquainted with religion, and the respect it demanded from every one who professed himself a Christian, but it was understood by every one calling himself a man that when an individual, whether he be a Jew, a Turk, or sectary, was employed in worshipping the God that made him, he became an object of attention, of admiration, and veneration. The plaintiff, it would appear, with several of his neighbours, was occupied in religious duties, when this audacious crime was committed, and it was well for the defendant, if for the sake of example only, that he escaped without having violent hands laid on him. He is now called before a jury of his country, who will award to him that retribution which the unpardonable nature of his offence demanded. The defendant, it was evident, was fully aware of his culpability. It might have been supposed that he would have attempted to trump up something for a defence—to have pleaded a justification. But he had not done so; he had not thought fit to tamper with the feelings of the court, nor does it appear he ever had such a pretension, and he (Mr. Cross) was fully persuaded that the jury would amply recompense the plaintiff for the indignity, the degradation he had experienced from this attorney-at-law, this magistrates' clerk, and special constable for the occasion."

Thomas Millington, examined by Mr. D. F. Jones, said: "I live at Audlem, and know Mr. Wood. I was at the meeting on the 14th June, when he was there. They were praying and singing, as far as I heard. Wood prayed publicly on a bit of a bank a little out of the turnpike road, and there was no tumult nor disorder. I know Mr. Groom; he made his appearance that day, but cannot say whether he was drunk or sober. I might be three or four roods off. He came to Mr. Wood when he was giving out a hymn and said, 'Wm. Wood, I have a word with you. Have you a license?' Wood said, 'I have.' He then asked whether the ground was licensed. Wood answered, 'I have leave to come here.' Groom came a second time, when Wood was at prayers. Wood did not say anything to the defendant. When he came up he pushed several people down who were kneeling, and seized Wood, not gently, but in a very rough way, by the coat and dragged him whilst on his knees along the ground a good way, about a rood. He then loosed him. I saw no one interfere."

Cross-examined by Mr. Benyon.—"Wood is a carpenter. He sung and prayed in the open-air, but cannot say exactly what time. No one offered to resist. None as I heard said they would paint his face. Groom is what we call a lawyer, and Sir Corbet Corbet is what we call a justice of the peace. Wood was not damaged, but he was much put out of the way."

Re-examined by Mr. Jones.—"Wood was in the act of prayer; he was praying for his king and country."

This was the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Benyon addressed the jury. He said: "If ever there was a case little corresponding in point of fact the one now before the court is it. My friend, gentlemen, has addressed you with much solemnity and in a very grave manner. I do not mean to say he is not a grave man. He has launched out in a very long philippic against not allowing a man to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience. He will do me the credit to believe that toleration has not a warmer advocate than myself. Mankind are very various in worshipping God, and there we all agree in opinion; but there is another duty necessary—to conform to the laws of our country. Mr. Wood may be a respectable man and a very good preacher in the open-air. He is, perhaps, one of those that fancy they have a call. I will presume this fact. But I dare say Mr. Wood knows there is a certain Act called the Conventicle Act, and that he was offending by his conduct against its provisions. Gentlemen, the Act says that if a certain number of people assemble to pray in any road or field without a license they are liable to a punishment there awarded, which is that the preacher be fined £20 and his hearers 5s. each. This Mr. Wood, I again assert, very well knew, as he has subsequently paid it. And I will further assert that Mr. Wood by his conduct was transgressing the laws of his country. But my learned friend has adverted to the indignity suffered by Mr. Wood. He was taken forsooth by the collar, and has not his own witness declared he suffered no harm? Gentlemen, if in this case you were to give the plaintiff a farthing damages, I am sure he will be handsomely remunerated; it is as much as he can expect. As we lawyers say, he ought to have come into court with clean hands, as an innocent man; but he has not proved his case. His own witness has declared he was not injured. His lordship will dispose of the case without troubling you; but if you should have to decide, I again say one farthing damages is sufficient. I am sure you will think it enough. In my opinion a man who has broken the laws comes with a very ill grace into court to assert he was preaching and praying. I do not know that Groom has any particular zeal; but Sir Corbet Corbet, a very active magistrate, having thought proper to stop illegal meetings, he was employed to put the laws in force. He was specially appointed for the occasion, as constable, under the provisions of the Conventicle Act; and in the execution of his office he did not go one jot further than his warrant specified; that will be his justification, and according to the 24th King George II. it is clear that no action can be brought against Mr. Groom, who acted in obedience to a legal authority."

Mr. J. Groom.—"I am nephew to Mr. Groom (the warrant was handed up to him). I know the handwriting of Sir Corbet Corbet. This is his writing. I mean the signature. Sir Corbet is an acting magistrate for Cheshire, Staffordshire, and Shropshire."

Cross-examined by Mr. Cross.—"I am a nephew of Mr. Groom, and his confidential clerk. Nothing passes in his office without my knowledge. I was present at part of the affair, but heard nothing but singing from the people. I did not see Mr. Groom produce his warrant, as I was at a distance, thirty or forty yards. Did not see him bring the man out of the crowd, nor did I hear him say anything about his warrant. They had just done singing when Mr. Groom and the rector came up. I do not know what goods of Wood's were sold, but £20 were levied upon him, and a bill of costs besides, by direction of Sir C. Corbet. I never saw nor heard of the warrant till yesterday (Monday)."

Re-examined by Mr. Williams.—"Wood stood on a bench or stool, and if Mr. Groom had gone to Wood I could not possibly have seen him on account of the crowd. Mr. Groom was out of the road in less than ten minutes. I did not see any of the crowd come near Mr. Groom."

The warrant was put in here. It stated that notice of a meeting contrary to the Conventicle Act had been given, it authorises Groom and the constables of Audlem to certify themselves of the time and place, to give notice to Wood and the other persons assembled that it was unlawful, that if they did not disperse and any riot should take place, then to convey Wood and the others so conducting themselves before Sir Corbet Corbet, or any other of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, to be dealt with according to law. It was addressed particularly to Mr. Groom, appointing him special constable for its execution, on complaint of the minister, the Rev. Mr. Breakspear. It was signed by Sir Corbet Corbet, and dated at Addeley, 13th June, 1812.

Cumson, constable of Audlem, was with Mr. Groom at the bank, but was not near him, to hear what was said. "I heard Mr. Groom say to Wood, 'I'll put you in the hands of a constable,' and afterwards, 'I am a constable myself,' and then it was that Mr. Groom brought Wood out. I heard somebody say, meaning Mr. Groom, 'Mob him.' The people altogether might amount to about 100. Mr. Groom went to the crowd and back again with a pen and ink, as if taking names down. Mr. Wood lives in the township of Audlem."

Mr. Cross said: "My lords, Wood demanded to see the warrant, which was never produced, and which, in fact, I will contend, instead of being written before the day in question, was not in existence till lately."

Judge Dallas: "The warrant should certainly have been produced to Wood. How did he know under what authority Groom acted?"

Mr. Cross addressed the jury to the following effect: "Gentlemen of the jury, my learned friend has adverted to the gravity with which I have treated this most serious subject. Yet I will maintain that I should have thought myself doing an act of injustice to my feelings had I submitted my ideas on the question to your consideration in any other mode. Gentlemen, it has been contended that the plaintiff was doing an unlawful act. I deny the assertion. It is not forbidden. There was, I will own, an Act in force for the suppression of conventicles, but the enlightened wisdom of Parliament has thought proper to repeal it. This Act was instituted in the reign of Charles II., and it was then, perhaps, rendered necessary by the perturbed state of the times. It enacted that if any person was found preaching to more than five people he should forfeit the sum of £20. But, gentlemen, in this instance there is no proof of preaching; the plaintiff and his friends were only singing and praying. Let us now look to the proofs of the reputed warrant. If it was signed on the day previous to the affair, would not the defendant have told the circumstances to those about him—would not his confidential clerk have known the circumstances? There is no tittle of evidence to show the fact; and the real state of the case is, this said Mr. Groom, attorney-at-law, clerk to the magistrates, and special constable for the time being, has come into court without anything but assertions, and those not of the most creditable description. Gentlemen, the defendant cannot plead ignorance in this affair; he seems pretty well acquainted with the law in many respects, and it is not improbable that he obtained the signature to this warrant, since the attack on the plaintiff, by drawing it out himself, and laying it before Sir Corbet Corbet among a variety of other papers. In this manner, gentlemen, it appears to me the signature of the magistrate might have been obtained. In considering the damages, gentlemen, it is not necessary for you to consider the bodily injury sustained by the plaintiff. Did he not suffer a poignant mental injury—an injury doubly severe to a man of feeling? I hope by the damages you will give you will make this attorney know that the rights and liberties of a British subject are not to be invaded by the hand of tyranny and oppression, and that when in the presence of his Maker, his duty obliges him not to manufacture warrants and distresses to attack the defenceless and unprepared, but to deal justly to all men, and instead of violating the Sabbath, to attend public worship himself."

The Chief Justice summed up with his accustomed perspicuity. He adverted to the improper use made by Groom of his authority, and thought his situation should have taught him better. His lordship then alluded to the warrant. Groom should have shown in what manner he was empowered to act; the expression made use of by the defendant, "I'll put you in the hands of a constable," was extraordinary to come from a man who was specially appointed for the occasion. His lordship said it was unnecessary for him to go at length into the case, and he thought it more desirable to know from the jury whether they thought the defendant had shown the plaintiff his authority as a constable.

Foreman of the Jury.—"My lord, we think Wood did not know that Groom was a constable."

Chief Justice.—"I leave the degree of damages entirely to your own consideration. The defendant should know that a man praying for his king and country is not to be insulted with impunity."

The jury retired a few seconds, and brought in the following verdict: We give the plaintiff £200 damages.

This verdict was a severe blow to the persecutors, but it was resolved to continue the struggle, and notice was at once lodged of an appeal to the King's Bench, and on May 5th, 1813, a motion was made to set aside the verdict. The case was argued, (1) That the damages were excessive. (2) That the possession of a warrant, although not officially notified, was sufficient for a general justification. (3) That being a special constable was, although the fact was not stated, a special justification. The report of this stage of the trial gives this extract from the summing up of the Lord Chief Justice:—

"Lord Ellenborough observed that the only question appeared to be whether the special constable had acted regularly in not showing the warrant as the authority on which he acted, which it appeared in evidence he had not done. Groom was not a regular constable, or head-borough, and therefore it was incumbent on him to show that he was a special constable, indeed the warrant directed him so to proceed. So, however, he had not acted, but had proceeded to drag the minister from amongst his neighbours at a moment when that person was on his knees at prayer. The conduct of Groom, his discretion in proceeding as he had done, even though he might have a warrant to seize provided he met with obstruction and a disposition to riot, became fair questions for the jury. Groom's particular behaviour certainly made it a question whether he had been clothed with sufficient authority to act as he had done towards Wood, dragging him at such a moment, as he did, out of the assembly, he being in the act of prayer, and therefore evincing nothing like a disposition to riot or to promote riot. His lordship directed the counsel to read the warrant under which the special constable, Groom, had acted. Mr. Benyon read the warrant. It was directed to John Groom, appointing him special constable, authorising him to make inquiries as to the time of meeting, etc., and should he find that the place of meeting was not duly registered according to Act of Parliament, he was to inform Wood that it was not a legal meeting; that he, Mr. Groom, had authority, and to show it, to direct him to disperse; and that, in case there was anything like riot, he was to take him (Wood) into custody.

"Mr. Justice Bailey.—'Was any notification, in the first instance, made to Wood by Groom, that he was assembling irregularly and illegally?'

"Mr. Benyon.—'There certainly was no evidence of any such notification on the trial.'

"Lord Ellenborough.—'Then it seems that Groom did nothing, but immediately on entering the meeting, march up to Wood to seize him, and to drag him out of the meeting, instead of first showing on what authority he entered the place at all, and then desiring them to disperse, as the meeting was illegal.'

"Mr. Benyon.—'But a disposition to riot was evinced, for some present called out, "Mob him!" meaning Groom, and he then went up to Wood and seized him, as one was to be answerable for all.'

"Lord Ellenborough.—'Oh! no. God forbid! The man might be acting under a mistaken notion of the law; and surely it was right, in the first place, to announce the authority of the special constable, and the illegality of the meeting. Groom did not so act, but immediately committed a gross outrage on the minister, and the failure in not showing the warrant deprived him of the power of any special justification. I am afraid the court cannot assist you.'

"Mr. Benyon.—'But, my lord, the damages are very great—too great for any such proceedings on the part of Groom.’

“Lord Ellenborough.—‘Why, I do not know that, considering the nature of the outrage. I remember the case of a gentleman, an officer, who appeared in the box of a playhouse in a foreign uniform, and being taken for a footman by some person in the same box, he was desired to leave it, it being thought that he was not in his proper place. He objected, and some words ensued, and he was struck lightly on the head with a cane. He brought his action against the person who so struck him, and though he received no material personal injury, the jury gave him two hundred pounds. The circumstances in that case, as in the present, guided the jury. The case made by the learned counsel is certainly not of that outrageous kind which could justify the court in exercising its discretion, the only discretion it has herein, to grant a new trial.’ Rule Nisi refused.”

The result of this brilliant victory for freedom of worship was, that the power of the oppressor was broken, and Groom shortly after left the place. Other kindred spirits were made to feel that there was a power outside the bounds of their petty kingdom which would not allow a peaceable company of law-abiding citizens to be molested to gratify a bigoted representative of an intolerant church establishment. The little band of Methodists took fresh courage, and persevered in their endeavours to arouse their spiritually indifferent neighbours. Mr. Wood continued to interest himself in all evangelistic work in the locality, and tradition says that he was one of the most ardent co-workers with the founders of our Church in the village. It may be only a coincidence that our present chapel and school are very near the spot on which he was praying when he was dragged to the ground by Mr. Groom.

JOHN T. HORNE.

An Eastertide Sermon in Art.

“CHRIST OR BARABBAS?”

WHILST visiting the Royal Academy Exhibition Dean Farrar was led to think and speak of the brotherhood of the artist, the author, and the preacher. He expressed himself by saying: “The artist and the man of letters, though they differ in their gifts and in their methods, are essentially united in feeling and in purpose. They appeal to the same emotions to enforce the same lesson, they illustrate the same truths, they labour for the same objects. The common aim of both is the emancipation and the free development of our spiritual nature. The humblest artist may claim that he belongs to the same great brotherhood of those who have consistently laboured to cheer, to bless, and to elevate mankind.” In speaking of the influence of the painters of pathetic and Scriptural subjects who stimulate those who are endeavouring to shed light and beauty on the mingled hopes and fears, and the duties and sorrows of human life, he further said: “If even the preacher and the divine may claim any part in the domain of letters, they too look to the artist for the aid and inspiration which they in their turn lend to him. Which of us can ever read the words, ‘These are the wounds with which I was wounded in the house of my friends,’ or ‘Behold, I stand at the door and knock,’ without being helped to realise their meaning in the pathetic allegories of Mr. Millais and Mr. Holman Hunt?”

For over four hundred years after Christ’s departure from the world, the early Christians were strongly opposed to the representation in art of the human Christ; and consequently no great picture of the Divine Man was given to the world. In those bygone centuries the followers of the Nazarene would have regarded it as lacking in reverence, if not as an instance of actual profanity, for any artist to have had the presumption to have painted Christ from a purely human aspect. This deep-rooted reserve manifested by the members of the Christian Church of the first centuries was based upon their intense reverence for that which was sacred, and their ardent spirituality of life. Another objection of theirs to the pictorial representation of the Christ was the outcome of their elevated conception of the Messiah, whom they regarded after the ascension, not simply as “the Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief,” but as the enthroned, all-conquering King who had sat down on the Father’s right hand. With the dawn of the eighth century, however, the Christian Church had partially outgrown its reserve, and had unshackled itself from its prejudice; but it was not until the later years of the Renaissance period that any realistic picture of the Christ appeared.

Dean Farrar, in his book entitled, "The Life of Christ in Art," thus explains the aversion of the primitive Christians. He says: "The common and almost universal and exclusive custom of representing Him in defeat and anguish, in ghastliness and torture, was not only unknown to the Christians of the first four centuries, but would have been abhorred and repudiated by them. It was a revolution complete and absolute from the days when joy, abounding gladness, fervid exultation, an almost intoxication of inspiring enthusiasm, was as much a characteristic of Christianity as simplicity of heart. It was due to the gloom, despondency, and misery which afflicted later centuries, and to the exaggerated self-macerating Manichean asceticism which was only redeemed from being as unmitigated a curse as it was a frightful error by the sincerity of those who thought that thereby they were pleasing God. But under this influence the smile which irradiates the boyish face of the Christ of the Catacombs fades away more and more disastrously as the ages go on, and is changed into an expression of misery and wrath."

The numerous paintings of Christ before Annas, Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate, have been recently augmented by the celebrated picture entitled, "Christ or Barabbas?" It is the production of Mr. Davenport Bates, of Stockport, and was publicly exhibited for the first time at the Exchange Buildings, Birmingham, in August, 1898. It is not only the largest of Mr. Bates' pictures, but it is pronounced to be larger in the actual size of canvas than any other production from the brush of a British artist. It is interesting to note that the canvas is twenty-two feet in length, and eleven feet in height. It includes a pictorial representation of nearly one hundred persons who are grouped around the central figures, and contribute to the general effectiveness and completeness of the scene. This beautiful work of art, which some have declared to be the greatest painting of the century, is the outcome of years of anxious thought, patient research, and careful reading on the part of the rising artist.

A connoisseur remarks: "As to the artist's possession of genius, those who look upon this picture will have no hesitation in saying that it is the work of no ordinary man; for there is a something about it which appeals to our higher nature. We are actually standing with the Jews and Romans in the Hall of Judgment; we can in imagination hear the clink of the gyves with which Barabbas is bound; we can hear the sobbing of the heart-broken Magdalene, and we listen for Pilate to ask the question, the answer to which changed the history of the world, 'Whom will ye that I release unto you, Barabbas, or Jesus, which is called Christ?'"

A minister who was privileged to see the gigantic painting before it was removed from the studio at Stockport, referred to it in the pulpit in the following eulogistic manner: "When I entered the room and beheld this elaborate work of art, occupying the whole of one end of the room, and crowded with human figures, it seemed like an apparition that had sprung up in the night. I could not help standing in wonderment before it. And it is destined, I believe, to be viewed with wonder and admiration by many thousands. I think it a very remarkable production, and I prophesy for it the praise of thousands."

For the benefit of those who are interested in the outer life of the young artist, who has already won a place and name in the world of art, Mr. Geoffrey Penworth, of Manchester, has written a short biographical sketch. It appears that although the artist's family were connected with Stockport, yet Mr. Frederick Davenport Bates was born in the commercial city of Manchester in the year 1867. After leaving school he was indentured for a term of years as a draughtsman to a firm of Manchester engineers, who manifested a kindly interest in the artistic tastes of their aspiring apprentice. At the time and expense of his employers, valuable paintings, beautiful porcelains, and choice exotics were placed at the disposal of the youthful artist. He was early impressed with the importance of mastering all technicalities, and of acquiring a complete accuracy in the varied detail of drawing.

At the early age of twenty-one Mr. Davenport Bates became a student at the Academie Julien, Paris, and was favoured with having the leading French professors as his art teachers. From France he removed to Antwerp, and studied under the mastership of the distinguished Verlat. During his residence in this Continental city his genius was recognised by his being elected a pensionnaire of the celebrated Academie des Beaux Arts, Antwerp, which entitled him to the privilege of using a Government studio, and also of selecting his professors from any of the Brussels' Royal Artists. Mr. Bates was the first Englishman who secured these greatly-coveted honours in the realm of Continental art; and he accordingly selected MM. De Vriendt and Van der Oudera, the two leading painters of Scriptural subjects, as his masters.

Davenport Bates, during his residence in Continental cities, formed the determination to follow the early Flemish masters, and to produce works of art on a large scale. His "Pandora" and "Adrift," which were two of his early paintings, and which were exhibited in Antwerp, rank with the large canvas class, and were favourably received by the art-loving Frank. In 1889, he followed the example of Rubens' well-known masterpiece, and produced a series of pictures depicting the scenes in "The Stations of the Cross."

After returning to England, he determined to give to the world his great picture of "Christ or Barabbas?" which for some time had been simmering in his mind. In the year 1895, Mr. Bates started on a protracted tour through Eastern lands, for the purpose of familiarising himself with the stereotyped customs of the Orientals, so as to be enabled to give a faithful representation and true setting to the varied characters introduced into his great painting of the scene in the Judgment Hall. His wanderings in Bible Lands led him through Palestine, Egypt, Constantinople, the ports of the Black Sea, and the Mediterranean islands. Upon his return to Lancashire in 1896 he had a complete set of sketches of Eastern life, character, and architecture, which were utilised in his notable painting. Whilst staying at Cairo he painted "For Pity's sake," in which he represents a fine, brown-faced, blind Arab standing by a wall, and soliciting alms from the friendly passers-by. By his side stands, as a guardian angel, a childish, frolicsome, brown young beauty of the desert. Last year he painted "The Birth of the Rainbow," which is highly eulogised as being a "pictorial essay, and a purely imaginative invention."

This notable painting of the Divine tragedy depicts a great and well-known scene in the development of human redemption, rather than a mere pictorial likeness of the Christ of God. As a painting of Jesus Christ, the artist has faithfully striven to follow the historical narratives of the gospels, without attempting, as some Continental artists have done, to rob the Son of God of His Divine Glory, and to reduce Him to the ordinary level of mortal man. The picture is wider in its teaching than a mere representation of the sorrows of the suffering Saviour. Although the Christ is the central figure of the painting, yet He is not "the absorbing subject of the whole." The artist, without minimising the minor characters, gives due prominence to the Divine dignity of the Son of God. The entire conception is bold, and includes a faithful portrayal of the facial emotions and bodily gestures of the principal participants and spectators of the great trial at the Bar of Pontius Pilate, the Roman Governor of the province of Judæa.

The specific time is the all-important moment when the vacillating Pilate tries to shield himself from official responsibility by asking the Chief Priests, the Scribes, the Pharisees, and the crowd, whom he, in accordance with the old-fashioned custom of the yearly feast of the Passover, should release, "Barabbas, or Jesus, which is called Christ?"

The scene is the Prætorium, or Roman Judgment Hall, in which a motley concourse of people fill all the available standing space in the spacious portico, the hall, and behind the tribune. The crowd is pictured as being unusually excited, and expresses the anger which disturbs their inner peace, by shouts and shrieks, and with the waving of hands and the clenching of fists. Jewish women are being jostled and put in peril of being trodden under foot, yet they are straining their necks, and eagerly watching the varying movements of the strange proceedings. A detachment of Roman soldiers clad in glittering mail and armed with sharp-pointed spears, are vainly trying to keep the people in check. The beauty of the picture, from an artistic standpoint, is increased by the artist causing the genial light of the glowing Eastern slanting sun to flash on the marble floor and steps of the Prætorium, to sparkle on the spears and helmets of the soldiery, and to give strength to the diversified countenances of the great throng. With striking effect, the artist has represented the side-door of the Judgment Hall as being open, through which may be seen the rough outline of the ancient city of Jerusalem, with its towers, minarets, and roofs mirrored with golden sunshine, and the background purpled with the deep-vaulted blue sky.

In glancing at the characters, an art-critic asserts "That Davenport Bates' figure of Christ is in many respects as beautiful as it is remarkable. It has about it none of the wild anguish of Dürer, and does not recall the painful characteristics of early German art. Though the feeling is strong, it is reverent and sincere." The Christ is represented as a prisoner clad in a long, loose, white, flowing robe, and standing upon the beautiful marble floor of the Judgment Hall of the Cæsars. The stalwart Roman soldiers protect Him from the howling Jewish mob who are wildly clamouring for His death on the Cross. "The central figure is a striking conception of the incarnate God. There is a beautiful pose, full of grand humility, and clothed with perfect grace. The slender shape, tall, stately in its very resignation, stands out from the crowd, as one calm, white soul apart from a heated, surging, mundane throng. There is something more than mortal in that simple shape; something suggestive of the Divine majesty within the half-bared breast; yet His sunken eyes, His poor, bound, emaciated hands, speak of the bodily pain and weariness He bore. Though His grandeur is unmoved, yet His humanity, it is plain, lies heavily upon Him, and the angelic majesty of the face shines through all its pain. The great, dark, deep-set eyes look out from under a high forehead, shining white in the light of the early sun. The eyes are fixed in a rapt gaze, half sad, yet bright and passionate, as if seeing through all the mean surroundings of His earthly person the nearing of a great Beyond. It is a clever suggestion of the Saviour's disregard of His persecutors' jibes at the time of His condemnation."

The second central figure is the robber chieftain, Barabbas. It is said "that from an artistic point of view his figure is probably the best of the principals. It is a splendid attitude that the artist has caught, and introduces to the picture a life and an excitement which few treatments of the subject have ever secured by apt and legitimate means. Barabbas, a picture of dreadful apprehension, forms a powerful contrast with the white-stoled, untrembling Christ." Barabbas is being brought by two strong soldiers, and there is a look of inquiry upon his face as to the cause of his sudden and unexpected call from the prison cell. With the exception of a rude cloth hung around his loins, the body is nude. His breast appears to heave with excitement, his hands are manacled and severely clenched, his head is covered with unkempt and shaggy hair, and his eyes are blinking with the light of day.

"WHEN PILATE SAW THAT HE COULD PREVAIL NOTHING, BUT THAT RATHER A TUMULT WAS MADE, HE TOOK WATER, AND WASHED HIS HANDS BEFORE THE MULTITUDE, SAYING, I AM INNOCENT OF THE BLOOD OF THIS JUST PERSON:
SEE YE TO IT. . . THEN RELEASED HE BARABBAS UNTO THEM."

Pilate is robed in white, and is represented as a young man of some dignity and will-power. In the foreground is the Virgin Mother in matronly grace, bravely supporting the grief-stricken Mary of Magdala, whose haggard countenance is centred upon the Divine Prisoner. The Apostle John and Nicodemus are standing near, with sad, inquiring eagerness stamped upon their intelligent faces. Judas the Apostate, horror-stricken, in his preparation for flight, takes a backward, lingering glance at the Master he has betrayed. The Scribes are represented as men of thoughtful distinction, two of whom are engaged in an animated discussion, probably respecting the traitor who has given back the pieces of silver. Caiaphas, clad in luxurious robes of office, stands between Jesus and the judge.

Over the shoulder of the High Priest appears the cynical face of Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas.

With marked effect, and most fittingly, the artist has introduced a child into his painting. Jesus was the friend of little children, they furnished Him with an object lesson on the nature of the Kingdom of heaven. The little child stands by its mother, on the inner fringe of the persecuting crowd, and almost at the feet of Caiaphas. A childish sense of wonderment is stamped upon its eager features. Its perfect innocence is a great relief and contrast to the craft and guile of the accusers of the Christ and the infuriated rioters.

The painting is a powerful sermon, and forcefully illustrates the doings of the first Eastertide, which has transformed the history of the world. The painting deserves a widespread public appreciation, and, doubtless, its silent message will appeal to the inner consciousness of thousands of devout beholders, and stimulate them to a deeper devotion for the Christ of Nazareth.

We have, for obvious reasons, found it impracticable to furnish our readers with a reproduction of the notable picture we have attempted to describe. Another work of art, however, of no mean order, though on a different medium, sets forth the same subject, and this we have pleasure in giving on the preceding page. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

Primitive Methodism and the Temperance Reformation in England.

IV.—JUVENILE TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETIES.

THE first Temperance reformers were impressed with the importance of giving attention to the young. They felt that it was a grand thing to reclaim drunkards, but a grander thing to prevent young people from becoming drunkards. They recognised that it was good to give up drinking, but better never to begin. Therefore, in the early stages of the movement, some of the leaders gathered young people together, and talked to them of the evils of intemperance and the blessings of sobriety, and here and there, societies composed exclusively of young people were formed.

Early in the year 1834, the Preston Youths' Temperance Society was established. Two Primitive Methodists, Mr. George Toulmin and Mr. Thomas

Walmsley, were amongst the founders. The inaugural meeting was held on the 18th of April, 1834, and 101 youths took the pledge of total abstinence for life. The Preston Temperance Society at its meeting on September 26th, 1833 had adopted total abstinence as an alternative pledge for one year, but it was not until 1835 that it became purely a total abstinence society. So that the Youths' Temperance Society, as a strictly total abstinence society, takes the priority. Mr. Dearden in his History says, "This was the first exclusive teetotal society in England."

"At this time," (April, 1834), writes Mr. Thomas Walmsley, "George Toulmin and myself were connected with the Primitive Methodist Sunday School in Lawson Street. . . . I and my beloved friend, George Toulmin, who was always filled with a desire to live an exemplary and useful life, and who was the secretary of the Sunday School, often talked over the temperance question, and felt that the great point which would have to be aimed at would be to train the young to lead sober and godly lives, to instil into their minds the grave evils which befall those who take intoxicants, and to band them together in a society, where they should mutually exhort and help one another to steadfastness of purpose and pledge." They brought the subject before the school. There was no opposition, but all who were present did not speak or vote in favour, and no wonder, for total abstinence was at that time a rarity. A resolution, moved by Mr. Toulmin, and seconded by Mr. Walmsley, for the formation of a Juvenile Temperance Society in connection with that Sunday School, to be based on total abstinence, was carried. A committee was appointed, and the work began under the leadership of the two young men just named. The young people became interested, and attended the meetings with great regularity, and the pledge was strictly enforced as a condition of membership. The meetings were not entertainments got up to amuse the young people, but meetings for instruction in the principles of temperance and godliness, and many who, when they became men and women, occupied respectable positions in life, were not slow to acknowledge their indebtedness to the teaching and inspiration they received at them. At one time all the teachers were abstainers, and the school was known as the Teetotal School.

"This, (quoting from a pamphlet, "The First Juvenile Temperance Society," published in 1892, by the President of the Preston and District Band of Hope Union), "I believe, was the first Band of Hope formed. Certainly it was the first Total Society started in connection with a Sunday School, and hence, I think, the fact deserves putting on permanent record." The society has been continued, and there is still a Band of Hope connected with the school, which was transferred to Saul Street when the new premises were erected. Hugh Bourne attended one of its meetings when on one of his visits to the town, and entered his name in the pledge book, but some years since, some unscrupulous collector of autographs cut it out. Soon after an Adult Society was begun in connection with the Church, one of the first, if not the first, associated with a Christian Church.

Winskill, in his "History of the Temperance Movement and Its Workers," writes: "George Toulmin and Thomas Walmsley were two of the founders of the first Sunday School Total Abstinence Society, which met in the Lawson Street Sunday School, Preston. George Toulmin was present on the night when Joseph Livesey first preached total abstinence (1832) in Lawson Street Primitive Methodist Chapel, and as a youth of seventeen years of age he went forward and appended his name to the pledge." He was brought up in our Sunday School, and, when quite a youth, became its secretary, and took a general interest in the welfare of the Church. From the offices he held, and the position he took, we infer that, like his friend and companion, Mr. Walmsley, he was a member. His wife was also a Primitive Methodist, and his sister was married to the Rev. Robert Hill, one of our ministers. He became the proprietor of the Preston Guardian and other journals, member of the Town Council, and Borough Magistrate. His tongue, his pen, and his journals were at the service of every good cause. He attained to great influence in the life of the town and district, and was greatly respected. He remained true to his temperance principles, and to his Christian faith. He was born October 11th, 1815, and died February 7th, 1888.

Thomas Walmsley was born October 10th, 1815. His father was a hand-loom weaver, and had sometimes great difficulty in keeping the family from want. Thomas had to go to work when he was eight, and his wages were twopence per day. All the education he received was in the Sunday School and in a night school. He afterwards became a shoemaker, and lastly, an estate agent. He was a scholar and a teacher in our Lawson Street School, and a member of our Church. Mr. Livesey, in his autobiography, speaks of George Toulmin and Thomas Walmsley as two of those who were "warmly devoted to the cause, and served it faithfully as speakers, visitors, tract distributors, or in any way in which they could make themselves useful." For some reason unknown to the writer, they left our Church, but never lost their affection for it, or their interest in it. Mr. Walmsley wrote in 1892: "The old Lawson Street School is full of agreeable recollections to me. . . . It was in the Sabbath School where I and George Toulmin mingled our youthful voices in hymns of praise to our Maker; it was there where our moral character was formed; it was there where we were spoiled for the company and society of the drunken sensualist; it was there where we learned the great lessons of the Master; it was at that school we established the first Sabbath School Teetotal Society. In those days we used to meet in little parties and sing our hymns over and over again." They both retained their Christian faith and temperance fervour steadfast to the end. Mr. Walmsley departed to be with Christ on the 30th of May, 1896. Juvenile total abstinence societies became more general in the forties, and in 1847 began to be called Bands of Hope. When the Jubilee of the adoption of that name was celebrated, there were 23,000 Juvenile Temperance Societies in the United Kingdom with nearly three million members.

The Preston Youths' Temperance Society which began early in 1834, and which Dearden's "History" says was the first exclusively teetotal society in England, has ceased to be, but the Juvenile Temperance Society started in connection with our Preston Sunday School still continues, so that it has the honour of being the first Sunday School teetotal society, and the oldest exclusively teetotal society in England, being formed some months before the Preston Temperance Society abandoned the moderation for the entire abstinence pledge. This is an interesting fact; but let it not be forgotten that it is not by boasting of age, but by wise and earnest effort, and the blessing of God that the cause of sobriety is to be promoted. There ought to be a vigorous Juvenile Temperance Society in connection with all our Sunday Schools to so ground our young people in the principles of abstinence that it will be difficult for them to become victims to intemperance.

God's Righteousness.

STRONG is the air and pure around Thy throne,
Lord God of Righteousness, and hard to breathe
By sinful flesh, engendered from beneath;
Yet, with desire to thirst and hunger grown,
I pant to drink Heaven's pungent keen ozone,
I rise to Thee, trembling, lest Thou unsheathe Thy couchant lightnings, where the clouds en-wreath
The Eternal summit where Thou dwell'st alone.

Ah, could I live and move and be in Thee!

Thy Righteousness my natural element;
With robust spirit unseduced and firm
Dwelling in comfort where I strain to see,

Tread with firm step the road that angels went,
Beat with unslackening wing athwart the storm!

JOHN FORSTER.

"There's a Divinity that Shapes our Ends."

BY E. GALLIENNE-RÔBIN.

RACHEL LANGLOIS stood at the side of the road, shading her eyes with her hand. She was looking out for the van which left Saint Pierre Port every Saturday afternoon at five. She was expecting her husband, who went every week to the marchi (market), with more than usual eagerness, for to-day he was to bring with him a little grandson, the only child of the only son of Zacharie and Rachel Langlois. Years before, this son had left Guernsey to go, as a Methodist missionary, to Africa: there he had married, but when his boy was five years old, he and his wife had been attacked by fever, and after a few days' illness, both had died. The child, little Ernest, had been confided to the care of a man who happened to be returning to Guernsey, and who promised to place him safely in the hands of his grandparents.

Thus Rachel Langlois waited, with beating heart, for the van. Of course it seemed to her that it was later than usual; but at last she heard the sound of approaching wheels, and presently an unwieldy vehicle appeared; it was full of people, and laden with baskets covered with red handkerchiefs. Rachel could not see her husband; her eyes were misty, her breath came quickly, perhaps he had missed the van, perhaps the child had not arrived by the one morning boat from England. Closer and closer came the van: it stopped near Rachel, and, after all, the first to get down was her husband, a tall, gaunt, old man, towering above his plump, pretty, middle-aged wife. He carried in his arms a dainty boy, whose brown eyes and gleaming white teeth were the most striking features in the little face he turned, with a fleeting, radiant smile, to Rachel, as she took him from her husband.

Then he struggled to be set down, and looked on with interest as his grandfather collected baskets and bundles and exchanged adis (good-byes) with his neighbours, before turning away with his wife in the direction of their home, a little cottage on the side of a wooded hill, not far from Pleinmont cliffs. The child trotted along by his grandparents, humming a little tune to himself, and darting off every now and then to pick flowers and ferns from the hedges, while Rachel questioned her husband closely as to the arrival of the boy, and as to what he had gathered of his disposition; but Zacharie, though he could give a satisfactory account of the way in which Ernest had behaved, shook his head over the question of disposition: the child had been good, that was all he could say.

"Ah, it's I'd like to know if he's took after his father," said Rachel, in a low voice, "a better boy than my Ernest never lived, but there! I'll soon find out! Well, here we are at home, and I'm sure you want your supper," she added, unlocking the cottage door and leading the way into a good-sized and comfortable kitchen, with sanded floor. After supper was over and the child in bed, the two old people sat silent, each pre-occupied with thoughts of the past, till suddenly Rachel said in an undertone:

"Zacharie, there's something I'd like to say; it's bin on my mind there's a long time, ever since we heard that the child was coming to us. We must settle it not to bring up the boy to chapel; already he's the image of his father, and if he goes reg'lar to the Methodist Sunday School and to the service, the end 'll be that he'll be wanting to go off and be a missionary too and die of the fever!" She spoke fast, in Guernsey patois, and waited impatiently for the reply which Zacharie mouthed out slowly:

"My good, then I s'pose you're right, Rachel, but 'tain't likely at our age we can give up the chapel, and the boy must go somewhere of a Sunday, and who will take him to church, say?"

His wife leaned forward and tapped the table with nervous fingers. "I have thought all about it. It will be like this. We will send him to the church Sunday School of a morning and of an afternoon: then one of us make the best of it and take him to church at Saint-Pierre-du-Bois once of a Sunday, in the morning; and of an evening, when he is in bed, we can take it in turns to go to the chapel at Les Adams."

"Eh bien! (well)" said the old man slowly, "I s'pose you are right, but he'll soon be old enough to find out that we go to chapel, and there'll be those that will tell him his father was a minister."

"Bah," cried Rachel testily, "what's the good of meeting trouble half-way? When the time comes, if he's to know, well, the way 'll be made plain."

But though Zacharie did not seem satisfied, he ventured no further remark, contenting himself with an ominous shake of the head and a deep sigh, as his wife poured out the full elaboration of the plans which she prophesied would work excellently. At present, the child was too young to attend Sunday School, and therefore no religious difficulties marred the peace and joy that followed Ernest's coming to the cottage. He was a gentle boy, sweet-tempered and obedient, and his little life was a continued flow of pleasure, for he ran wild all day long, and in the evening he sat on his grandfather's knee and listened to stories told in the Guernsey patois which he rapidly acquired.

But, at last, when he was seven years old, a change passed over his life: he was sent to the parish school. At first he resented the restraint to which he was so little accustomed, but gradually, as his mind opened, he developed an insatiable love of reading, which in a few months made him a fair scholar and eager learner. Then a deluge of questions flooded the evening hours at the cottage, but Rachel had an answer for every query, and the child, thus encouraged, never attempted to cover up the day's experiences, but told his grandparents every detail of his school life. As soon as he could read easily, he was sent to the church school every Sunday afternoon.

The vicar at Saint-Pierre-du-Bois was a High Churchman, and insisted on the careful and intelligent learning of the catechism; and that meant further questioning every Saturday night: at first the boy was too young to notice how haltingly he was answered on catechism and church questions, but soon he began to be puzzled at one or two facts in his life. Why was it, that at church on Sunday mornings, his grandfather always seemed so sleepy, yet why did he shake his head so often during the sermon? And why was it that grand-mère looked cross when she heard his catechism; and what did the boys mean when they told him his father had been a chapel minister? That could not be true, for the vicar said it was wicked to go to the chapel. Perhaps it would be as well to ask his grand-père about it. One evening as he sat by the vraic (sea-weed) fire on his little stool, he burst out suddenly—

"Grandpère, is it wicked to go to the chapel at Les Adams?"

Zacharie took his pipe out of his mouth, coughed, and looked across to his wife, who sat on the jonquière (green-bed), knitting a guernsey for Ernest.

"Wicked!" she repeated imperiously, "of course not, mon garçon, for them that likes it; but you, you've got nothing to do with Les Adams. You are brought up to the church, you."

"Yes, but, grandmère," pursued the child, looking up at her with large, clear eyes, "it was Monsieur Durande who told us last Sunday in the school that it is wicked to go to the chapel."

The first blow had fallen, and for a second Rachel quailed under it, then she gathered herself together and said, with a slight tremble in her voice:

"Well, well, Ernest, little boys must believe what they're told by the vicar, of course, but the people to Les Adams, they've been told a different way. There! it's time for your supper now."

ST. PIERRE PORT.

The boy was silenced, and was too young to trouble over religious questions when school and play demanded his absorbed attention. When he was twelve years old, a proud day dawned for his grandparents, for he won a scholarship which enabled him to enter the Secondary school at Saint Pierre Port, and every day he went into the town by a carrier's van, returning home in the evening. New fields of interest opened to him with new methods of teaching, and before long he was noted as the most thoughtful and diligent pupil in the school. After two years' work he won another scholarship, entitling him to an entrance into Elizabeth College, frequented chiefly by the sons of the "gentry" of the island. And now his manners, always refined, became insensibly polished as he mixed with boys moving in a cultured sphere; and he learnt rapidly under the direction of masters who were only too glad to push on a promising boy.

When he was sixteen, he developed a decided aptitude for Divinity, poring over dry treatises in theology and puzzling his brains with various disputed doctrinal points. His character, meanwhile, never gave any one cause to doubt the deep impression his Confirmation and first attendance at the Lord's table had made upon him. Long since he had found out that his grandparents were chapel members by preference, and that his father had been a chapel minister, but he had merely wondered that anyone should prefer a plain, barn-like building, rather than attend the beautiful old church of Saint-Pierre-du-Bois, dimly lighted and oak-pewed, with the tattered flags of bygone battlefields hanging from the chancel arch.

But now that his interests seemed centring round Divinity, it occurred to him that the difference between church and chapel might be vital, and he pondered the question till his brain reeled before the wide subject; then he plucked up courage to ask one of his masters to explain the mysteries that perplexed him. As it happened, the man to whom he applied was a strict High Churchman, and he told Ernest that he could not do better than consult the vicar of the parish on difficulties, which thus dealt with, would very soon vanish. The boy, being in dead earnest, followed this advice; and ventured to call on the vicar, Monsieur Durande, who entered into the boy's questionings and supplied him with pamphlets and books intended to still every anxious thought, and settle every doubt, but, in reality, which were full of pernicious untruths and intolerant nonsense. Ernest went through a course of entirely one-sided reading, unknown to his ignorant grandparents, who thought it a fine thing that their boy should be such an evident favourite of the vicar, and such a frequent visitor at the vicarage. But their awakening was to come.

One Sunday evening, Rachel was at Les Adams Chapel, while Zacharie and Ernest took a stroll on the cliffs: the boy was unusually silent, and at length Zacharie said:

"Of what, then, are you thinking, Ernest, that you are so quiet?"

Ernest laughed nervously, and after a second, he said with some hesitation—

"Well, grandpère, to tell you the truth, I feel unhappy because grandmère is at the chapel."

"Bah, mon garçon, there is no need to be unhappy! She is yet strong enough to go."

"It isn't that, grandpère," stammered the boy, "it's that the chapel is not the place for good people like her and you."

The old man rubbed his eyes and stared at the boy; then he laughed. "Well, well, what rubbish is this you talk? Who's been telling you that?"

"I—I—read it, and the vicar told me."

Zacharie shrugged his shoulders and winked. "Bah! we all know the vicar! He's a good man, but rather soft, him; don't pay no attention this time."

"But, grandpère," cried the boy, his eyes full of vague trouble, "I must think about it, and read, for—for—I want to get a scholarship and go to Oxford."

"Oxford! Where's that?" questioned Zacharie sharply.

In a few eager words Ernest explained his meaning, and gave a hasty sketch of life at Oxford. "And I shall not be an expense to you, grandpère," he said, "for there's the money I've got from my mother, that you've often told me about."

Zacharie passed his hand over his forehead. Ernest seemed to have drifted away from the life of the cottage, within this brief hour on the cliffs; and very mixed were the old man's feelings as he looked at his grandson. He was proud of the tall, noble boy, with his loving, brown eyes and broad forehead. It was a keen delight to him that his grandson was hand-in-glove with the vicar, but equally keen was the pain with which he learnt that this dearly-loved boy regarded the chapel as a place where good people ought not to go. The Langlois' had been chapel folk for generations, and it stung the old man that one of his blood should turn from the old ways, and doubt the righteousness of chapel worship.

He had reluctantly consented to his wife's idea of bringing up the boy to church, but never had he expected such a result; and he was all eagerness to return home and tell Rachel about it. After supper, Ernest went off to the vicarage, and the old people were left alone; then Zacharie put down his pipe.

"Rachel, ma garce," (my girl), he said, "there's bin something happened between me and the boy. Listen, and I'll tell you." With many interruptions from his wife he told the story of the evening, and when he had finished and paused to rekindle his pipe, Rachel said not a word; she, too, appeared dazed, as if she could not grasp the gravity of the situation: but, at last, with a reserve and constraint in her manner quite new to her husband, she said slowly:

"Well, after all, it's quite right he should go to this Oxford. He's a little gentleman, Zacharie. He's like the church gentlemen. It's quite right, I tell you, we meant to bring him up like that, so that he wouldn't wish to be a chapel missionary like his poor father; and I don't see nothing to grumble at—me!"

"But, Rachel, it isn't right he should say them things of the chapel!"

The old woman waved her hand impatiently. "Bah, Zacharie, when he gets away from the vicar he'll be different, him. I tell you, he must go to this Oxford."

And to Oxford he went in due time, by means of the scholarship which he took with flying colours, and thus he passed away from the cottage and the old ways, and Zacharie and Rachel talked proudly and sadly of their boy, and never a misgiving crossed Rachel's mind, though Zacharie still shook his head when he sat alone, thinking of Ernest and the dear days of his childhood. Meanwhile, Ernest was pursuing a brilliant career at the University.

"A LITTLE COTTAGE ON THE SIDE OF A HILL NOT FAR FROM PLEINMONT CLIFFS."

He won distinction after distinction, and his character was developing and ennobling with his mind; and he did not neglect his grandparents. He was a devoted follower of the Christ, who is Lord of all hearts, who can be served through every creed, but he was also a passionate lover of the church, for he acknowledged but one, with its three branches—Roman, Greek, Anglican. When visiting his grandparents he avoided all religious discussion, though he ardently longed to bring the dear old people into what he called the "one fold." Zacharie openly lamented his grandson's extreme views when alone with Rachel, who, for her part, persisted in declaring herself well satisfied with the result of Ernest's training.

Time slipped rapidly away, and the day came when Ernest must choose a profession. His mind had been made up for some time, and now it only remained to tell his grandparents of his decision; and this was done one Sunday evening, the quietest time for talk in the little cottage.

"Grandmère," he said, in the patois of the island, "I should like to tell you what I have decided to be."

"Well, mon garçon, and what then is it?" said the old woman eagerly, as she rose and laid her wrinkled hands on his shoulders, for he sat beside the vraie (sea-weed) fire.

"I wish to be a clergyman, grandmère, and in a few years I hope to go out to foreign work, it is the greatest desire of my heart."

Rachel took her hands from his shoulders, her arms fell to her sides, and a look of pallid death stole the colour from her old brown face. Two of his words—foreign work—had stabbed her to the heart.

He was appointed to a mission station in the West Indies, and he had been out several months. He wrote to his grandparents that he was as happy and busy as the days were long. There was plenty of work to be done; a new church was to be built, he was doing his utmost to provide it with a beautiful ritual. His letters came regularly, and were read and re-read till they were dirty and torn; and they always brought such good news that Rachel began to forget the presentiment that beset her when he told how he desired to be a foreign missionary.

It happened that one mail the old people did not receive their usual letter: this was nothing, any trifling circumstance might have prevented their boy from writing; but when a second mail was due and no news came, they began to be a little anxious, though not unduly depressed.

"It's all right," said Rachel, the optimist, "I expect we'll have two instead of one next time; you'll see, Zacharie, if I'm not—"

A knock at the door interrupted her; "Come in," she cried, knitting quietly. The latch clicked, and the minister of Les Adams Chapel entered the cottage. He was a great favourite of the Langlois', and received a warm welcome. It was not long before Ernest's name came uppermost in the conversation, but the minister did not seem as ready and interested as usual.

"And there's two mails we've not heard from the boy, monsieur," put in Zacharie in a pause of the conversation.

"Yes," said the minister, standing up and looking out of the window, "doubtless you are anxious, there is always so much sickness in hot countries."

"But you don't think he—our boy—can be sick?" questioned Rachel hurriedly.

"My dear, dear friends," said the minister, after a pause, "I will not, I must not deceive you. I have heard from the West Indies that your grandson has been very ill of a terrible fever."

With one consent, the two old people rose and came close to the minister, who took Rachel's trembling hand in his strong clasp.

"Tell me," she cried, "ah, there is no need to ask; I know, I know, my boy is dead!"

The minister bowed his head. A bitter cry broke from the old man, and the tears ran down his cheeks, but Rachel's grief was dry-eyed agony.

"He's dead," she wailed, "like his father, of fever in a foreign land; and it's my fault, I tried to have it all my own way. Oh, Zacharie, if only I'd let him be brought up to the chapel, perhaps it would have been different."

The minister was mystified by her words, but he did not seek to discover their meaning till the old woman was calmer; then, of her own accord, she told the story of her scheming to prevent Ernest's following in his father's steps, "And now the Lord has punished me," she cried, "and my boy is cut off—my boy's child."

"Not so," said the minister gently, "the Lord has honoured you beyond words. Your dear son and your boy Ernest gave up their lives for the great love they bore the Master. Truly, can we say, dear old friend, that His thoughts are not our thoughts, neither are His ways our ways."

The Crisis in the Career of Jesus Christ.

"Father, the hour is come!"—ST. JOHN xvii. 1.

THESE words open the door upon the true Via Dolorosa, the sorrowful way, which our Lord and Saviour walked alone—all alone—and not for Himself, but to save us the weary, painful journey. It was a short, sharp, awful path, ending in the suffering and ignominy of the Cross. To change the figure, these words reveal the nearness of a great crisis. The gracious life had been marked off again and again from all other lives by striking and decisive events;

but this was the supreme crisis in His earthly career. Possibly it was the most momentous and effective period in His service for men.

This dreadful hour cast its shadow before. Anticipating its loneliness, its pain and its horror, our Saviour exclaimed on the eve of His triumphal entry into Jerusalem:—

"Now is My soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save Me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour."

The people who heard Him were strangely agitated. Some said it thundered, and others that an angel spake unto Him.

But now He is face to face with the terrible reality. The infinite burden is crushing down upon His heart, wringing from Him the startled cry—"Father, the hour is come!" What depths of pain and horror these words disclose! But what heights of confidence and triumph they reveal!

Standing within this holy of holies, and looking upon the prostrate form of the Man of Sorrows, let us join in asking, in a reverent and prayerful spirit, what this hour meant to Jesus, and then, what it ought to mean to us.

I. IT WAS TO JESUS THE HOUR OF SUBMISSION THE MOST SUBLIME.

The whole of His life had been one beautiful, consistent act of obedience to the Father. His first recorded words—"Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business"—may be taken as an index of His subsequent career. Again and again He told the people that He had come from the Father, to speak the words of the Father, to do the works of the Father, and in all things to yield Himself to the will and purpose of the Father. Surely no careful student of His life and work and words can fail to notice how exactly everything corresponds with the Old Testament words, "Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of Me. I delight to do Thy will, O My God!"

But this unexampled submission is seen in its essence and glory in the garden of Gethsemane, and upon the Cross. Bathed in crimson perspiration, His soul exceeding sorrowful, we hear Him crying, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me. The wine is red, the ingredients are appalling; therefore, if it be possible, let it pass." We can never know all that prayer meant. It has been called the "prayer of prayers." In it we have suffering concentrated, manifold anguish compressed into exquisite agony. But the submission, in its rarity and sublime reality, equals, if it does not even surpass, the agony—"Nevertheless, not My will, but Thine, be done."

There is an incident in the life of Fénelon, the good Archbishop of Cambray, which may help us to understand and appreciate more fully the words and submission of Jesus.

In the year 1689, he was selected as tutor to the young Duke of Burgundy, heir-presumptive to the throne. He was in every way an excellent youth, and there grew up between teacher and pupil an affection almost passing the love of woman. But the young duke sickened and died. Fénelon was plunged into grief unutterable. But as he stood by the graveside he was heard to say, "In that grave lie buried the hope and joy of my life, but if the turning of a straw would have kept him with us, I would not have turned it in opposition to the will of God." So our Saviour—but in a matter infinitely greater in its nature and in its issues—said, "Not My will, but Thine be done."

"Death and the curse were in that cup,
O Christ, 'twas full for Thee;
But Thou hast drained the last dark drop,
'Tis empty now for me;

That bitter cup Love drank it up;
Now blessing's draught for me."

II. IT WAS TO JESUS THE HOUR OF SUFFERING THE MOST SEVERE.

He had suffered many things ere He came to this hour. But in it the veil was lifted from death and hell, and He entered the awful regions spoken of by the Greek Church as His unknown sufferings. His physical sufferings must have been intense beyond all possible expression. Think of the blow on the face in the Judgment Hall; of the painful scourging; of the cruel thorns pressed so roughly around His temples; of the heavy cross upon His bleeding shoulders; of the nailed hands and feet by which His quivering frame hung upon the tree of shame, and a scene of torture intense and saddening beyond expression, rises before us.

"They scourge Him, crown Him with a crown of thorn,
They smite His face with bitter mock and scorn,
They give Him gall to drink, they pierce His side,
The Crucified!"

But His mental and spiritual sufferings were more acute still. These were literally overwhelming. In Gethsemane He sweat, as it were, great drops of blood, and on the cross He tasted death for man. For Him it was not a walk through the valley and shadow of death, sustained and kept from fear by the Divine presence, but He met and passed through the awful reality. He tasted death. The lowest, farthest, uttermost stage was reached when He cried, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? My God, My God! why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Here we see a lonely, homeless, stricken soul, forsaken of all. No human plummet can sound the depths of that unique suffering. "He trod the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with Him." Never was there sorrow like His sorrow. "He tasted death for every man." "He came to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." "He became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross."

III. IT WAS THE HOUR OF CONFLICT MOST KEENLY CONTESTED.

This was not the first time that evil and good found themselves in conflict. From the beginning this war had been more or less fiercely waged. But this hour witnessed the supreme gathering of the forces. Here the decisive engagement must take place. Here the most momentous of all battles must be fought. On one side is Jesus Christ—the David of the race, and on the other, the Goliath of evil—the principalities and powers of spiritual wickedness. To all outward seeming the combatants are unevenly matched. But the issues are infinitely serious. If the Son of Man, the Second Adam, fails here, there will be failure all along the line of human hope and divine purpose. The door of hope and salvation will be forever closed. How goes the battle? Looking upon this arena of the ages, this battleground on which the destiny of man is to be decided, we see several movements on the part of one combatant that mean victory for goodness, salvation for man, and the opening of heaven to all believers.

In the midst of the conflict He can turn towards some weeping women and tenderly say to them, "Weep not for Me, weep for yourselves and your children." He remembers His mother too, and arranges for her future comfort by commending her to the care of His beloved disciple. He can attend also to the appeal of the dying thief, and make him a remarkable promise. And He can close the conflict with the same holy, helpful, victorious word upon His lips, that rang from them at the beginning. "Father, the hour is come," was the exclamation with which He entered the conflict, and when it was over, He loudly and triumphantly said—"Father, into Thy hands I commend My Spirit." With confidence in His cause, in Himself, and in His Father, He pushed the battle to the gate and triumphed o'er His foes. Hence to Jesus this was—

IV. THE HOUR OF VICTORY THE MOST GLORIOUS.

There was apparent defeat. He died, and it seemed to His followers that the Sun of righteousness had gone out in the awful darkness of the Cross. Such was the view of those two men who were returning with sad countenances and with sadder hearts to their old life and home at Emmaus. "We trusted it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." Alas! alas! their hopes were blighted, and all the good things they had anticipated from His life and work seemed scattered like vapour clouds before the strong north winds.

"But soon the Victor rose Triumphant o'er His foes,
And led the vanquished host in chains;
He threw their empire down,
His foes compelled to own—
O'er all the great Messiah reigns."

The Victor's own words are, "I am He that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen! and have the keys of hell and of death." It was a glorious, an enduring, and an eternal victory. By it He has obtained for us forgiveness of sin, fellowship with God, a new life, a better covenant, better promises, a better country, the liberty and riches of the sons of God here and hereafter an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.

"The cross it takes our guilt away;
It holds the fainting spirit up;
It cheers with hope the gloomy day,
And sweetens every bitter cup."

But what ought this hour to mean to us?

To some people it appears to be a mere passing show. A formal, funereal pageant that comes but once a year, to be attended by fasts that are frauds; by services and sacrifices that are extremely childish; and by interminable bell-ringing which is suggestive only of some kind of lunacy.

Brethren, Jesus Christ offered Himself a sacrifice for sin once for all. The priest of the old service went into the holy of holies once a year to offer sacrifice for himself and others; but Christ entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

Hence, when men pretend that He dies again every Good Friday, they are guilty of blasphemy, and of a sorry travesty of the most sacred event in the history of the race, and the career of our Saviour and Lord.

But it ought to mean—

First, that our redemption has been achieved, and that we need be no longer in bondage to sin and the devil. It was costly, but the price has been paid.

"Heaven poured out the price,
All price beyond."

He gave Himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a people for His own possession, zealous of good works.

Secondly, it ought to mean that our life has been fully provided for. Every life has its crises; its crucial hours; its great decisive moments; its painful conflicts; its unutterable sorrows; its Gethsemane and its Calvary. Each soul must face its destiny alone, and with it no man to help, but the Man Christ Jesus. He has gone through all that He might succour and sustain us in our great distresses. In the keenest conflict, the bitterest sorrow, the severest suffering, we can be certain of His presence, sympathy, and help, and when our turn shall come to pass through the valley and shadow of death, we shall be able to encourage ourselves with the words, "I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me, Thy rod and staff comfort me."

But it ought to mean thirdly, Consecration—the unreserved surrender of ourselves and all we have in love and devotion and service to Jesus Christ. We are not our own. He has bought us with a price, hence the life we now live should be unto Him who loved us and gave Himself for us. How often people sing—

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my soul, my life, my all."

But how rarely the words are translated into thought and life and action. If we rightly and fully understood the meaning of this hour, Jesus Christ would become all in all to us. He would have at once what He certainly claims—the pre-eminence in all our thoughts and actions and aspirations. Alas! how far most of us are from such passionate, whole-hearted devotion. A lady has put this fact in a very striking way in a story called,

"The Dying Saviour and the Gipsy Girl." This girl is represented as talking with an artist, who is busy painting a picture of the dying Jesus. After several questions and answers about the painting, she says to the artist, "How much you Catholics must love Jesus, for doing so much for you; don't you love Him very much, seignior?" "No," replied the man, "I am afraid I don't care much about Him." "You must be jesting. You say you believe in Him, and how can you help loving Him if you know that He died for you? I thought you pretended to be so much better than a poor gipsy. But she would scorn to be so ungrateful, wild and untamed as you think her. Can you look at that picture, and see the patient dying man as He hangs there, with the blood trickling from Him, with His hands and feet pierced with those nails, and say He bore it all for you, and yet tell me you do not think you even care for Him. It is wicked to jest about such a thing. Yes, and to sit and paint His sorrow and pain, and not even to pity, or to love Him!" Then she cried, "Oh, my sins! Who will save me? If any one had loved me so much, I would go to the ends of the earth on my knees. I would suffer tortures. I would die in my turn to show my love to Him."

O brothers, sisters, have you ever felt so? He has died for you and you believe, but with what result? Miss Havergal saw in a German professor's study a fine picture of the Crucifixion, underneath which were these words:—

"I gave My life for thee, what hast thou given for Me?"

Sitting down she wrote the hymn beginning:—

"I gave My life for thee,
My precious blood I shed
That thou might'st ransomed be,
And quickened from the dead;
I gave My life for thee,
What hast thou given for Me?"

TELL you what it is," said my friend the Political Parson, "what we want is ten years of old Oliver Cromwell again. I am sick and tired of this eternal shilly-shallying about reforms we have been working for this last twenty years. Parliament sits and sits, and does about as much good as a hen sitting on a plaster-of-Paris egg. We want some 'still, strong man' to walk in to hurry them up, and if they won't be hurried up, then to hurry them out. Oh, for a man with an iron will, a true friend of the people, who should just legislate for us and govern us as we ought to be legislated for and governed, and should just snap his fingers at peers, and parsons, and directors, and colonels, and all the rest of them!"

"Gently, gently, John! You are talking flat treason. What has upset you now?"

"Oh, everything! This miserable Government of ours, and our divided Opposition, without a man since Gladstone went, who can make them all follow, or if they won't follow will shove them. We want a Cromwell, sir, and unless we get him things will go from bad to worse."

"Well, I don't see any sign of a new Oliver, but at any rate, we are going to see a statue of him in the lobby of the House, and that will remind the members that there was once a greater than them all in Parliament, one word from whom made any tyrant of the Continent tremble in his shoes."

"Yes, and as soon as he was dead they all turned like fawning curs to lick the hand of the lowest of the Stuarts, and the country looked on and made no sign when his bones were dug up from their resting place in Westminster Abbey, and were carried to Tyburn and hung on a gibbet."

"The disgrace was the eternal disgrace of the contemptible king and his near parasites. It did not hurt Cromwell. His fame is safe for ever. His body, like John Brown's, has mouldered in the grave, but 'his soul goes marching on,' and to-day it is incarnate in British Nonconformity. We may not get a new Oliver. 'Take him all in all, we ne'er shall look upon his like again;' but don't you think that just because his spirit is now diffused through great communities of liberty-loving Free Churchmen, there is all the more likelihood of the ends he aimed at being permanently attained? One great man can do a great work even by himself, but if he attempts to drag or push an unwilling nation far in advance of where it wants to go, there will be a swing back again. The collective Cromwell permeates the nation, and carries it forward with slower steps, but the steps taken will not be retraced."

"We won't argue," said the Political Parson, "but it's Cromwell's birthday, his three hundredth birthday, on April 25th, isn't it? Just hunt me up a few interesting bits. I mean to preach and speak about him till nobody in my circuit will ask, as a young fellow, who was educated at a leading college, asked me only yesterday, 'By the way, who was Oliver Cromwell? Wasn't he a great tyrant, or something, who didn't believe in religion or laws?' Just think of that now!" and the Political Parson almost snorted with indignation.

Now, the Political Parson is not an ignoramus, but he has so many irons in the fire that he can do but little extra theological reading, and his knowledge of general literature, and particularly of out-of-the-way books, is pardonably limited. He has a rough acquaintance with the main lines of the life of Cromwell, and a firm grip of the principles he and his party stood for, but about the details he is rather hazy.

"Just freshen me up about the Ironsides," he said.

I took out the first volume of "Milton's Prose Works," in that invaluable "Bohn's Standard Library." Milton was Cromwell's Latin secretary, but he was much more than a mere official. Partisans of the executed king at home and abroad poured contumely on the Protector and the Commonwealth as the murderers of what they were pleased to style the "royal martyr." Milton undertook the defence of the Commonwealth, and the great man at its head, and nobody can read such a work as the magnificent "Defence of the People of England" against the scurrilous Salmasius without feeling that there were then "giants in the land" men of big heads and big hearts. Here, for instance, is the picture of Cromwell and his Ironsides, those brawny, Bible-reading yeomen of Huntingdonshire, who, in the championship of liberty of religion and a free Parliament, turned their plough-shares into swords:—

"Oliver Cromwell was sprung from a line of illustrious ancestors, who were distinguished for the civil functions which they sustained under the monarchy, and still more for the part they took in restoring and establishing true religion in this country. In the vigour and maturity of his life, which he passed in retirement, he was conspicuous for nothing more than for the strictness of his religious habits, and the innocence of his life; and he had tacitly cherished in his breast that flame of piety which was afterwards to stand him in so much stead on the greatest occasions, and in the most critical exigencies. In the last Parliament which was called by the king, he was elected to represent his native town, when he soon became distinguished by the justness of his opinions and the vigour and decision of his councils. When the sword was drawn, he offered his services, and was appointed to a troop of horse, whose numbers were soon increased by the pious and the good, who flocked from all quarters to his standard; and in a short time he almost surpassed the greatest generals in the magnitude and the rapidity of his achievements. Nor is this surprising, for he was a soldier disciplined to perfection in the knowledge of himself. He had either extinguished, or by habit had learned to subdue, the whole host of vain hopes, fears, and passions which infest the soul. He first acquired the government of himself, and over himself acquired the most signal victories, so that on the first day he took the field against the external enemy, he was a veteran in arms, consummately practised in the toils and exigencies of war. He collected an army as numerous and as well equipped as any one ever did in so short a time; which was uniformly obedient to his orders, and dear to the affections of the citizens, which was formidable to the enemy in the field, but never cruel to those who laid down their arms, which committed no lawless ravages on the persons or the property of the inhabitants, who, when they compared their conduct with the turbulence, the intemperance, the impiety, and the debauchery of the royalists, were wont to salute them as friends, and to consider them as guests. They were a stay to the good, a terror to the evil, and the warmest advocates for every exertion of piety and virtue."

"I should like to have ridden with them," said the fiery Political Parson. "But isn't there a sonnet about Cromwell also?"

"Yes, I will read it." And from a dainty edition of "Milton's Poetical Works," that has on the frontispiece his full, noble face, with long, curling locks falling on to the deep, white neckcloth, I read the lines:

Cromwell, our chief of men, who thro' a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions rude,
Guided by faith and matchless fortitude,
To peace and truth thy glorious way hast ploughed,
And on the neck of crown'd Fortune proud,
Hast reared God's trophies, and His work pursued,
While Darwen streams with blood of Scots imbrued,
And Dunbar field, resounds thy praises loud,
And Worcester's laureate wreath: yet much remains
To conquer still; Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than War; new foes arise
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains.
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose Gospel is their maw.

"Amen to that!" growled the Political Parson. "But where did I see something like that 'Peace hath her victories' bit? Ah, I remember! It was in that Rudyard Kipling poem, just before his illness, to the American people:

Take up the white man's burden—
The savage wars of peace—
Fill full the mouth of famine,
And bid the sickness cease.

I wish we had a Cromwell and a Milton to talk to those rampaging Ritualists who are trying to 'bind our souls' in this very year 1899."

I take down a book by a man who was Milton's assistant Latin secretary—Andrew Marvell, in later days a fearless patriot in a servile Parliament, and a scourging satirist of the vices of the Court, whom neither attempts at assassination could intimidate, nor flattering royal offers seduce. Marvell, like Milton, was fascinated by the great mind and pure heart of Cromwell, whom he saw at the closest quarters day by day. In an ode on the first anniversary of the Protectorate, he wrote:

If in some happy hour,
High grace should meet in one with highest power,
And then a seasonable people still Should bend to his, as he to Heaven's will,
What we might hope, what wonderful effect
From such a wished conjuncture might reflect!
But a thick cloud about that morning lies,
And intercepts the beams to mortal eyes,
That 'tis the most which we determine can,
If these the times, then this must be the man.

To be Lord Protector, Marvell declares, was no elevation to Cromwell:

For to be Cromwell was a greater thing,
Than aught below, or yet above, a king:
Therefore thou rather didst thyself depress,
Yielding to rule, because it made thee less.

On the death of Cromwell, Marvell wrote a long poem, in which he says,

I saw him dead: a leaden slumber lies,
And mortal sleep over those wakeful eyes;
Those gentle rays under the lids were fled,
Which through his looks that piercing sweetness shed;
That port which so majestic was and strong,
Loose and deprived of vigour, stretched along;
All withered, all discoloured, pale and wan,
How much another thing, no more that man!
O human glory vain! O Death! O wings!
O worthless world! O transitory things!
Yet dwelt that greatness in his shape decayed,
That still though dead, greater than death he laid,
And in his altered face you something feign
That threatens Death, he yet will live again.

The Political Parson was moved by such testimonies to Cromwell from such men, and would have kept me turning over pages and reading to him for another couple of hours, but he remembered he had a meeting to attend. Delia came in with coffee and bread and butter, and said, "I hope you have enjoyed yourself among these treasures. My book-worm is in heaven if he has a brother worm in the book-room." Picking up the Milton's Prose volume, she remarked, "I see the top shelf wants dusting." I groaned in spirit at the thought of the disturbance that would inevitably soon be effected.

As he rose to leave, the Political Parson said, "Good-bye. I shall be too busy to come again before Easter, but I mean to return afterwards and make some notes from those books."

Delia accompanied him downstairs, and returned to fetch the tray.

"Talking of Easter," she said, "is it not a happy coincidence that the season of the Lord's Resurrection, in this country at any rate, is the time of the great awakening of nature from the death of the winter? Look into the garden—the borders are filled with crocuses, and budding hyacinths, daffodils, narcissus and tulips, and some are already in flower. Our Lord's tomb was in a garden, and I love to think that when the great stone was rolled away, and He came out, the opening flowers sent out to Him their odorous incense, and the birds carolled joyously from their little, soft, downy throats."

"Well done, Delia! You are talking poetry without knowing it."

"And pray why not, sir? Do you consider that a woman is necessarily such a hopelessly prosaic person?"

I declined to be entrapped into pursuing this dangerous subject. Instead, I took down my beloved George Herbert, which opened almost of itself at the Easter poems. I read to Delia the honey-sweet lyric:

I got me flowers to strew Thy way;
I got me boughs off many a tree:
But Thou wast up by break of day,
And brought'st Thy sweets along with Thee.

The sun arising in the East,
Though he give light, and th' East perfume:
If they should offer to contest
With Thy arising, they presume.

Can there be any day but this,
Though many suns to shine endeavour?
We count three hundred, but we miss;
There is but one, and that one ever.

In the taste of his age, the sacred singer of Bemerton sometimes exerted his ingenuity in the construction of a figure poem. Delia was amused with the imitation in "Easter Wings," which shall spread themselves here:

Lord, Who created'st man in wealth and store,
Though foolishly he lost the same,
Decaying more and more,
Till he became
Most poor.
With Thee
O let me rise
As larks, harmoniously,
And sing this day Thy victories:
Then shall the fall further the flight in me.

My tender age in sorrow did begin:
And still with sickness and shame
Thou didst so punish sin,
That I became
Most thin.

With Thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day Thy victory,
For, if I imp my wing on Thine,
Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

"A pretty conceit," said Delia, "and it is better poetry than one would expect under such conditions."

"April is the poets' month, by the way. In the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey, you will remember that Chaucer, our first great poet, who will have been dead five hundred years on October 25, 1900, is buried in a tomb in a niche of the wall, and in the floor, at the foot of his tomb, lie side by side our great Victorian poets, Tennyson and Browning. Now each of them has sung the praises of our English April. Chaucer begins the 'Canterbury Tales' by telling how

Whanne that April, with his showers sweet,
The droughte of March hath piercèd to the root, then the 'small fowls maketh melody.' Amid all the loveliness, and the balmy sky of Italy, Browning longed

O to be in England
Now that April's here!

And you will remember Tennyson's pretty simile in your favourite 'Idylls of the King,' where in the castle court of Yniol, the knightly Geraint hears for the first time the voice of the as yet unseen Enid singing:—

So the sweet voice of Enid moved Geraint;
And made him like a man abroad at morn,
When first the liquid note, beloved of men,
Comes flying over many a windy wave
To Britain, and in April suddenly
Breaks from a coppice gemm'd with green and red,
And he suspends his converse with a friend,
Or it may be the labour of his hands,
To think or say, "There is the nightingale."

"Sweet, cruelly used Geraint," said tender-hearted Delia. "But I have other things than listening to poetry to do just now." And taking up the tray, she left the book-room.

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

IV. OVERLAPPING: A SUGGESTION.

HERE is a question that has been exercising the minds of not a few of our people lately about which it is time somebody was speaking out. Let the truth be spoken in love, but let it be spoken, nevertheless. The difficulty of speaking it without seeming guilty of uncharity is uncommonly great, but an attempt must be made to overcome the difficulty. And if the raising the question should result in removing the evil a great source of friction between different sections of the Methodist family will have been got rid of.

Methodist union is often advocated on the ground that it would do away with a great deal of overlapping, and so save a serious waste of labour. Well, Methodist union is bound to come sooner or later, but it will not be accomplished either to-morrow or the next day. The most sanguine can scarcely expect it in the immediate future. But if Methodist union cannot be secured at present, is that any reason why the evil of overlapping should constantly be allowed to assume more aggravated forms? Is it not possible for the Methodist Churches to take some steps to prevent this evil making its appearance in new localities? That is the question to be discussed in the present paper.

Let the evil be stated first of all. Several cases have figured in the papers lately with which the Connexion is tolerably familiar. As stated in the first instance, it seemed pretty certain that there had been some high-handed attempts to oust us from places to which we had established a clear right. Whether subsequent investigation has modified the aspect of the matter has not transpired. As these cases may be regarded as in some sense sub judice, it would scarcely be fair to assume that the charges have been fully established. But the very fact that disputes have arisen, and bitter complaints have been made on the part of some of our people, indicates the need for some effective method of dealing with such cases.

But if these charges are not yet proven there are plenty of others about which there is only too little uncertainty. I am bound to say that, so far as my own experience goes, our Wesleyan friends are the worst offenders in this matter. It may be that my experience has been exceptional and unfortunate, but it has been painfully uniform. Let it here be stated that some of the pleasantest experiences of my life have been in connection with the old Body. Two of my happiest years were spent as a master at Woodhouse Grove School. There I received the kindest treatment, and the honour of an invitation to enter the Wesleyan ministry. But for the fact that by birth, education, and conversion I was a Primitive Methodist I should have accepted that invitation, and would, I suppose, have been to-day a Wesleyan minister.

It will readily be understood, therefore, that I have no prejudices against our Wesleyan friends, and that what I state here as my conviction is the result of a series of unpleasant experiences in the course of my work as a Primitive Methodist minister. That conviction is that Wesleyans carry their denominational zeal and loyalty to such an extreme that it becomes a species of selfishness and religious bigotry. It was so in my boyhood in my native Dale, and it has been the same in nearly every circuit in which I have travelled. Take the question of united Free Church action in a given neighbourhood. In two of my circuits this was what happened. A movement was set on foot for a united Watch Night service. The Wesleyans consented to join it on the understanding that the first meeting should be held in their chapel. This was readily acceded to, and the result was a magnificent service, in which all the Nonconformist Churches of the town took part. The following year, according to arrangement, the service was held in another chapel. The Wesleyans grumbled, but under pressure from a broad-minded minister, they consented to abide by the understanding. The third year they seceded, and held a service of their own. Precisely the same thing happened in another circuit. It will readily be imagined there was considerable indignation among the other Free Churches, and that the cause of union was not furthered by the occurrence.

These incidents are cited merely as examples of sectarianism of the kind which tends to perpetuate our unhappy differences. In these instances all the Nonconformist Churches felt themselves aggrieved. The other instances to be cited affected our own denomination only. How many similar cases in other places have occurred I am, of course, not in a position to say. A few years ago we had a flourishing cause in the town of Barrhead. The place had been missioned in the ordinary way, placed upon the circuit plan, and regularly supplied with the services of ministers and local preachers. There came to the place a couple of Wesleyans, brothers, who joined our Society. They were smart men, a little too smart, as the sequel showed, and were soon placed in official position. In the most Jesuitical fashion, they set to work to wean the people from Primitive Methodism, and to induce them to go over to the Wesleyans. It was utterly folly to keep on sending their collections and quarterages to the Circuit Quarterly Meeting. If they would join the Wesleyans, a chapel would be built for them, and they would have a minister of their own put down. On a certain week-night one of our ministers preached as usual, and as he had to leave a little before the close of the service to catch a train, one of the brothers accompanied him to the station while the other concluded the service. Not a word was said of any dissatisfaction, and in the most brotherly manner the ex-Wesleyan bade the minister good-night. Yet he knew perfectly well that his brother was taking the names of those who were willing to go over to the Wesleyans. The next thing heard was that practically the whole Society had seceded to the Wesleyans, and we were locked out of the hall we had rented for our services.

But all this was due, it may be argued, to the treachery of two men. Possibly. But what of the Wesleyan authorities behind them who stepped in and profited by their treachery? Deputations were sent to the superintendent of the circuit that was taking over the cause. He heard their statements, and was so impressed that he gave them to understand that he would not favour the reception of the seceders when their application came before his Quarterly Meeting. Another Wesleyan minister, on learning the facts, went to this superintendent's house and left a message advising him "to have nothing to do with the dirty business." All this notwithstanding, the circuit took over the cause, got a minister appointed, and Primitive Methodism was wiped out.

Shortly afterwards a paragraph appeared in the public prints, stating how, in a place where three months before there was no Wesleyan cause, a new mission had been started and a church established with some sixty members, but not a word of how they had all been stolen from Primitive Methodism. Here was a striking instance of what could be done by the Forward Movement.

This was in a Scotch town, and where there was not room for more than one Methodist Church. In Scotland only a certain section of the people is readily accessible to Methodist influence, so that with existing Presbyterian agencies a single Methodist Church is often sufficient for the needs of a large town. Yet in spite of this, the Wesleyans will start rival causes. Take the town of Paisley, where we have had a fairly prosperous cause for many years, and one singularly evangelistic and aggressive in its methods. Instead of turning their attention to some town where no Methodist interest existed, the Wesleyans within the last three years have commenced a cause in Paisley, hired a building, and appointed a minister to the charge. I know nothing of this cause, which was started before I came to Paisley, except that out of the scanty membership with which it began, a dozen or more were Primitive Methodists; but I do know that the most shameless efforts were made to proselytise our people.

It goes without saying that these things do not make for union, either Methodist or Christian. The blame lies with the authorities by whose sanction such things are done. Is there no possibility of avoiding occurrences of this kind? Could not a Committee composed of representatives from each of the Methodist Churches be appointed to whom such cases could be referred? Such a body would have a much better chance of adjudicating in cases of overlapping and trespass than one directly interested and moved by a strong desire to push the denomination in its own locality without a due regard to the interests and rights of a sister Church. This would not prevent the spirit to which I am calling attention from manifesting itself in certain localities, but it might prevent people who act in this way from receiving the official countenance without which they could not do much harm. In the cases cited it was the action of Circuit and Connexional authorities that did the mischief, and a prompt appeal to an unprejudiced committee would have ensured that justice would be done.

It would, however, be in the moral effect which the mere fact of the existence of such a committee would have that its advantage would lie. The certainty that sharp practice and sheep-stealing would be attended by the risk of exposure would act as a wholesome deterrent, and rival causes would not be commenced either by Primitive Methodists or Wesleyans without due regard to what was fair and just. It is not desirable unduly to fetter the zeal and energy of any denomination, but care must be taken that the rights of others shall be respected, and that nothing be done calculated to throw back the cause of Methodist union. In many places the unhappy differences and jealousies of past times are being forgotten, and the various sections of Non-conformity are working with a harmony that must advance the cause of Christianity. The various branches of the Methodist family, too, are being drawn more closely together. That this spirit of unity shall not be marred in any quarter, or anything be done to renew old rivalries, is most desirable. Therefore it is that we urge the appointment of a representative Committee with power to adjudicate on all cases of attempted overlapping or trespass among the Methodist Churches.

JOSEPH RITSON.

ELY FROM PARK.

Oliver Cromwell.

None of the smaller rooms of the National Portrait Gallery there are two pictures of the Protector, taken at different periods of his life. In one he appears as a stern, firm, yet refined, type of man, while in the other, rough work and time appear to have left their marks upon his countenance, making it coarse.

His character is still a subject for debate among different classes in our British realm. To the hereditary monarchical and church party he is still an ambitious hypocrite, who sought his own exaltation at the expense of the Constitution, while to the man of moderate ideas and the Puritan party he is a hero, who, amid great dangers, sought the freedom and the glory of his country.

His detractors describe him as a man of mean origin, engaged in low pursuits. The fact is, he was by birth a gentleman, and came of a family, to use his own words, "living neither in any considerable height, nor yet in obscurity." He may be fairly described as coming of a knightly family. His great-uncle was Sir Henry Cromwell, known on account of his profuse hospitality as "the Golden Knight;" his uncle Sir Oliver received as his guest his sovereign, James I., and his maternal grandfather was Sir Thomas Steward.

He was born 25th April, 1599, at Huntingdon, and was educated at the Huntingdon Grammar School by a famous Puritan divine named Dr. Beard. Thence he went to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and at the death of his father, after having received some training for the Bar, he took up the management of the family property, and eventually married Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir James Bouchier, and settled down to the life of a country gentleman. He acted as a magistrate, and became first M.P. for Huntingdon, and afterwards one of the members of the famous Long Parliament, being returned for Cambridge.

There was nothing in his position in life which could lead him to desire to give up comfort and ease to follow the profession of a soldier, which he did at the age of forty-three years, and take the perilous path to the height of power as Lord Protector, except deep love of liberty and high-souled patriotism.

His interest in public affairs appears to have arisen out of a strong and passionate opposition which he raised in 1630 against the new charter granted to Huntingdon, because it placed the property of the Borough at the disposal of the Aldermen. In consequence of this opposition, he was summoned to London, and had to appear before the Council, but ultimately the matter was referred to Lord Manchester as arbitrator, who sustained his objections.

A few years afterwards his cousin, John Hampden, refused to admit the demand for ship-money made by an arbitrary writ of Charles I.; and in consequence of this, and other financial demands which the king made upon the people, an agitation was growing in the country against the conduct of the king.

Notwithstanding his victory over Hampden, the king was compelled to summon the Long Parliament, to which Cromwell was returned, and then commenced in 1642 the great war with his people which brought about the victory of the Parliament and the ruin of the king. At first Cromwell took small part in it, but seeing that the Parliament troops were beaten in every engagement, because most of them were old, decayed serving-men, and tapsters, and that kind of fellow, while the Royalist troops were gentlemen's sons, he endeavoured to form troops of devoted Christians who would fight for the great cause of the Parliament with all their hearts. The victories, memorable with Cromwell, of Dunbar and Worcester, and the reputation his Ironsides gained in Europe, will ever remain as a testimony to their valour and devotion.

Cromwell was essentially a religious man, and many of his letters which have been preserved and brought by Thomas Carlyle out of obscurity into the full light of day and modern criticism, show the true Christian spirit in which he lived and moved. Every act of his life he regarded as directed by Providence, and every success as the Lord's doing.

The political programme of the army which Cromwell eventually led is summed up by Mr. Frederic Harrison as Republicanism, Sovereignty of Parliament, Annual or Biennial Elections, Local Self-government, Codification of the Law, Complete Religious Liberty, and Equal Political Rights. Only one or two of these points have as yet been attained. The principal was the limitation of the power of the monarch, so that now the finances are absolutely in the power of the Commons of England, while the other is Local Self-government. We have yet to achieve the Codification of the Law, complete religious liberty and equal political rights.

Two great blots are said to stain Cromwell's memory. One is the treatment of the Irish Papists in Ireland; the other is the execution of Charles I. In dealing with the former he conceived himself to be executing justice and preventing an attempt "to constitute an independent government in the hands of the enemies of the religion and institutions of England." While in regard to the King (whom he had sought again and again to befriend), it is clear that Charles I. was utterly faithless to his country, his word was wholly unreliable, and that Cromwell looked upon the execution as an act of "cruel necessity," such necessity being to save Great Britain from the ruinous doctrine of "divine right" to govern as he pleased, which meant despotism.

When the Constitution was in ruins—the King dead, the House of Lords impotent, the people in perplexity, Cromwell was called by the voice of his Council of officers, and others who were tried and trusted, to be Lord Protector of the Commonwealth, and from that moment, December 16, 1653 to September 3, 1658, Cromwell was virtually the Sovereign of Great Britain, and he made the power of the country respected at home and abroad as it had never been respected before and seldom since. On September 3, 1658, after expressing the belief that

The rest of the acts of this hero are recorded in the pages of his life written by Carlyle, Picton, Harrison, and last but not least, by Dr. Horton, who has dedicated to the Free Churchmen of England, "a study in personal religion." May his gifted strength serve "To keep you true to God, your souls, and men."

VEN the most seasoned railway traveller must feel his interest gently stimulated as the Great Northern express whirls him past Huntingdon and St. Ives. For the moment the fit of drowsiness will leave him, or he momentarily lifts his eye from his newspaper to catch glimpses of the waters of the Great Ouse and the quiet towns on their banks. "Ah! this is Cromwell's country," he says, and what else he thinks will depend very much on the sort of man the thinker himself is, and the point of view he takes of past history and politics. By most of the readers of this Magazine, however, Oliver Cromwell will be regarded as "a king of men," and in no half-hearted manner will they take part in the celebration of his Tercentenary.

How some men have left their impress upon given localities! In Stratford-on-Avon you feel that Shakespeare pervades the very place. You are reminded of him wherever you go, and his name meets your eye and falls on your ear almost at every step. Now, Cromwell has not stamped himself on Huntingdon as Shakespeare has on Stratford, but yet, this border of the Fen region is emphatically Cromwell's country, and a deeply interesting country it is. May we not say that the Great Ouse is as the genius of this country? Not only on its banks are Huntingdon and St. Neots, where Cromwell resided, but Ely also with its memories of Canute and its fine cathedral borders the same river. And here, too, Cromwell lived for four years—from 1636 to 1640.

To the lover of liberty and to the Free Churchman, especially, no river of England—rich as our land is in historic streams—will call up more stimulating associations than does the Ouse. When we think of John Bunyan, Hampden, Cromwell and Cowper, whose names are linked with its dusky and slow-moving waters, we somehow feel that it is "our river," though we may have been born and bred on the banks of other and far distant streams.

The house where Oliver Cromwell was born on the 25th April, 1599, stood at the northern extremity of the town of Huntingdon, beyond the market-place and on the left or riverward side of the street. We say stood, for it has been twice rebuilt since that date, and "bears no memorial whatever which tradition can connect with him." Four days after his birth, as the baptismal register in All Saints' Church indubitably testifies, Oliver was christened. Over the entry, which is written in pedantic Latin, some one—probably a later Royalist incumbent—has penned the words, "England's plague for five years." But some other person, with quite another mind as to Cromwell, has run his pen through this unfavourable judgment. Very significant is all this as showing how Cromwell has served to divide men. They have to this day, as Picton puts it, "wrangled over his name and fame."

One other brief glimpse we possibly get of the future Lord Protector when the little lad was four years old. To catch this glimpse we have to transport ourselves to the fair mansion of Hinchinbrook, which stands a distance of some half-mile from Huntingdon, where the elder and lineal branch of the Cromwell family then resided, not without some show of opulence and state. Hinchinbrook had formerly been a nunnery (hence the Nun's bridge of our picture), but at the dissolution of the monasteries it was granted as a reward to one Richard Cromwell, the great-grandfather of our hero. This Richard Cromwell, (if that were really his name, and not rather Williams), was an attached and zealous helper of Thomas Cromwell, the Earl of Essex, the malleus monichorum. Such biographers as Carlyle and Picton are not agreed as to whether there were any blood relationship between chief and underling. But, be this as it may, the close connection between them may account for the assumption of the name—Cromwell. In any case, Sir named on account of his open-handedness and munificence, the "golden knight." Of this Sir Henry, the father of Oliver was the second son, and the more modest family property in Huntingdon fell to his share, while the eldest son, Sir Oliver, dwelt as Lord of the Manor in the ancestral mansion at Hinchinbrook. Sir Oliver seems to have inherited the high notions and expensive tastes of his father, "the golden knight"; for in 1627 he was obliged to part with the Manor House, and to take up his residence at another and humbler place that belonged to the family. This was at Ramsey, that lay farther in the Fen district. Probably one cause which helped to reduce Sir Oliver to these financial straits was his having had the privilege of entertaining royalty on two occasions.

The first occurred in 1603 when James I., on his way to take possession of the throne on the death of Elizabeth, was graciously pleased to accept his invitation to spend two nights and a day at Hinchinbrook. There were really high doings on the 27th and 28th of April, 1603, which Thomas Carlyle has described in his own graphic way in the recently posthumously published volume of his.* "Hinchinbrook, on Thursday, the 28th of April, 1603, was all in gala. Through the gulph of dead centuries we can still behold it, after a sort; look on it as with eyes. Hinchinbrook, while it was a nunnery, never saw such doings. Hinchinbrook has been a Manor House for half a century and more; it may become a nunnery, an iron-foundry, before it see the like again. The gates of Hinchinbrook are thrown open; the dignified courts of Hinchinbrook are filled with multitudes of nobility, gentry, respectable commonalty; and far and wide hovers and simmers, through Huntingdon streets and all heights and open spaces of ground, an extensive fluctuating crowd of human creatures, come from far and near to see this reed shaken by the wind. These are facts of the past tense; indubitable as the newest of the present. Thitherward we also, for reasons of our own, will hasten to have a look. . . . Of these thirty thousand or so, all bustling, jostling here, with eager eyes, in and about the Manor House of Hinchinbrook, and Borough of Huntingdon, there are not ten persons known to me by face; not three whom I could wish any of my friends to know. Each of them truly has a face; face, for that matter, traced with cares, hopes, character, complete series of life adventures; but they are strangers to me and History; they belong to brown Oblivion and others than me! Solely, or almost solely, among that fluctuating multitude which floods all Hinchinbrook in such deray and gala, we will note one little boy of four years old gone Tuesday last; led by his nurse-maid, as is like, and bustling to and fro, with due convenience, to all suitablest points of view, for seeing this solemnity; it is a nephew of Sir Oliver, the landlord; his own name is little Oliver, or Noll—poor little fellow! Mr. Robert Cromwell, from his mansion in the west end of Huntingdon; Mr. Robert Cromwell, next brother to the Knight of Hinchinbrook, and father to this boy; here a Dame Cromwell, who is a Steward from the Stuntney Stewards, and so of kin to this Scotch Majesty, are in the feast itself, I fancy, and Sir Thomas Steward, the Knight of Stuntney, and much other kindred, though unseen to me, are there; but this our little Oliver strolls about, I think, in a state of glad excitation, in the hand of his nurse-maid the while. Look at him, reader; him thou shalt look at. A broad-headed, bony-faced little fellow, with clear grey eyes; stout-made for his years; extremely full of wonder at present;—in what head-dress of leather or cloth cap, in what body-dress and breeches, doubtless his best cap and breeches, is entirely unknown to this Editor. O, Nolly-kin, my little man, how this unexpected sun-burst of the new Scotch Majesty has transported thy poor little incipient spiritual faculty, and thou art all one wide-eyed wonderment: was the like ever seen or dreamt of?"

It comes upon us almost with a shock of surprise to learn that on the very day when these festivities were going on at Hinchinbrook, good Queen Bess was being borne to her last resting-place in Westminster Abbey, amid the lamentations of thousands of London's citizens. Ever since the year 1627, Hinchinbrook has been the property of the Montagues, and it is still one of the most interesting mansions in the country—truly a “memory-haunted place.” Hanging in its rooms are fine portraits of Cromwell and his mother, painted by Walker.

One of the most interesting buildings in Huntingdon is the Grammar School. “The school as it now stands is the only remaining part of the institution entitled, ‘The Hospital of St. John the Baptist, founded by David, Earl of Huntingdon, in the twelfth century.’ It has undergone many changes, but still some of the original examples of Norman work remain.” One of these—an arch closed up—is shown in our illustration on p. 296. Oliver Cromwell’s connection with this school is undoubted. He was educated here under the famous Puritan preacher, Dr. Beard, until he (Cromwell) was transferred to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. Samuel Pepys, the immortal diarist, was also educated here, and a portrait of him, as well as two portraits of Cromwell, are preserved in the institution. Pepys, it should be observed, was born in the neighbouring village of Brampton. To Dr. Beard, his sometime preceptor, Cromwell seems to have been sincerely attached. The first letter of his in existence refers to Dr. Beard’s “Lectures,” and his first speech in Parliament was made in defence of Dr. Beard.

From 1631 to 1636, Cromwell resided at St. Ives, and then removed to Ely. By the death of his uncle, Sir Thomas Steward, a considerable change took place in his circumstances. Sir Thomas had farmed the tithes, and as his uncle’s heir he took possession of the house set apart for the tithe-farmer and became a man of substance and local repute until summoned to duty on a wider field. How manfully he did his duty it will do us all good, at this particular juncture, if we set to work to reconsider.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

IV. ON DUTY AS DELIGHT.

ORDSWORTH was curiously deficient in the sense of humour; and perhaps one of the nearest approaches that he makes to the manifestation of that quality is in the note which he prefixes to his fine "Ode to Duty." After telling us on what examples it was modelled, he proceeds: "Many and many a time have I been twitted by my wife and sister for having forgotten this dedication of myself to the stern law-giver. Transgressor, indeed, I have been, from hour to hour, from day to day: I would fain hope, however, not more flagrantly, or in a worse way than most of my tuneful brethren." Now comes the didactic mood again. "But these last words are in a wrong strain. We should be rigorous to ourselves, and forbearing, if not indulgent, to others, and, if we make comparisons at all, it ought to be with those who have morally excelled us." May I commend that last sentence to anyone "wagging his pow in a pu'pit" who wants to preach on "Judge not, that ye be not judged"?

But if Wordsworth lacked the saving grace of humour to quite a lamentable degree, he made up for that by sheer insight and by his capacity for looking at a moral matter precisely in its right relations. This "Ode to Duty," for example, which is our text to-day—how broad the balanced view, how perfect and supreme the art! It belongs to about the middle of the period of high productive activity to which Matthew Arnold rightly assigns all, or almost all, the poet's most enduring work. How clearly he envisages the moral ideal; the, as yet, unreachd goal of ethics, the joy of right living; the obedience which shall be glad, spontaneous, prompt and generous, when the conduct which is by common consent called good shall be sought and done with the whole heart; when righteousness shall be no longer a task but a song.

There are who ask not if thine eye
Be on them; who in love and truth,
Where no misgiving is, rely Upon the genial sense of youth:
Glad Hearts! without reproach or blot
Who do thy work, and know it not.

Serene will be our days and bright,
And happy will our nature be,
When love is an unerring light,
And joy its own security

Who does not see in that the high vision of the Old Testament psalmist—not David, he never dreamed of such heights, but—some genius of the days following the exile? Read the first psalm, and parts of the one hundred and nineteenth. "Blessed is the man whose delight is in the law of the Eternal: and in His law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the streams of water, that bringeth forth its fruit in its season, whose leaf also doth not wither, and in whatsoever he doeth he shall prosper." "Oh that my ways were established to observe Thy statutes. With my whole heart have I sought Thee; O let me not wander from Thy commandments. My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto Thy judgments at all times. Thy testimonies are also my delight, and the men of my counsel. I will run the way of Thy commandments when Thou shalt enlarge my heart. Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." Well may Montefiore write: "With the Jews after the Exile, the spiritual joys of the law crowded out the material joys of earth. What an enormous advance in the 119th Psalm—the hymn of the law—over the attitude of Deuteronomy. The lovers of the law had other and better things to rejoice about than that their wealth was great, or that their hand had gotten much. The spiritual satisfactions of the law were genuine and supreme. To the great bulk of the Jews the law was at once a privilege and a pleasure. It was the most precious and beloved gift of God's grace."

There are three chief stages of moral evolution. The first is that in which there is obedience to the requirements of external, social, legal, or theological enactments, written or unwritten, with all sorts of penalties, mostly accidental and capricious, associated therewith. This is the stage of the average sensual man. The outside pressure of social opinion, or of positive law, is almost the only motive power of virtue. Obedience is of constraint, not of willinghood, so much. Then comes a second period in which these outward rules and standards become to some extent organised in the individual conscience, restraining and directing. But still, obedience is not automatic or spontaneous. There is conflict in us all the while. "We know that the law is spiritual; but we are carnal, sold under sin. For that which I do I know not: for not what I would that do I practise: but what I hate that I do. To will is present with me, but to do that which is good is not. I find, then, the law that to me, who would do good, evil is present. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man: but I see a different law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity under the law of sin which is in my members." How graphic, and how true! There is not peace nor joy, but struggle, with defeat again and again. Obedience is still by compulsion; but it is now self-compulsion, so to speak; the pressure has simply been transferred from the external to the internal; from society to the awakened soul. But it is, all the same, pressure: resistance has to be overcome. Obedience halts; it does not run. There is the state of the average, spiritual man. But then comes, or ought to come, the third stage, the highest, to which a few royal souls have attained, and they but partially, the grand ideal of the "Ode," the one goal of the Bible, that spontaneous natural obedience, which is rendered in unhindered freedom, and accompanied by consummate gladness—the sense of being ever at one with the purpose of God and the sum and meaning of things—the state called the Witness of the Spirit, which by our artificial theologies we narrow and demean so much. The sense and love of right become so strong that they get to be independent, both of external compulsion, and of the individual will—do their own work of themselves, and need not the smallest intrinsic assistance.

Yes, there is the ideal, but alas! who of us has touched it? Wordsworth confesses to lapses—who dares say he has none? It is very notable that in each of the stanzas I have already quoted he ends by a suggestion of possible failure. After speaking of the "glad hearts" who do duty's behests without knowing it, he adds significantly—

Oh! if through confidence misplaced
They fail, thy saving arm, dread Power! around them cast.

Or, again: (stanza 3)

And they a blissful cause may hold
Even now, who, not unwisely bold,

Live in the spirit of this creed:

Yet seek Thy firm support, according to their need.

It is a timely and needed caution. For us, as yet, the air of those Alpine summits is rare and difficult. The poet is not sure of himself—as who could dare to be? He is no gross sinner, but saintliness he cannot claim.

Through no disturbance of my soul,
Or strong compunction in me wrought,
I supplicate for thy control:
But in the quietness of thought:
Me, this unchartered freedom tires:
I feel the weight of chance desires:

I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour;
Oh let my weakness have an end!
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice;
The confidence of reason give;
And in the light of truth thy Bondman let me live!

And here, in this confession of relative non-attainment, the psalmist is at one with the poet. The ideal state is still evidently an ideal unpossessed and unrealised. Like Paul he had been "apprehended" by it, but had not yet fully grasped it himself. He had a certain joy in righteousness, but it was not complete and absorbing. He walked more or less willingly, but he did not yet run, in the way of the holy law. "I will run," is his word, "when Thou shalt enlarge my heart." He had hid the word in his heart like a seed, but it had not yet burst forth into flower. His delight had been in spots, in isolated seasons, with long intervals of aridness, like the course of Australian rivers in times of drought. By snatches God's statutes had been his songs, but the night had not been so fully vocal as the day. "Quicken Thou me in Thy way," is his one passionate prayer. "Teach me Thy statutes. Give me understanding, and I shall keep Thy law, yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart. I have seen the end of all perfection, but Thy commandment is exceeding broad."

But, failure or no failure, the ideal holds. Like the snow-capped Jungfrau, it abides ever in sight, at once reproaching and inviting. And the distinction of it is that the latest science bids us aspire towards it, no less than the dreaming poet. Read Herbert Spencer's "Data of Ethics," and you hear the same clear high note. How he pours well-merited scorn on the conception that the mark of perfect ethics is only struggle and disagreeableness, and that these constitute the essence of the moral life. Struggle and strain are not the goal, they are but the temporary means. We tacitly worship the nasty, the nauseous, the unpleasant. We have a superstition that the more unpalatable the physic the more probable the cure. We think that this is a devil's world, organised on the principle that pleasures, per se, are baneful, and pains, per se, beneficial. We think the Eternal has so ordained it that what a man likes is always wrong, and what he dislikes always right. "Pleasant, therefore wrong" is our ascetic but wrong-headed logic. "I have been too happy to-day," said once such a mistaken martyr. Many wrong things are pleasant, but not necessarily wrong because pleasant. True, "there is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." But in the end righteousness and blessedness will be found entirely to coincide. It is true that often, for the time being, the sense of strain and effort is the test of walking in the right. You must row against the stream when the tide makes for the sea of death. But we are not "ever to be climbing up the climbing wave." We can have the tide with us, or, as the dream of the Apocalypse promises: "There shall be no more sea." Is the right ever to be a cross, a burden, and a sorrow? To the scientific moralist already mentioned, one lady once said of another: "I really think she does things because she likes to do them." And why should we not do things because we like to do them—when the things so done are right? God means to give you and me satisfactions for right living: to make—to quote the sage again—"love an unerring light and joy its own security." And so Spencer also signalises the true ideal state—in which good conduct will ultimately be pursued because men gain delight in pursuing it. The moral conduct will become the natural, the spontaneous conduct, yielding its due amount of pleasure in its normal activity. "The things now done with dislike from a sense of obligation will be done with immediate liking, and the things desisted from as a matter of duty will be desisted from because they are repugnant." The sense of mere obligation dies away. "It retreats into the background of the mind." Conscience, so often a canker, or so often an unpopular protesting representative of the Highest and the Best, whom we would fain stifle or dismiss, if we could, becomes a boon companion, a welcome assentor, or shall I say, one diffused bliss. It is no longer a harsh-voiced raven, croaking condemnation and disaster, but a sweet singing nightingale, filling the heart with gladness, and making even midnight melodious.

Does it startle you that I say the sense of obligation will pass and fade? It is only another way of putting Paul's truth: that ye are not under law but under grace. We are delivered from the law (discharged from it), being dead to that in which we were held. The commandment ceases to be a commandment in the coercive sense of the word. It ceases to be an external compulsive thing. It becomes organised, ingrained, instinctive. What is your "obligation"? Literally, it is a tie or bond which binds to, or in front of, something or some one. "Religion" comes from precisely the same root. Now let that suggest a little homely illustration. When you mend crockery or glass with patent glue you use a band or ligament to keep the cemented pieces together until the two have come to coalesce by the very force of the cement. Then you remove the string or band. It is no longer needed. Or take the common expression, "tied to his mother's apron strings." In the life of every true and truly trained son comes the day when, though all unconsciously it may be, the formal tie is dissolved, the strings shred insensibly away, but the end has been attained—the reverence for the best remains, and has its vital strength within itself.

You remember Paul's "paidagogos," (pedagogue)—not the schoolmaster or even tutor, as our versions have it,—but the slave who conducted the boy to school, saw that he went, and called to take him home again. "Wherefore law hath been our pedagogue to bring us unto Christ"—now that faith is come we are no longer under a pedagogue. "So long as the heir is a child he differeth nothing from a bond-slave, though he be lord of all. So we, when children, are held in bondage under the rudiments of the world, but when the fulness of the time comes God sends forth His Son . . . that we may receive the adoption of sons. And because we are sons God sends forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts. So that we are no longer bond-slaves, but sons; and if sons, then heirs through Christ." Recall Shakespeare's boy "creeping with shining morning face unwillingly to school." The "shining" is, of course, from the outward and not very welcome application of soap and water. But suppose some passion awakened, some spring of feeling touched in his soul, some revolution akin to that which Anthony Trollope describes in relation to himself when he felt as if something had burst in his brain, and his real intellectual life began. Then he runs, not creeps, and his "shining morning face" owes its light to an inward source which is perfectly independent of matutinal ablutions. "The bond-slave abideth not in the house for ever, but the son abideth ever. If, therefore, the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." "If ye love Me, ye will keep My commandments." There is an Incarnation even for us, and a baptism-voice, and the joy of sacrifice.

Though Christ a thousand souls in Bethlehem be born,
But not within thyself, thy soul will be forlorn:
The cross of Golgotha thou lookest to in vain,
Unless within thyself it be set up again.

There was a sound instinct, which did not quite know itself, in the demand of Persian monarchs that those who attended on them should wear a pleasant countenance. No man in sackcloth was to come within the precincts of the palace. And so when Nehemiah, bearing the cup, entered with a clouded brow, he was called to account and compelled to apologise for, and explain, his sad aspect. Service should ever be glad, to be at its highest. To the proverb which says, "It is the first step that costs," I would beg to add the complement: "It is the second that compensates." Tennyson, who received, to use his own words, "the laurel from the brows of him who uttered nothing base," (Wordsworth was his immediate predecessor, as you know, in that honorific, if not always honourable, function), has sung, in strains that own a passion which Wordsworth knew not, the very burden of our "Ode."

Not once or twice in our rough island-story,
The path of duty was the way to glory:
He that walks it only thirsting
For the right, and learns to deaden
Love of self, before his journey closes,
He shall find the stubborn thistle bursting
Into glossy purples, which outredde
All voluptuous garden-roses.
Not once or twice in our fair island-story,
The path of duty was the way to glory:
He that ever following her commands,

On with toil of heart and knees and hands,
Thro' the long gorge to the far light has won
His path upward, and prevail'd,
Shall find the toppling crags of Duty scaled,
Are close upon the shining table-lands,
To which our God Himself is moon and sun.

The passion and the colour are all Tennyson's own, but none who reads the "Ode" on which it has been our delightful duty to write this month can doubt for a moment whence have come the chief forces of his inspiration.

Stern Lawgiver! yet thou dost wear
The Godhead's most benignant grace!
Nor know we anything so fair
As is the smile upon thy face:
Flowers laugh before thee on their beds;
And fragrance in thy footing treads:
Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong:
And the most ancient heavens through thee are fresh and strong."

J. D. T.

The Methodist Minister's Wheel of Fate.

By REV. S. J. WALLIS.

III.—A TURN ON THE DAN-TO-BEERSHEBA DISTRICT.

HE turn of the wheel brings the minister to a station, which shall be nameless, on the well-known Dan-to-Beersheba district. Here he is surrounded by farmers and labourers as poor as the land they till, which (as our friends beyond the Channel would say) is all stones, the most fertile parts of which are the hills—hills so stony and thinly clad with soil, that you could not raise even an echo on them.

No wonder when his funds and his spirits are equally low, sometimes he thinks that it verily must be the land to which God banished Cain.

Here in the homes of the people he no longer lives, like a candle, on the fat of the land. But as ever, his people give of their best, with hearts big enough to give the world. Thus, his daintiest joint is a scraggy neck of mutton, which he knows is neck-or-nothing, or the forequarter of a sheep, that is the part which always comes through the hedge first, from which he may learn a lesson on sermonising, by copying his poor but kind hostess, who in preparing it for the table, never dishes up the tongue without the brains. As for his bed, it is no longer made of the down of stubble geese, but simply of stubble, and nothing of the geese, and upon which he might lie and read his Bible by the starlight through the thatch, but that he is compelled to sleep like a top, by turning round and round to ease his aching sides, until grey-eyed dawn, peeping in at the window, enables him to leave his bed to rest himself. As for the manse, it is a small, barely-furnished cottage, with low-browed ceiling, and low-browed windows. In a word, it is simply a little brick box, with a slate lid, and one of the best parsonages in England to—live out of.

Now that the Connexion is flourishing like a green bay tree, many of our people think that small, ill-furnished parsonages went out of date with the tall, sentry-box-like pulpit, straight, high-backed pews and seats that took a ladder to get into. Let us describe a manse in which we had to reside, within the last decade, and in which for thirty years our ministers often discussed tough mutton, and tougher theology on Sunday, and had to get through many a week-day with the parables and potatoes. We, with all our belongings, arrived at the house about tea-kettle time, at the sight of which our heart sank like water in the well at an earthquake's shock, for, sure, it was no place to dream in and write fairy tales. It was simply a labourer's cottage, weather-beaten and stained by the hand of time, and which seemed to suffer from agues in its constitution. This ancient habitation, which was too small to inhabit, and too big to hang to one's watch, had three tiny rooms upstairs, the smallest being used for a study (there was one other room—the room for improvement).

Lord Bacon has a punning remark, that a small room helps a studious man to condense his thoughts. We were not without such intellectual help. Our sanctum sanctorum, which we found inhabited by flies and mildew, was seven feet by five, with a little window about a foot square, through which a small thread of sunshine would find its way on bright summer days. At other times we had to be content with a sort of half-and-half light, like a room with the blinds down. When friends came to stay the night, it was here we had to make our bed, which had this advantage, that we could not tumble out of it, seeing there was nowhere to tumble.

However, like Isaac of old, we had a more pleasant and spacious study in the fields and lanes of the country, which, next to the Book Divine, is to us the holiest teacher; for God writes the Gospel, not in the Bible alone, but on trees and flowers, on the clouds and stars, and this is a study we can all use, however small the one in our house may be. Downstairs, the sitting-room was so small, that as nature had made us too tall for one man, and not tall enough for two, we had to sit with one leg twisted round the other, fearing to occupy more space than was equitable. The front door of the breezy old dwelling was so full of chinks, that at times it seemed to be visited by all the four winds of heaven at one moment, causing loose papers to flutter about like butterflies, reminding us how "The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decayed, Lies in new lights, through chinks that time has made."

When, as some hold, Bacon wrote Shakespeare's plays for him, he made one of his characters say, "List, list, O list!" To exclude draughts, and neuralgia, that is what we had to attend to. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," and man listeth wheresoever the wind bloweth. Had the village doctor lived in this ramshackle old building, the paint which stood up in huge blisters on the front door would have been a splendid advertisement for him.

Frogs which had lost their way, and taken the wrong turning, were surprised to find themselves in the midst of our parlour; but they seemed to be quite at home amidst the moisture of the place, for it was so damp that even our sermons would not keep dry in it.

But to check the murmur and the sigh when thinking of our poor diminutive abode, we remembered how one canvas tent sufficed to lodge Napoleon; how Nelson guided the fleets of England from one little cabin; how Milton, who sang with all the sweetness of a seraph, and discoursed with all the wisdom of a sage, lodged in a rustic cot at Chalfont, and how He who filleth immensity, and whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, dwelt in Joseph's humble cottage. Nor did we forget the fathers of the Connexion, who often had not only dinnerless days, but shelterless nights, who with the key of the street, and nothing else in the pocket, would sometimes turn into a hay-loft and find it Eden in their dreams, and who sometimes had to put up at the Hotel of the Beautiful Star, which is open to all comers, and were hungry enough to have given the great Bear for a slice of bacon, but who in all their wanderings and trials, felt that they were hidden beneath the hollow of the hand of Him, who is the Star of Jacob, and from whom all stars borrow their shining. Thus, with the green turf for their bed, and their only roof the blue bowl of the sky, they lay down to dream of heaven and the promised crown.

Connexional Biography.

REV. JOHN HIRST.

THE Rev. John Hirst was born at Barwick, in Elmet, a village about six miles from Leeds, May 11th, 1803, and died at Sheffield, September 30, 1898. It is not given to many to begin with a century and see almost its end. John Hirst saw the present century when it was only three years old, and he had the distinction of staying in it to within two years and a few months of its close. He was born before the Connexion existed of which he was afterwards to be a respected and useful minister. What a different England—from that we see to-day—was the England of the second decade of this century, when John Hirst toddled along the streets of Barwick, and now and again went sightseeing to Leeds; different in all respects, but chiefly in educational matters. The working classes in those days had few privileges, some hardships, and many difficulties. As soon, and long before they were well able, such as John Hirst had to earn their own living in the best way open to them. It is surprising how some faced and conquered difficulties, and by a process of training and discipline became ministers of the Word of God, meeting the requirements of the times, and ministering to the needs of men.

It was no ordinary advantage of our departed friend to have had industrious, frugal, and pious parents, who were decided in their convictions, and generous in their sympathies, and withal, staunch supporters of the Church of England. Nevertheless, when Providence opened the way they allowed the pioneers of the Connexion to hold religious services in their house. A society class was formed, of which they were among the first members, and under pressure, Mr. Jas. Hirst, the father of this sketch, became the leader; and in this manner they, with others, formed the nucleus of our Church at Barwick.

In these circumstances, John Hirst was a subject of constant religious influence and serious conviction. He was confirmed at the age of fourteen years at Leeds Parish Church. At the age of eighteen, in a cottage prayer meeting, held in his father's house, he felt the uplifting influence of a regenerate life. The young man had a vision of the Lord Jesus, and was obedient to the heavenly call. On a confession of faith in the Saviour, he became a member of our Church. When twenty years of age he was made a local preacher, and entered the itinerancy in the year 1826. Toward the close of this year he left home for Hull, where he had the privilege of staying with the Venerable William Clowes, and to share his bed for sleep. John was delighted with the good man's conversation—chaste, pure, spiritual—and would have talked all night, but the old gentleman quietly reminded him that "he had come to bed to sleep and not to talk." Thus ended the conversation to the young man's great disappointment. One night only with Clowes, then off to Great Driffield, where John Hirst entered upon his life's work. Sweet were the memories, and precious indeed to him were these days. To the last, whenever Driffield was named, his bright and cheerful countenance would glow with delight as pleasant memories were awakened and dwelt upon in conversation.

From Driffield he removed to Bridlington, Filey, and Flambro', with other places sharing his useful labours. He was next appointed to Scotter, in Lincolnshire; afterwards he laboured with considerable success at Thorne, Westgate, Alston, and Leeds, until the year 1830. During this period he did real pioneer work, and at some of the already named places he formed societies. Subsequently he was stationed at Pickering, Barnard Castle, Westgate, and Alston, Kendal, Penrith Mission, Hull, Pontefract, Malton, Nottingham, Chesterfield, Boston, Horncastle, Nottingham (second time), Derby, Rotherham, Leicester, Belper, Chesterfield (second time), Rotherham (second time), Ripley, and Uttoxeter.

The most important social event of John Hirst's life took place when on June 13, 1830, at Leeds Parish Church, he was united in marriage to the only daughter of Robert and Sarah Howson, of Darlington, members of the Society of Friends, the young Quakeress having made her choice to serve God in fellowship with our people. At a proper age she carefully and prayerfully considered and accepted the offer of marriage; and accordingly she was united in holy wedlock with John Hirst, in the firm conviction and belief that it was of God, and though the action was beset with difficulty and trial, yet the conviction remained with increased strength to the end of life that it was of God. Mrs. Hirst herself was a good preacher, a remarkable class-leader, specially useful in the sick-room, and equal almost to every condition of life. From the home of these two devoted servants of God have come sons and daughters for character, spiritual life, service to the Church, and loyalty to the Connexion, rare and honourable. There are nine children, all of whom are in Church fellowship, two grandsons are in the ministry, the Rev. J. H. Hirst, now of Burnley, and T. Graham, of Stewkley; and two grand-daughters married Wesleyan missionaries and are now in Jamaica. One of the early experiences in Mr. Hirst's married life was to entertain Hugh Bourne in his travels to promote and consolidate the young and growing Church. This he ever looked upon as a distinction and favour to have had such a servant of God in his home and fellowship.

In the year 1861 Mr. Hirst's health gave way, and consequently he was superannuated. It must have been a great source of comfort to him during those long years of retirement to know that, through the whole of his ministry, only one circuit had to report a decrease of members, and even that was accounted for satisfactorily. During these years of forced retirement, according to his strength and opportunity, he did useful work, and was a real help to his brethren in the full work of the ministry. He was always a laborious worker, a good and faithful preacher, an agreeable colleague, a fair business man, an affable friend, and one who thoroughly enjoyed the means of grace. He was a good man, deeply in earnest, loyal to the Connexion, and generous to a fault. In manner he was sober, bright, and cheerful. He possessed a most interesting and natural vein of humour. He had natural tendencies and was physically constituted to be good. He seemed from early life to have been one of those who had scarcely ever gone astray, yet he entertained no fallacy about the Christian life; he was satisfied the words of the Saviour, "Ye must be born again," were as applicable to him as to any one. The Rev. J. Slater says: "It has been my privilege and pleasure to be a personal and intimate friend of the late Rev. J. Hirst for over ten years. I have been in the same class with him for over five years, and as to his regularity of attendance I can bear my testimony. His words also at such meetings were pointed, unctuous, powerful, and mellow. His intense devotion to God and the cause of God, the tenderness of his conscience, his consideration for others, his generous sympathy in cases of need, his dignified and gentlemanly bearing, his influence for good upon his family and others, I have seldom seen equalled, and never excelled." The Rev. J. Gair writes: "My knowledge of the Rev. John Hirst dates back to September, 1865, when I came to Sheffield First Station as a probationer. Mr. Hirst had been superannuated for a few years, and hence had taken root in Sheffield and become useful in many ways at Bethel Chapel, and in the circuit. He was a model superannuated minister. He attended the official meetings occasionally, and was an influence that made for peace and spiritual progress. Mr. Hirst was an excellent preacher. My experience with him enabled me to understand the power of our old preachers in dealing with the people and leading them to Christ. When I came to John Street as superintendent in 1885 I was pleased to find my old friends, Mr. and Mrs. Hirst, members of the society at John Street. I had to lift the heavy cross of being their leader. It was always a spiritual feast to hear the rich and mature experience of Mr. Hirst, and to know that never in extreme old age did he lose his child-like trust in God his Saviour. Mr. Hirst lived long, but not too long. In old age he gave a splendid illustration of the way in which God can keep a Christian sweet and wholesome, though he may live to nearly a hundred." The Rev. W. Barker, in a letter of sympathy to the family, says: "When I travelled in Sheffield Fifth Circuit I ever found your father and mother to be high types of all that is Christly and good. The influence of their unostentatious piety has been cherished as a precious memory for over twenty years." From the Rev. J. Bradbury, on behalf of the Sheffield Fifth Circuit, and the Rev. S. A. Baron, for the Ministerial Association of the Nottingham and Sheffield Districts, the following was received: "We rejoice that your father was spared so long, and came to his grave in a ripe old age. We remember with gratitude the years of faithful service he rendered to the Church of his choice during its decades of struggle and conflict, and laborious toil for the conversion of the people on the circuits on which he laboured. His godly life and consistent blameless character, his devoted zeal and earnest piety are a heritage treasured by all who knew him. It is our earnest prayer that the same distinction and zeal and godliness may come to all of us."

The last religious service at which our dear old, and now glorified, friend was present was the class meeting. This means of grace he highly prized and regularly attended until within a few weeks of his death. We heard his last testimony: it was radiant, full of unction, and told in a few choice words. It was a pleasure to see and hear him. He was, indeed, near heaven, without a doubt or fear to trouble him, full of faith and strong in God. By his side sat his faithful daughter Emily, who invariably accompanied him to his class, and since the death of her mother watched with incessant care his every interest.

Death came at last to put a period to those ninety-five years of life and service. Mrs. Stuart, his daughter, said, "Father, you have no fear, have you?" His prompt reply was, "Oh dear, no, to die would be heaven." To the last he found comfort in repeating God's Word, and parts of favourite hymns. When consciousness was failing him, these words were upon his lips:—

"I'll praise my Maker with my breath,
And when my voice is lost in death,
Praise shall employ my nobler powers;
My days of praise shall ne'er be past,
While life and thought and being last,
Or immortality endures."

John Hirst had no need in his last hours to make haste. He had long been preparing for his Lord's coming. He had seen the salvation of God, and in peace he departed this life in sure and certain hope of life eternal.

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileged beyond the common walks of life,
Quite on the verge of heaven."

Many sympathising friends were present on Monday, Oct. 3, 1898, when our friend's mortal remains was laid to rest in Sheffield General Cemetery. The Revs. Jas. Shaw, J. Bradbury, G. T. Chappell, W. Cutts, J. Slater, S. S. Henshaw, T. Campey, W. Tingle, and W. Barker were present, and took part in the service. On Thursday, November 17, a deeply impressive memorial service was held in John Street Chapel, conducted by the circuit ministers, assisted by the Rev. J. Slater.

JAS. SHAW.

MR. JOHN GIBBONS.

JOHN GIBBONS, whose loss we mourn, was born at Brampton on 14th March, 1829, of humble parentage. He had but little opportunity of gaining much education in his early days.

Speaking of his mother, to whose influence and training he owed very much, he has often been heard to say she was a good woman. On the death of his mother he appears to have lost to some extent the guiding influence of his life, but was mercifully preserved from falling into gross wickedness. When twenty-nine years of age he was convinced of sin. The text which ever after remained engraven upon his memory, was, "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." On the following morning before partaking of food, he pulled off his cap as he sat on the boiler edge, and asked a blessing—the first prayer he had put up. The act attracted the notice of one of the workmen, who said, "Hullo, Jack, have you got converted?" To which he replied, "No, but I've got convinced." About a fortnight after this he realised the assurance of his acceptance with God in a class meeting held at Bro. G. Hodgkinson's, singing with all his heart, and realising the truth fully, "My eternal choice is made—Christ for me." He at once joined the class and remained a consistent member of the Connexion ever since (thirty-nine years). From that time the Bible became his constant companion, for not only did he read it at home, but he kept a copy of the Scriptures in the Pottery in order that he might consult its sacred pages in his spare moments. He also at once took his place in the Sunday School, and, in spite of his lack of early education, by astutely employing the elder children in the class to correct the younger ones, and directing those who knew their letters to spell their own names in the alphabet, he successfully overcame difficulties until he gradually rose to the higher classes in the school. He has often said that when he first entered the school, he looked upon the post of superintendent of the school as a most honourable and dignified position, and resolved in his own mind that by the grace of God he would qualify himself to fill it at some time—which position at the time of his death he had filled most honourably and usefully for the long space of thirty-one years. His love for the school and the work of teaching the young was a love that stood second only to the love he had for his family and his home. Through the whole of the years he has not been known to be absent from his post except in the case of affliction, and the one Sunday in the year which he playfully used to call his holiday Sunday, but even on that day he would be with the teachers and scholars in spirit. The International lesson for the Sunday was always carefully read through many times during the week, and by the aid of the "Teachers' Assistant," notes were made on the lesson. His regularity and punctuality of attendance were such that it has been said by a person living on the road to the school, that he was accustomed to set his clock on the Sunday morning by Mr. Gibbons passing the window on his way to the school. The last occasion of his leaving home was a visit to the school about a fortnight before his death, and although suffering from the terrible pain of cancer in the mouth, he took his place as the superintendent, and opened the service of the Bourne League (the senior part of the school), and would have made the distribution of the prizes given for attendance, but the difficulty he experienced in speaking so as to be clearly understood, and the pain he suffered was so great that he was compelled to relinquish the task, and the secretary requested the son, Mr. John Gibbons, Junr., who was present, to undertake the work. The prize due to himself was handed to him by Mr. Henry Lowe, who made some touching references to the work he had done, and the deep sympathy the members of the League had for him in his affliction, and thus he fitly completed the work which had been the work of his life, the joy of his heart, and returned home to await the summons of the Master to the reward of the faithful worker which came a few days later.

Besides the work of the school, he filled many other offices of trust and usefulness in the church, having been school treasurer for many years, a successful class-leader for twenty-two years, and an active trustee of several chapels in the circuit.

In his business relations with men he was strictly honest, upright, and reliable. Some of the merchants with whom he did business have written letters of condolence to the widow and family in which they express their high appreciation of his integrity. Whilst the respect he had gained in the neighbourhood was amply testified to by the fact that Messrs. Robinson and Co., as a testimony of their esteem and respect, closed their large works for an hour on the day of the funeral to allow their numerous workpeople to attend the service held at the chapel.

But if it is true that a man is what he is at home, we find that our deceased brother's home-life bore ample testimony to the genuineness of his Christian profession. In his attention to Church matters he did not forget his duties as the head of the household. The family altar was no strange thing in his home, nor were his family prayers so long and tedious as to have an injurious rather than a beneficial influence on the children. He once said to me: "My children never had their knees ache because of my long prayers at the family altar." He had a good natural perception of the most prudent course to take with children, and well knew that a short prayer at such a time was most likely to effect its object. The 103rd Psalm was a great favourite with him, and was frequently selected for the Sunday morning reading, after which it was his custom to pray for his wife and his children by name until the grandchildren came upon the scene, claiming a share, when the general petition, "Bless the children" took its place; but as one of the family says, "He little knew that he himself was the greatest blessing they could have, and that the fear of giving him pain was the greatest restraint they knew."

He delighted in close meditation with God, and in the first half hour of the morning before opening his place of business, as he sat in his chair before the fire with his Bible and his God, he gathered the heavenly manna for the daily strength of his soul.

His generosity of heart was very great, and not even his dearest friends will ever know how much he gave to help the needy and the suffering. The poor, the widow, and the fatherless have been heard to say, "I shall miss John Gibbons." He undoubtedly had his faults and imperfections, which is but to say he was human; none knew of these more than himself, but his trust was alone in the merits of his Saviour, and the blood which cleanseth whiter than snow.

About a year before his death he was stricken with a severe affliction, but in answer to prayer and by the blessing of God upon the means used, he recovered. A short time ago cancer in the mouth developed, and his sufferings were most excruciating, but he bore them all with the greatest patience and Christian fortitude, and frequently by the exertion of his great will power restrained the manifestations of suffering lest he should increase the pain of his relatives around him. The Lord in His great mercy, however, graciously took him to Himself before the full and terrible effects of the cancer had developed, and thus avoided the outward disfigurement of the face which must undoubtedly have taken place had he lived much longer, and have intensified his sufferings, and given increased sorrow to his relatives and friends. A few days before his death, speaking to his eldest daughter, he said: "Mary Ann, I am going home; I have won my prize." She replied, "I wish, father, I were going," when he answered, "You can't go yet, my lass, you must win the prize. It will take a lot of struggling for and praying for." On Thursday he wanted the window opening that the angels might come in, and would not be appeased until the door was opened, when he said, as his face lit up with holy joy, "They have come, and Jesus is with them." Having prayed earnestly for his wife and family, the last words he was heard to utter were a prayer for his loved Church, "God bless Mount Zion." On the Saturday morning, January 16, he passed away without a struggle or a moan, the spirit in its flight leaving a sweet smile upon the lips as they closed in death. Many are the testimonies to his worth, from which a few selections might be given. A former minister writes: "He was a good man, an earnest worker, a zealous supporter, and an efficient official." A friend, in a beautifully touching letter, says: "Looking at what he accomplished in a quiet homely way, we feel that life is worth living, and that the greatest happiness we can have comes from the joy of service."

On Tuesday, January 19th, the funeral service was conducted in the Mount Zion Chapel, which was filled in every part, the organist playing, "O rest in the Lord," as the coffin was borne in. The ministers taking part in the ceremony being Rev. M. B. Stamp, the superintendent of the circuit, Rev. J. Lockhart, of Chesterfield First, and Rev. S. Barker, of Clay Cross. At the close of the service, "The Dead March in Saul" was played whilst the coffin was removed, the Rev. M. B. Stamp taking the service at the grave-side in St. Thomas' Churchyard, where the body of our deceased brother rests until the morning of the resurrection. On Sunday evening, February 14th, the memorial sermon was preached by Rev. M. B. Stamp to a crowded and deeply moved congregation, from Acts xi. 24. "A good man and full of the Holy Ghost."

MISS MARY SALT.

PRESTON BROOK SOCIETY, in the Preston Brook Circuit, has suffered a severe loss by the death of Miss M. Salt. Her earthly day ebbed out on November 14th. She had attained the ripe age of ninety years when her promotion to the higher service of heaven took place. Her connection with our Church at Preston Brook dated from about 1820, and for above seventy years she was an energetic and consistent member. She lived with her cousin, (Mr. W. M. Salt), who for over half a century was an indefatigable worker in the capacities of class-leader, local preacher, and circuit steward. He took great interest in aggressive work, and spared neither time nor money to extend the Redeemer's Kingdom among men. His death took place in 1882. The principal part of his estate was left for the benefit of his cousin during her lifetime, and at her death a considerable sum comes to the circuit for evangelistic work. The old home is quite historic. It was a constant resort of Hugh Bourne and William Clowes when out in the district on preaching excursions. Miss Salt had very vivid and correct recollections of the person, work, and sayings of those holy men of God. Her decease will appeal to a large circle of ministers and laymen, as hundreds have enjoyed her hearty and liberal hospitality. No tribute that we can bear to her memory will be too great. She was a fine specimen of womanhood. Her life was charged with a tenderness and gentleness which irresistibly enchained you. There was no parade or ostentation about her, it was a quiet, deep, spiritual life. You never heard complainings or faultfindings, she was always looking for the good properties, never trying to make life more difficult by carping criticism, but endeavouring to make life easier and better by kind words, sound wisdom, and the influence of a life hid with Christ in God. It would require the pen of a ready writer to adequately describe her life. The predominant feature in her life was pure-mindedness. Her mind was constantly occupied by exalted thought, and it was seen in the utter unselfishness, deep piety, transparent character of her life. Loyalty to the Church that led her to Christ stood out prominently. In this her life was exemplary in a high degree. She was not one to shirk responsibility, but ever ready to shoulder it. While she lived her generous hospitality was ever at the disposal of God's servants; and her liberality pure and unstinted. Our sister knew why she was a Christian. She had a settled hope in her heart. Her great concern was to carry out the Scriptural injunction, "Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." In accordance with her own wish her mortal remains were conveyed and laid to rest in Ellaston Churchyard, Staffs. A memorial service was conducted by the Rev. W. Moore, and was largely attended. We pray God to comfort the bereaved relatives. May the preciousness of her memory incite us to emulate her saintly character.

The Starry Crown. A Sketch of the Life-Work of Harriett E. H. Urmiston. Edited by the Rev. George Everard, M.A. With portraits and illustrations. (5s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

How varied are the fields of Christian service! To some it is given to cultivate but a narrow plot of ground, while to others the field is only limited by the limits of their far-extended travels. So it was with Mrs. Urmiston. As the wife of Colonel Urmiston, himself a devoted Christian, she spent five-and-twenty of the best years of her life in India. Beginning as a cadet in the East India Company's service, Colonel Urmiston was soon transferred to the civil department. In 1854, he became assistant commissioner in the Punjab, and until 1875, when he retired, he was in charge of various important districts. During the anxious times of the Indian Mutiny Colonel Urmiston was political commissioner at the court of the Maharajah of Kashmir, and, under circumstances of exceptional difficulty, succeeded in keeping the Maharajah loyal to the British crown. Mrs. Urmiston shared the experiences of her husband, and thus was "in journeyings often." We get many vivid glimpses of Anglo-Indian and native life in these pages, and although, in regard to the former, it may be true that frivolity and amusement largely prevail on the stations, yet it is cheering to find that true earnest religion has its witnesses amongst the officers, (civil and military), and soldiers and their families. And truly, Anglo-Indians, of all people, should take serious views of life and its responsibilities, if for no other reason than that their hold of life is, as these pages show, a very uncertain one. While in India, and especially while at Rawal Pindee and Murree between 1868 and 1874, Mrs. Urmiston did a good work amongst the soldiers as well as amongst those of her own class. In fact she became a preacher of no mean order. The impression she made upon her hearers and her influence were still further deepened by her more private endeavours to do good constantly carried on. She visited hospitals, military prisons, orphan asylums; she held drawing-room meetings, would talk about good things with a knot of soldiers on the road, and would arrange for the guest to be placed by her side at table whom she thought she could help into the light. No wonder that officers spoke of her with reverence and admiration, and that many of the private soldiers would willingly have died for her. Her enthusiasm in Christian service showed no abatement when with her husband she returned to England. Until she fell the first victim of the typhoid epidemic at Maidstone on Sept. 4, 1898, she was incessantly engaged in work for the Master.

Frequently she addressed upwards of fifty meetings in a single year in various parts on behalf of the women of India. Between 1878 and 1879 she gave thirteen addresses at Mile End Assembly Hall, each time to 1,600 people. She laboured amongst soldiers at Portsea, Gosport and Aldershot; she went on missions to the rural districts, and assiduously worked her own parish district.

Mrs. Urmiston's Christianity was of a very robust and attractive type. Though a true Churchwoman all her life, she had no sympathy with the errors and vagaries of ritualism, and on the other hand she was in heartiest sympathy with Evangelical Christianity wherever found. If one could but feel that the Church of England had an increasing number of adherents within her pale of the type of Colonel and Mrs. Urmiston, it would, in these ominous times, give us a better hope of that Church's future.

For the Lord's Table. A Book of Communion Addresses. By the REV. CHARLES JERDAN, M.A., LL.B. (5s.) Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, Edinburgh and London.

IN Scotland Sacramental occasions continue to be, as they have so long been, solemn and inspiring seasons. In this goodly volume we have no less than fifty Sacramental addresses brought together. And yet we fail to notice any sameness or repetition. The variety and freshness so observable confirm the author's words: "It is not too much to say, indeed, that in the number and variety of its uses the Holy Supper stands pre-eminent among Christian institutions." We have read with interest the two addresses on "The Lord's Supper, a Seal," and "The Real Presence." Mr. Jerdan may not go as far as Drs. Dale or Forsyth in his explication of these aspects of the Lord's Supper. More than once Mr. Jerdan seems to insist that the Lord's Supper is a divinely appointed memorial of an absent Saviour; but, as he is careful to show, if there is in this ordinance "a real absence, there is also a real presence," it is clear that it is the corporeal presence of Christ alone that is wanting. Reality surely must be predicated of that spiritual presence of Christ which, as he observes, is "the glory of the Festival."

The Doctrine of the Lord's Supper Cleared from Certain Misconceptions. By JOHN JAMES STEWART PEROWNE, D.D., Lord Bishop of Worcester. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C. THE Bishop of Worcester's volume comes at an opportune moment, and is very welcome. It shows there are some Abdiels still left on the Episcopal bench who are not afraid to speak out in the present crisis, and who unite learning with faithfulness to primitive and Protestant truth. Dr. Perowne's contention in this book—and the contention is supported by valuable Appendices, giving the views of the standard divines of the Established Church on the true nature of the Lord's Supper—is that “the doctrines of the Real Presence and the Sacrifice in the Eucharist, as they are now commonly taught by too many clergymen, by some men of learning and position in the Church of England, are contrary to God's Holy Word, have no support in primitive antiquity, and are at variance with the plain teaching of the Church of England.” Dr. Perowne deals also with such questions as the Eastward Position; Evening Communion; Fast-day Communion; Daily Communion and Non-Communicating Attendance. In each case he takes a common-sense and non-superstitious view. But such questions as these stir only a languid interest in the minds of Nonconformists.

A Commentary on the First Epistle of St. John. In the Form of Addresses. By ERNST DRYANDER, D. Th. Translated and Edited by Rev. W. O. E. Oesterley, M.A. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THIS is a devotional commentary that may be unreservedly commended. The addresses are spiritual and searching. It is clear that Dr. Dryander is an eloquent preacher; it is equally clear that the book owes considerably to the translator, who has rendered it into admirable English. It is to be wished that the Commentary may fall into the hands of those for whom it is intended, viz.—to use the translator's words—“The serious-minded, the thoughtful, to whom religion—i.e., the bond between them and their God—is the most important thing on earth, and who therefore read religious books with the heart as well as with the mind.”

The Holy Land in Geography and in History. (Two Volumes.) By TOWNSEND MACCOUN, M.A., Member of the American Historical Association, Fellow of the American Geographical Society. (7s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THESE books have been especially designed to meet the needs of Sunday School teachers and religious instructors generally. The most striking and valuable feature about these books is the maps and plates, one hundred and forty-five in number, the accuracy of which is guaranteed by the fact that they are largely taken from the survey maps of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and which are exceedingly well executed. The text accompanying these maps is brief and suggestive, and in the book on geography the references to the latest discoveries, both scientific and archæological, are especially valuable. The many references to, and quotations from, other writers of repute will also greatly help any one who desires to follow up certain lines of inquiry.

Light on the Weary Path. A continuation of “Rifted Clouds.” The Life Story of Bella Cooke. A Record of Loving-Kindness and Tender Mercies. Edited by the Rev. Joseph Pullman, D.D. (3s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

IT is fifteen years since “Rifted Clouds” was given to the world, and abundant testimony is forthcoming as to the influence for good that story of conquest over pain and weakness has produced on many minds. Of the English issue we learn that four editions have been called for. “Light on the Weary Path” is the continuation of “Rifted Clouds,” and, so far as we know, Mrs. Cooke's life-story is not yet ended. But who is Bella Cooke, and wherein lies the charm and power of her life? The answer can soon be given. For forty-one years she has been confined to her room and bed; but though a confirmed invalid, and one of God's “shut-ins,” her calmness, cheerfulness and joy through all these years of chamber-imprisonment often accompanied with great pain have been such as would be remarkable, even in those who should possess unbroken health and all outward advantages. The shining of her countenance but manifests the peace dwelling within. Nor is this all: what makes her experience almost paradoxical is that, despite her physical suffering and helplessness, she has been through all these years a tireless worker for the good of others. Constantly and methodically she has distributed amongst the poor the money that has been sent her for philanthropic purposes. She has cared for poor children and for the unfortunate and distressed. To her bright room, as to a temple, people of all classes and of all creeds have come by many hundreds in the course of the year to catch inspiration from her words and presence. It is a wonderful story altogether, a story telling of the power of Divine grace in and over weakness and suffering. To most of us such a story will come as a rebuke as well as an encouragement.

A Handbook for the Methodist New Connexion, containing Information of its Doctrines, Ministers, Churches, Institutions, Legal Relations, etc. Prepared by order of Conference by W. J. TOWNSEND, D.D. (1s. 6d.) Geo. Burroughs, 30, Fumival Street, Holborn.

WE have for some time been acquainted with the late Rev. W. Baggaly's “Digest of the Minutes, Institutions, etc., of the Methodist New Connexion,” (1861 and 1876), and have often wished that as a Connexion we had a book of like character. Dr. Townsend's Handbook largely follows the lines adopted in the “Digest,” though, owing to the necessity of compression, some interesting information has had to be omitted. Amongst the features of the Handbook which make it extremely useful are an Alphabetical Arrangement of Ministers and their Circuits; List of Deceased Ministers with the year in which they began their ministry and the year in which they died; Consecutive Conferences, with the names of the President and Secretary of each, and a brief record of anything for which the Conference was most noteworthy. We have also the names of those who have been Guardian Representatives since the year 1846, when the Deed Poll of the Connexion was adopted; also the names of those who have served on the Stationing Committee since 1803. In addition to this valuable historical information, all needful particulars are given as to the progress of the Connexion, its Committees, Institutions, etc. Lastly, we have information of a legal character, and various Forms of Service. We congratulate our New Connexion friends on having such a complete and handy compend, and wish that we could be similarly congratulated.

The Master's Blesseds. By J. R. MILLER, D.D. (2s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

FRESH works from the pen of Dr. Miller are always welcome for the cheer and inspiration they ever contain. This devotional study of the Beatitudes is no exception. The reader will, in these simple expositions find comfort and help in his strivings to attain the true Christian character as set forth by Christ in these golden sentences. Special mention must be made of the excellent printing and binding of this book. Each page has an exceedingly tasteful decorative border in a pale delicate shade of mauve, which give a pleasing effect to the book.

Songs of Hope and Love. By T. W. PITT. (2s. 6d.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

MUCH pleasure will be derived from these poems by any one who is fond of verse. They show depth of feeling and keen observation of nature and things. Their key-note is that of hope and faith. Many passages like the following may be met with, showing the writer's deep faith in the all-powerful goodness and Fatherhood of God.

"Thank God! We know that everything
Together works for one great good;
The nights of pain and sorrow bring
The morning's joyous plenitude."

Seven Strong Towers: The Refuge for Weak and Suffering Friends, to whom this little Book is dedicated. By LADY ALICIA BLACKWOOD. (1s., postage 3d.) Palestine House, Bodney Road, Hackney Downs, London, N.E.

THE self-righteous, and the strong and successful, may find little in this book to attract them, though even they will meet nothing in its pages to repel. It is, however, specially designed for the weak and suffering who, perhaps, have for long "named the name of the Lord," but who now in the time of their depression and need, would fain find the Name of the Lord to be a strong Tower. Then in the chamber of sickness, or in the retirement of the closet, this book will point the way to strength and comfort. The "Seven Strong Towers" alluded to in the title are the sevenfold names of Jehovah, viz., Jehovah Jireh—the Lord will provide; Jehovah Rophi—the Lord that healeth thee; Jehovah Nissi—the Lord my Banner; Jehovah Mekaddish-Kem—the Lord that doth sanctify you; Jehovah Tsidkenu—the Lord our Righteousness; Jehovah Shammah—the Lord is there. The book is most copious in its references to Scripture, and every such reference is clearly indicated in the margin. A volume like this is not to be criticised, but to be used. It has its mission, and the thing is to get it into the hands of those to whom it will come as a blessing.

Echoes from the Old Evangel. By F. HARPER, M.A., Rector of Hinton Waldrist, Faringdon. John F. Shaw and Co., 48, Paternoster Row, E.C.

MR. HARPER here gives us seventeen very short sermons that are intensely evangelical in teaching and spirit; homely in style and abounding in illustrations borrowed, with due acknowledgment, from writers belonging to all the Churches. We might call them "sermonettes" were it not that that word somehow reminds us of a "preacherette." But probably it is a more difficult thing to write an effective ten minutes' sermon than one four times as long. In his preface Mr. Harper gives his views on preaching. With Alexander Macleod he holds that the sermon "admits the highest and the homeliest we can bring." He believes that "people were never so eager to listen as they are to-day," and that "from the human side, sympathy is the preacher's golden key." High, homely, sympathetic, are words that appropriately enough describe these talks on Gospel themes.

Robert Hardy's Seven Days. A Dream and Its Consequences. By CHARLES M. SHELDON. (1s.) S. W. Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row.

GIVEN a Church member—free from all vices, but utterly selfish—who in a dream looks into the face of eternity and wakes with the conviction that he has but seven days to live—how will he spend these precious seven days? How far will his relations to his family, the Church and his employes, all of whom he has sadly neglected, be altered? These are the questions Mr. Sheldon sets himself to answer in a way that grips the reader. After his dream, or whatever it was, Robert Hardy became a new man, as wife and children, pastors and railway-shopmen found out. The week was a crowded one. Robert Hardy put much into it, and God, by unexpected Providences, put still more. One thing we should like to know—Was Robert Hardy's presentiment realised? When the week was gone, and twelve o'clock struck, "he continued kneeling there, nearer God than he had ever been in all his life before." This is how the book ends. Does the ending mean life or death? It may mean either, for all, even those we call dead, "live unto Him." Still, we think Robert Hardy got up from his knees. There is a strong family likeness among all Mr. Sheldon's books, but in our judgment, "Robert Hardy's Seven Days" is nowise inferior to "In His Steps."

We have received from Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co., Warwick House, Salisbury Square, E.C., copies of Mr. Sheldon's popular book—His Brother's Keeper. We have already referred to the book in these columns, and, therefore, content ourselves with giving the prices of the various forms in which the book is presented by the publishers. It may be purchased in Wrapper, (6d.); Ornamental Cloth, (1s.); Large Crown 8vo, Cloth gilt, (1s. 6d.); Large Crown 8vo, Full gilt, Gilt edges, (2s. 6d.); and Demy 8vo, Full gilt, Gilt edges, (3s. 6d.)

Cressy and Poitiers; or, The Story of the Black Prince's Page. By J. G. EDGAR. Illustrated by Powell Chase and Others. Ward, Lock and Co., Warwick House, Salisbury Square, E.C.

A REPRINT of Mr. J. G. Edgar's famous historical novel of the days of Edward and the Black Prince, from the year 1344 to the death of the Black Prince in 1376. The story is vividly told by a page in the Black Prince's service. This page himself has a romantic family history, interwoven with that of many of the most famous personages in that famous reign. Stirring events follow each other in such quick succession, and are so vividly portrayed, that the reader is almost bewildered. Special attention has been paid to the printing and binding of this re-issue, and the result is more than satisfactory. The paper is of excellent quality, and the many illustrations good.

The Pilgrim's Progress. (1d.) E. Marlborough and Co., 51, Old Bailey, E.C.

AN entirely unabridged edition of both the first and second parts of "The Pilgrim's Progress" for one penny. It is moreover, enriched with one hundred illustrations.

The Pearl of the Antilles. By REV. GEO. LESTER. Charles Kelly, 2, Castle Street, City Road, E.C. A BRIEF but comprehensive survey of Cuba—its scenery, its people, its religion and its customs. Though the booklet contains only thirty-two pages, after reading it and studying the beautiful illustrations—taken from photographs—the reader will find that his knowledge and ideas of "the most beautiful land that eye ever beheld" have been considerably extended.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY THE REV. J. ATRINSON.

—The Hull churches are manifesting a considerable spirit of enterprise just now, and are working for the common good in closer union and association. There is a movement to make West Street a mission centre, in the working of which all the stations, through the Church Council, will take an interest. The Chapel Extension Scheme, too, is quietly making headway. This is an effort in common among the stations in Hull to meet the needs of the rapidly extending suburbs of the town. A United Communion Service was arranged for Good Friday, and on the last day of March the Hull churches belonging to the various stations gathered round the Lord's Table in the Old West Street Chapel. In furtherance of promoting a common fellowship it is proposed to institute a weekly prayer meeting in one of the central chapels for all the members of our churches in Hull. We regard these various arrangements for common fellowship and work with much satisfaction. In the large towns where we have several stations, we suffer from isolation. In more than one town we could mention the collective and united energy of our churches might, if brought to bear upon aggressive and other aspects of our Connexional work, make our presence in these towns a greater power for good. The example our friends in Hull are setting of common fellowship in the churches of the various stations in the town for intensifying the power and influence of spiritual life, and promoting various modes of aggressive work, is well worth following.

—The Retford Station has experienced quite a Pentecostal visitation, and the churches have been quickened into enlarged life and power, and many have been turned to the Lord. For some time past a gracious work had been in progress, but on February 19th, signs and wonders, such as had not been witnessed for years, were seen in Retford. After the morning service on that Sabbath, well-nigh the whole congregation remained for prayer and praise and personal consecration to God. A baptism of the Spirit, such as none present had experienced, fell upon them, and they rejoiced and wept together under the rich and powerful influence that rested upon them. A similar gracious experience was realised in the school in the afternoon, and some forty or more of the scholars were converted. The same powerful influence was felt in the P.S.A. meeting, and here again many sought and found the Lord. A large open-air meeting was held before the evening service, and people crowded to the chapel. At the prayer meeting after the usual service the chapel was insufficient to accommodate those who remained, and resort had to be made to the schoolroom. Many cases of conversion were recorded. During the day some sixty or more persons professed to obtain salvation. The good work has extended to Worksop and other places in the station, and the churches are rejoicing in renewed life and power.

—The annual meeting of the Hull Young People's African Missionary Association has been quite a success this year. This result is largely due to the enthusiasm and energy of the local secretary, Mr. S. B. Whitby, who spares neither time nor labour to make this gathering a success. This year the Mayor of the Borough, a respected member of the Wesleyan Church, gave a luncheon and reception in the Town Hall, at which a considerable number were present. It is pleasing to find gentlemen in high civic positions recognising in this way the common value of Christian work, for the Mayor made it understood that it was the catholicity of spirit he cherished, and not regard for any special form of ecclesiasticism, that led him thus to welcome to the town those whose work was making for what was good and righteous and true in national life. The ladies' meeting in the afternoon was well attended, though the weather was rather unpleasant. Mrs. Smith, the wife of the President, occupied the chair, and directed proceedings with consummate grace and ability. At the evening meeting, at which every available nook and corner in Jarratt Street Chapel was occupied, the Vice-President of Conference filled the chief seat. The various speakers felt the inspiration of the large and sympathetic audience, but it was evident they were the subjects of a still higher influence, for their words were indeed at once powerful and persuasive. The financial result was £182; the highest figure yet reached in connection with this Association. But to this there has to be added the deeper sympathy with missionary work produced, and the intenser zeal and enthusiasm for its support evoked. The financial result, valuable as that may be, is not, after all, the most valuable result of such meetings as were held in Jarratt Street Chapel on that somewhat unfavourable February Monday.

—A splendid testimony to the excellent training received by the children in the Connexional Orphanage is given in the numerous applications for the services of the young people who may be ready to leave the Institution. Far more applications are received than can be granted. At the recent meeting of the committee it was reported that two boys had left for good situations. Both bore excellent characters. Applications are frequently made by persons who are anxious to adopt some of the children, but respecting this matter the committee have to move with caution. The law in relation to such adoptions is by no means clear and satisfactory, so that hitherto such proposals have had to be declined. Advice is being sought, both in relation to law and experience, but the prudence of permitting such adoptions is more than doubtful.

—The Rev. J. Msikinya, who is expected to arrive in England this month from South Africa, and who will be present at the May Missionary Meeting, will utilise his visit, with the sanction of Conference, to raise funds for the erection of a new native church in Aliwal North. There can be little doubt about the Conference sanction, and we hope there may be no more doubt respecting the sympathy and support which Mr. Msikinya's appeal will meet with in our churches.

—The Rev. N. Boocock, who with his wife recently left this country for the West Coast of Africa, has been greatly cheered, not only by the welcome he received from the natives at Archibongville, but by the readiness with which they have united in assisting him in the repairing of the Church. They have shown a willing hand for work. But he has been still more encouraged by the many applications he has received from attendants upon the mission services to be received into membership by baptism. This is a splendid testimony to the labour and service of his predecessors. Evidently they have not laboured in vain, nor spent their strength for nought. Mrs. Boocock has had her first experience of African fever, but has quite recovered, and is falling in admirably with the new conditions of life in which she finds herself, and proving a valuable helper to her husband in his work. To Mr. Boocock, of course, there is not much strange or new in the situation.

—In Santa Isabel the effort that had been made annually in support of the Mission Fund has been in abeyance for a few years past. A new church has had to be provided, and the annual effort has been devoted to this purpose. The church, which has cost for building and fencing some £1,143, is now completely paid for, and this year the special effort goes to the Mission Fund. The services were held early this year, the Rev. G. E. Wiles, of San Carlos, assisting Mr. Fairley, the resident missionary. The meetings were well attended, a gracious influence rested upon them, and the financial result was 960 dollars. This sum is in advance of the sum produced by the effort of last year. The amount suffers in value owing to the depreciation of the Spanish dollar. Prior to the war between Spain and America, five Spanish dollars were equal to £1 English currency. Now, however, it takes six to make £1, so that instead of reckoning, as it would have done before the war, at £192, it now reckons at only £160. Still, this is a good sum to be raised by this African Mission Church, and shows some considerable willingness to contribute by extra effort to the Fund by which the Mission is to some extent sustained.

—Elmfield College maintains the high reputation it has won, and continues among the foremost colleges of its class. At the College of Preceptors' Examination last Christmas, Elmfield sent up forty-eight candidates—six in the first class, seven in the second, and thirty-five in the third—and they all passed. In twelve of the subjects the boys took fifty-seven distinctions, showing that in these subjects more than three-fourths of the maximum number of marks had been gained in each of the fifty-seven cases. Among the male candidates, thirty-eight gained honours, and of the thirty-eight, four were Elmfield boys, taking respectively the third, fourth, thirteenth and fifteenth places. In this examination seventeen prizes are usually awarded amongst the candidates, male and female, and of the seventeen, Elmfield took four, the first and second for Natural Science, the first for Mathematics, and the fourth for general proficiency. No other college obtained more than three, and no other college gained so many firsts. Since 1884, Elmfield has gained twenty-five prizes at the Christmas examinations of the College of Preceptors, and with this record it stands ahead of all colleges of its class in the Kingdom. With a record like this it is no wonder that members of other Churches send their boys to Elmfield. It would be a wonder if they did not. The surprise is that more of our own people don't avail themselves of this excellent institution for the education of their boys. The moral and religious influence exercised over the boys is quite equal to the attention bestowed upon their education.

—There is great need of a fund for assisting our churches in many of the seaside resorts that are springing up on the Lincolnshire, Essex, and Kent coasts, and along the Southern coast of the Kingdom as well. We could mention a score places and more, where our efforts are comparatively unproductive owing to the small and inconvenient places of worship we have. The Missionary Committee receive numerous applications for aid, but are compelled to reply to them by an acknowledgment of inability. This is greatly to be regretted, as these places are frequented by an increasing number of our friends year by year. If the revenue of the General Missionary Fund could be put up some six or eight thousand pounds a year, something might be done in the direction indicated, and there is no reason why the revenue should not increase by this amount. Surely, if in 1876 the churches could send £15,000 or more to the General Treasurer, there cannot be much difficulty in the Connexion, with its increased wealth, sending £16,000 or £18,000 a year to the Fund in 1899. There can be no question about the ability, all that is needed is the will to do it.

—The rules prepared by the Registrar General for working the Marriage Act of 1898 are now ready, and may be obtained through any bookseller for some twopence halfpenny, or from the Book-room by post for threepence. It is very necessary that those who in any place will be responsible for working the Act should carefully consider these rules. The trustees or managing committee of the building in which the Act may be adopted will be required to provide a fire-proof safe in which to keep the register, books, and other documents, which can only be used for the one chapel for which they are issued. No such requirement as this is insisted upon in connection with State Church places of worship. Then there must be an authorised person who is responsible for attending at any marriage in any of our places of worship where the Act is adopted, and this person is required to fulfil his appointed duties subject to penalty in case of failure; and he must at his own expense provide the forms of marriage certificates, for which, of course, he can charge some two-and-sixpence. Before any person accepts this position he will need to make himself acquainted with these rules, for his work will be by no means easy, nor will his responsibilities be light. The Act as a whole is a very questionable gain, and does not by any means remove the difference between the Established Church and Nonconformists in relation to marriage which has been so objectionable. The proper and logical solution of the case was not to dispense with the Registrar, but to require him as the servant of the State, to attend all marriages in the Established Church and Free Churches alike. That would have made both equal—while this Act simply changes the form of inequality but does not remove it.

—Young men ready to undertake the work of the ministry are by no means scarce in the Connexion. The Board appointed to conduct the preliminary examinations have held a session at each of the three centres decided upon at the last Conference. Sixty candidates presented themselves, eight of whom failed to satisfy the examiners. One was declined on account of health, and the other seven owing to their backward education. Stations would act wisely in exercising a little more prudence and care in recommending men. Fifty-one, however, go on to the second examination, the result of which will be known towards the end of May. It is not likely that more than some twenty will be needed by the Conference, certainly not more than thirty, so that a considerable number will have to stand over, and unless they give a fair degree of promise of fitness and suitability for the work, the greatest kindness would be to recommend them to abide by their employment. If a candidate is young and has capacity, why, let him apply himself to study and local work, and come up again; but the practice of permitting men to hang on year after year and then dropping them is by no means satisfactory. If age or inefficiency, or any other cause renders a man's chance remote, it will be better to tell him so at once. This preliminary examination is considered a little too easy. The minimum number of marks at present is fifty, the maximum one hundred. It is proposed to raise the minimum to sixty, and so make the first stage a rather stiffer test of what a man is.

—The returns from the New Zealand District have reached the General Committee in good time. The District Meeting was held on Jan. 12th, and the returns have been promptly sent on. The increase in the membership is 152. Last year it was 185, so this district is evidently making steady progress. In all other respects, we understand, the district is reported prosperous. A step has been taken by the annual meeting of this district that will give rise to more than one opinion. It has been decided to make total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors a condition of membership in the Church. The proposal was not carried unanimously, which would certainly have been a great recommendation, but by a considerable majority, twenty-six to eleven. The Conference will be asked to sanction this proposal, and as the Colonies have in matters ecclesiastical practically Home Rule, and the proposal relates to the New Zealand District alone, it is probable the Conference will sanction it. Upon a question of this kind relating to a business which has the sanction of law, greater unanimity would have been desirable. There was certainly more than two to one in favour, but a three-fourths majority, or better still, a four-fifths, would have given greater promise of peace and permanency. A considerable minority upon such a question is by no means desirable. However, we hope all may go well. The result will be watched with some interest. New Zealand is certainly endeavouring on several questions to show the world the pace.

The Wider Outlook.

—Episcopacy appears to be making some headway north of the Tweed, though, of course, such is the irony of geographical ecclesiasticism, that in Scotland it is a Nonconforming body. A rather delicate question arises here. Nonconformity south of the border means to the Established Church schism: what then can Nonconformity to the Established Church north of the border mean? Evidently geography cannot be determinative of a true Church. However, be that as it may, Episcopacy thrives to some extent amongst our northern fellow countrymen. The report of this Church recently issued, shows an increase in membership of 3,905, and of communicants of 1,450. This is a curious distinction between members of the Church and communicants, and no light is shed upon the difference. Are these Church members in some sense on trial, and simply on the way to become communicants—a sort of catechumen body under training for the higher position of communicants? We give it up. The funds of the Church have also improved by some £4,758, so that voluntarism in Episcopacy when free from State trammels works not amiss. Surely the Episcopal Church south of the Tweed need not tremble at the prospect of disestablishment and disendowment. An endowment based upon the affection of the people is better than one based upon subserviency to the State. It seems, too, that the ecclesiastical differences which divide Episcopalians in England divide them also in Scotland. A pronounced ritualism exists along with an outspoken evangelicalism in the Scottish Episcopal Church, and though some of the bishops have declared their purpose to suppress the irregularities of ritual which have crept into the Scottish Church, they have taken no effective steps in this direction. It appears as if both "schools" may be comprehended in a non-established Church, though it is probable that disestablishment in England might alter the relations of the two "schools" in Scotland, and lead them to drift apart.

* * *

—The movement for uniting the two non-established Presbyterian Churches in Scotland proceeds steadily if slowly. The Joint Committee is making progress in adjusting the various details that require attention to make things move smoothly. The satisfactory arrangement of Presbyteries and Synods, and the constitution of the General Assembly of the United Church, as well as a multitude of considerations of less moment, are being carefully thought out by the committee, and it is anticipated that by the month of May matters may be so forwarded as to afford hope that the union may be consummated in 1900, and so make the first year of the twentieth century an epochal year.

* * *

—There are better times in store for the children in the manufacturing districts, though no thanks are due to the present Government for this. At the Berlin Congress, when the question of child labour was internationally considered, this country, with Lord Salisbury in power then as he is now, pledged itself to raise the school age of children to twelve years. It was then ten, and some thousands of children were employed in factories, and in other ways, part of the day, and were at school the other part, though, as in the case of factory children, as labour had the first half of the day, the schooling was, of course, at a disadvantage. With some difficulty the age was raised to eleven. Now a Bill has been introduced to raise it to twelve, so that no child can be employed at an earlier age in any kind of work that interferes with attendance at school. The present Government, though pledged in the face of Europe to this, showed their interest in the measure by absenting themselves from the debate. Sir John Gorst and another unimportant member or two of the Government were present, but the leaders of the Constitutional party were conspicuous by absence. The House of Commons, however, by a sweeping majority, 317 to 59, passed the second reading of the Bill. Surely twelve years of age is soon enough for a child to begin work. If it is put to labour at an earlier age it is evidence that there is something wrong in the social system. Parents should not have to be dependent upon the earnings of their young children; nor ought they to be permitted for any reason to sacrifice the best interests of their offspring. That in the manufacturing and rural districts it is necessary for the children to contribute to the family fund, if true, is a disgrace to our civilisation. We hope this Bill, which has met with such acceptance in the House, and which is accepted also by a majority of the people, will become law before the session ends. This hope we entertain with fear, for already the Bill has been blocked by Mr. Banbury, the Conservative member for the Peckham division, and it will be well if the Government stands clear in relation to this action, as it was taken immediately after a consultation between Mr. Banbury and the chief Government whip. The Government fear their Lancashire seats will be endangered if they in any way show favour to this Bill. This accounts for the bare condition of the front bench during the debate, and the block which now bars the way of the Bill. However, having been passed by such a majority, this greatly needed reform cannot be much longer delayed. Social reform which loomed so large in the election addresses of the predominant party has sunk down to nearly vanishing point. However, we have this consolation, the country cannot always be gulled by specious but meaningless addresses.

—Death has removed a notable personality from the Established Church of Scotland, and the end came in a sadly tragic manner. There are few who have any acquaintance with literature but what have enjoyed the essays of A. K. H. B. Pleasant, genial, and gossipy, himself as the central figure, no better relief could be had than his somewhat egotistic productions. Dr. Boyd was a son of the Manse. He was educated for the Bar, but his personal inclinations did not lie in that direction, and after spending a short time in the study of law, he abandoned it for the higher calling of a minister of the Gospel of Christ. He has been a well known and much esteemed minister of the Scotch Church for many years, and, in fact, was one of the attractions of the old Scottish University town of St. Andrews. He was somewhat high in his ecclesiasticism, and had little sympathy with the bald form of worship favoured by the Scottish Church when he entered the ministry. He dearly loved a bishop, and admired all stately liturgies and ecclesiastical ceremonies, so much so that it was a wonder to many he did not go over to the Episcopal Church. Nine years ago he was Moderator of his Church, and it need hardly be said he filled the office with dignity. His strong point was not theology nor critical scholarship; his preaching was of the essay kind, but intensely ethical. He was a brilliant conversationalist, and could tell a story well. His books, however, are not of the kind that will last. In a few generations other men working on similar lines, and in keeping with the spirit of the age, will supersede him. His end, as we have said, was sadly tragic. In poor health for some time past, he went for a short stay at Bournemouth. He was under the necessity of using opiates to induce sleep, and had also to use a carbolic acid lotion for external application. His wife being threatened with influenza had to occupy a separate room. Mistaking the bottle containing the carbolic acid lotion for that containing his sleeping draught, he unfortunately drank from it. Discovering his error he went at once to his wife's room, and holding up the bottle, he said, "Isn't this an awful thing? I have taken this in mistake." Medical aid was at once secured, but in a few hours he was dead. He was seventy-four years of age, and had resided in St. Andrews thirty-four years, and will be greatly missed in the circle in which he moved.

—The sudden and unexpected death of Lord Herschell during his absence from home, and while engaged in America as President of the Commission for adjusting certain differences between Canada and the United States, is a national loss. In the frosty weather which prevailed on the other side of the Atlantic in February he met with a serious accident, slipping upon a side-walk, which reduced him to a helpless condition. Still, the fracture he sustained did not impair his general health, and his death came as a surprise. Lord Herschell was of Jewish descent; his father, the son of a Jewish Rabbi, was alienated from his people through embracing the Christian faith. After his separation from the Jews he became minister of John Street Chapel, Edgware Road, and in connection with that chapel the future Lord Chancellor was reared, and taught in the Sunday School as he approached manhood. Later in life he became a member of the Established Church, and was a worshipper at the fashionable Church of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, filling the office there of churchwarden. He rapidly made his way at the Bar. As a lawyer he had few equals, and was a remarkably efficient pleader. He entered Parliament in 1874, and soon made his mark, becoming Solicitor-General in 1880, and in 1886 he was elevated to the woolsack. He took the same high office in 1892. He was a steady reliable Liberal all through his Parliamentary career, and by his death the House of Lords loses one of its most accomplished debaters. Lord Herschell was not only an eminent lawyer and parliamentarian, but an earnest social reformer and philanthropist. He sympathised with every attempt to make the conditions of life better, and to deliver it from the evils by which it is so unfortunately afflicted. He was a determined opponent of the betting mania which has taken such possession of modern life, and tried to the utmost to lessen the plague. His labours on the Commission of Inquiry into the vaccination laws were a potent influence in bringing to an end the illogical and unsatisfactory form in which compulsion was enforced. The service he rendered in connection with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children when that Society was under painful accusation cannot be over-rated. Though at the time burdened with excessive labour, he conducted a rigorous examination of all details of the Society's work, and to his efforts the triumphant acquittal of the management was largely due. He was an eminent lawyer, but beyond that, he was a God-fearing man, whose faith influenced his whole life, and who never tired of working for the good of humankind as opportunity offered and ability rendered possible. The nation can ill spare men of the character of Lord Herschell.

—The English Church Union, of which Lord Halifax is President, is forcing the ecclesiastical pace in the Establishment somewhat rapidly. The most recent declarations of this body, comprising the most active section of the Episcopal Church, show plainly that they do not consider themselves under any obligation to conform to the law except in so far as it agrees with their high ecclesiastical assumptions. They deny that any new religious establishment was set up in the sixteenth century. All that took place then was, according to their view, the setting aside of the ordinary jurisdiction of the Pope as exercised in England by Henry the Eighth. All other things in connection with the Church continued as they were. There was no break of continuity. The general doctrine and practice of the Church continued the same as before Henry the Eighth superseded the Pope. History signifies nothing to them when it collides with their views. It is only so much the worse for history. They deny the right of the Crown or Parliament to exercise any governing authority over the Church, or to determine, in any way or any degree, the doctrine, the discipline, or the ceremonial of the Church of England, and they do this in face of the fact that the Prayer Book was, and is, the ritual prescribed by Parliament. It is, in point of fact, a Statute of the Realm. They claim, in fact, a privileged position, and the possession of national funds without control by the authority that has placed them in a position of privilege and decreed them support from national funds. This is a plain issue, and means either that Romanism in a thin Anglican disguise shall be the established religion of the nation, or that disestablishment must take place, and the privileges and emoluments granted under conditions that are repudiated be withdrawn. Lord Halifax and his friends have raised a clear issue that cannot well be evaded. Either they must be masters of the situation, or the nation must assert its authority and undo what the nation did when Episcopacy was established by law.

* * *

—Their duty, Lord Halifax and the members of the English Church Union maintain, is determined by the obedience which the individual Churchman owes to the Catholic Church, and this duty can only be determined through the exercise of the spiritual authority committed by our Lord to the Episcopate. Of course it is a trifling consideration in connection with this matter that our Lord knew nothing of any Episcopate, and never invested any such body with spiritual authority. The line along which this authority proceeds to reach a final decision is very simple. It begins with the Bishop of the diocese, but if the interpretation given at this stage is not sufficient, then it necessitates that the Metropolitan, acting in conjunction with the Bishops of the Province of which he is the head and representative, shall have the opportunity of interpretation. But even this may not be sufficient to determine what the duty is which the individual Churchman owes to the Catholic Church, and hence another step must be taken, and interpretation sought from a General Council, or from the Pope, as representing the general authority of the Episcopate. So that in the last resort, according to Lord Halifax and his friends, it is the Pope who decides what Churchmen must believe, and what ritual they must observe; in fact, determine what their religious life and practice shall be. It is clear that the aim of the English Church Union is to bring this country into subjection to Rome, or, as perhaps they would prefer to put it, to restore Anglicanism to the fellowship of the Catholic Church—a task which, unless we are seriously mistaken, will prove beyond their power to accomplish. However, it is well to have a clear statement of their position, and this, Lord Halifax, as President of the English Church Union, has given.

—The two Archbishops propose to constitute a court at Lambeth for the consideration of such ecclesiastical grievances as may be submitted to them, and with which the bishops find themselves unable to deal. The Ritualists protest against secular judges' adjudication on ecclesiastical questions, and so the two Archbishops propose to supply them with what they demand—an ecclesiastical tribunal. Parties may plead in this court either in person or by counsel, and not until any rubrical question has been discussed by means of all the light which gentlemen conversant with canon law can shed upon it will a decision be given. And this is the remedy which the supreme ecclesiastical wisdom of the Episcopal Church proposes to provide in the crisis which has arisen in ecclesiastical affairs connected with the Establishment. There has been no parallel to this proposal since the travelling quack offered the British public pills to allay earthquakes. And his remedy for earthquakes was just as likely to be efficacious as the Archbishops' remedy for the crisis in the English Episcopal Church. The Lambeth Court will have no legal status. Its decisions may be accepted or rejected, as the parties concerned please. It will possess no executive authority by which to enforce them. All executive authority rests with the State, of which the Establishment is the ecclesiastical department. It is a farcical proposal, and simply means that by the delay thus interposed the agitation may possibly die out and things be permitted to go on as before. The situation is made more curiously interesting by the resignation of Lord Penzance, the old and infirm judge who has had to decide ecclesiastical questions, but whose office has been a sinecure for years, and whose name and existence the public had about forgotten. His place as provided by law will have to be filled up in some six months, and it will be interesting to note the course that may be taken in relation to it. The one possible solution of the ecclesiastical imbroglio becomes more and more apparent, and sooner or later—and the sooner the better—it will have to be accepted.

—The extravagance of the national expenditure has become a question of serious concern to all thoughtful people. No matter how the revenue increases, some mode of spending it is found. When the present Government came into power in 1895 they inherited a surplus of more than four millions. Since then the revenue has increased by some twelve millions. They have had all the advantage of the reform introduced by Sir W. Harcourt in his great Budget by which he secured for them an extra income of some five millions unencumbered by any corresponding expenditure. They have also had the advantage of an expanding revenue during a time of great national prosperity, and what is the result?—a prospect of some four millions deficit in the forthcoming Budget. No relief of taxation has been granted to the people. A few millions have been thrown to the landed interest in England and Ireland, the clerical party have had a good haul; and in other ways the nation's income, which should have gone far to relieve the nation's burden of taxation, has been recklessly squandered. In time of peace we are spending over fifty millions upon the army and navy, and it is very questionable whether we have the worth in national defence of the money spent. The expenditure for the next financial year is likely to exceed £120,000,000, and this in what is called a time of peace. All idea of economy seems lost, and the old watchwords of retrenchment and reform have become obsolete; but unless some arrest is put upon this extravagance there will be grave difficulty and disaster ere long. How is the prospective deficit to be met? Already we hear hints of increased taxation in one form or another upon the food stuffs of the people. The interests must not be touched. A tax upon corn, or sugar, or tea, or some article used by the people will meet the difficulty. Already the people pay some £55,000,000 in indirect taxation, and the burden of this falls most heavily upon the poorer part of the population. The party in power are friends of Protection. They are introducing countervailing duties on sugar in India—a violation of free trade principle—and if they can they will not hesitate to burden the people at home by similar means. The present prosperity is not likely to continue for ever, and a period of commercial depression would bring swift and sad retribution.

REV. FREDERICK SMITH.

Rev. Frederick Smith.

THE Rev. Frederick Smith, whose portrait we give this month, was born of godly parentage at High Barnet, Herts, in the year 1838. The piety and prayers of his parents did much to impress him for good when a child. In 1856 he was powerfully converted to God in Bethel Chapel, Sheffield, mainly through the prayers and personal efforts of Mr. Thomas Carter, now of Walkley Society in that town. As soon as he was saved himself he had a longing desire to save others, and immediately gave himself up to much earnest prayer, and by persistent personal appeals was soon made useful in winning souls for Christ.

In 1858 he removed to Manchester, where he became a local preacher, and in 1860 was unanimously chosen by the same circuit officials to be the third minister in the station. Anxious to have undoubted evidence of being divinely called to the ministry, he prayed that on the first Sunday of his labours God would give him two souls, or he would certainly go home. He had his request, and to this day cherishes in his heart and memory the names of those who were then converted.

He has since travelled at Knowlwood, Chorley, Southport (twice), Ramsey, Buckley, Haslingden First, Foxhill Bank, Chester First, Leeds Fourth, Oldham Second, St. Helens, Walkden (which was part of Manchester Third Station at the time he began his ministry there thirty-nine years ago), and by the Conference of 1895 was appointed to his present station, York Second, where he is engaged to remain until July, 1900. With the exception of four years in Leeds, and a similar time at York, Mr. Smith's ministry has been spent in the Manchester and Liverpool Districts, which were one for many years after his ministry began. Within these districts Mr. Smith is well known, and where best known he is most esteemed. Ever popular with the people of his stations, his labours are as sincerely appreciated as they are widely remembered.

The passion for soul-saving, which was engendered immediately upon his conversion, has grown and developed, and has been, perhaps, the most marked feature in his character. It pervades, and is the life of, his sermons, making them not only strongly practical, but piercingly severe. And few men can probe the depths of the unregenerate heart with more searching questions, or with more pungent appeals. In social intercourse, also, the same passion is still dominant, and to use his own expression, he has often "hunted for souls with the keenness of a game hunter."

For anniversary services Mr. Smith is in good demand, frequently being called to visit the scenes of his former labours. His success has been great. During his first year in the ministry, according to his diary, he saw sixty souls saved at the services he conducted. At Chorley, fruit was gathered at nearly all the services, and among those brought to God here through his agency, two became ministers of the Gospel. At Buckley he reported the highest increase of any circuit in the district—seventy. At Southport his greatest successes were realised. During his first term the Branch grew into a circuit, and in the second term the station was divided. During the four years over which this term extended, the membership of the parent circuit rose until it stood at eighty above the number in both stations before the division; and most of the local preachers now on the plan in that station were converted during Mr. Smith's ministry there. Similar successes have been realised in his subsequent stations. Mr. Smith has also had his share of work in raising money for building new chapels and reducing debts, or altering old ones, and he has achieved considerable success, and has not a few monuments to his industry in this department of church work.

As an illustration of his success in these respects we give the following particulars of Mr. Smith's labours in the York Second Station, which are from the facile and veracious pen of the Rev. J. Atkinson, who is connected with that station:—"Mr. Smith is at present in the York Second Station, and is completing his fourth year, being invited for a fifth. His appointment was a providential circumstance in the history of the station, as it was at the time in a precarious condition, owing to accumulated debt and the state of the societies and properties. As the result of the four years' labour the churches have been greatly revived, congregations increased, and a very satisfactory addition made to the quarterly income, so that a much better salary than was paid four years ago can now be paid with comparative ease. £1,175 of debt has been paid off the Victoria Bar properties, £132 for renovating the property, which was in a dilapidated condition, and £55 raised towards a new organ. A circuit debt of £30 has also been liquidated. In addition to this the debt has been cleared off the Acomb Chapel, and the Heslington Chapel has been renovated at a cost of over £60, all of which has been raised. An additional plot of land has also been purchased in Albany Street, a rising suburban district of the city, where for a few years mission work has been carried on in a small wooden building, and it is intended shortly to erect a chapel there, using the present structure as a schoolroom. The officials have, of course, worked heartily with Mr. Smith, but the main labour in all this work has devolved upon him, and but for his persistent and continuous effort it is not likely it would have been accomplished. The Insurance Company and General Chapel Fund, and W. P. Hartley, Esq., rendered assistance in the debt reduction, which contributed to encourage and create in the people a mind to work. The result is that our Church, which had fallen in public estimation, has been rehabilitated in public confidence, and is now regarded with a respect such as it has not commanded for some few years past. In all respects, the station now occupies a position such as it has not occupied since its formation."

In 1864, Mr. Smith married the eldest daughter of the late respected Rev. Thomas Jobling, at one time General Missionary Secretary, who has in every respect proved to be a helpmeet to her husband. Though somewhat delicate in health, Mrs. Smith has added to her home duties much earnest labour in various departments of Church work, in which she has been abundantly blessed. Nor have the home duties been light, for ten children have been given to them. The home ministry of our brother and his excellent wife has not been a failure. All their children are on the way to heaven, and except two, are members of our Church. One of these resides a long distance from a Primitive Methodist Chapel, and is in consequence a Wesleyan. Three of their sons are local preachers, and one is studying with the view of entering our ministry.

Mr. Smith is not what has come to be called a "Connexional man," but he is a true Primitive Methodist, teaching unfalteringly its doctrines, maintaining faithfully its polity, and earnestly and laboriously seeking its best interests. Not many of its honours, either, have fallen to his lot, still he represented his District as a delegate to the Conference of 1882, and was unanimously chosen to be chairman of the Manchester District Meeting in 1889, the duties connected with which he very efficiently discharged. He has a good constitution. During the thirty-six years of the writer's acquaintance with him, he has never known him to be seriously out of health. Though somewhat past the meridian of life, Mr. Smith maintains a youthful appearance, and we pray that he may long be spared to serve the Connexion to which he is most devotedly attached.

The Skylark.

On russet wing from grassy nest,
With dew-drops sparkling on her breast,
The gentle lark, morn's early guest,
Doth climb the blushing skies.
Over the steeple warbling shrill,
Over the waving wood-crown'd hill,
To greet the sun with tuneful bill,
The bird of dawning flies.

Pavilion'd from our aching sight,
In beams of golden-spreading light,
At heaven's gate of sapphire bright
She worships all alone;
Her music falling on the ear
Like stray notes from that shining sphere
Where angel-harpers circle near
The great sun-dimming throne.

Sweet bird! thou hast no heavy head
To nail thee to thy bloomy bed,
For ere young morn with banner red
Doth usher in the day
Thou'rt whistling up the tardy swain,
Who hears thee through his cottage pane,
And hies to labour till thy strain
Melts in the night-bird's lay.

Unlike the hooting hermit owl,
Who, rake-like, loves at night to prowl
When ev'ry other honest fowl
Save philomel doth rest,
And naught is heard to break the hush
But breathing winds and speckled thrush
Dream-singing in the breeze-rock'd bush
Within her clay-lined nest.

For ere the god of day has sped
To his blue-crimson curtain'd bed,
Thy parting hymn rings overhead,
And thou hast left the skies;
Retiring with the lamb to rest,
That vocal snowdrop (emblem blest),
Which young Spring fondles on her breast,
And children so much prize.

Though gifted far above thy kind
To soar and leave them all behind,
Such is thy modesty of mind
That thou dost not disdain
To build thy lowly nest and hide
Close by the meek-faced daisy's side,
Who, like thee, knows no purple pride,
Meet neighbour of the plain. S. J. WALLIS.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BEGINNING OF THE STRUGGLE.

ALIZON NEVILLE looked forward with interest towards Duncan Rutland's visit to the Priory on the following Wednesday. The Christmas and New Year's festivities had long come to an end, and Lady Neville had postponed going to London for a few weeks, in order to fall in with Father Ritzoom's plans. For although her ladyship generally went to town for the season, she was by no means a society woman. Neither did Alison care much for the ordinary round of London festivities. Her's was an intellectual, rather than a pleasure loving nature, and while by no means a pedant, she was fond of conversing with cultured people. Her life was rather quiet at the Priory, and so she welcomed the thought of meeting with Rutland, and of hearing him talk.

She was much interested in the Jesuit's scheme for the conversion of Rutland, but her faith in it was not strong. Had she known the whole of his plans she would doubtless have felt differently, in all probability she would have refused to participate in it. Like all true Catholics, however, she believed that such as he remained Protestant because of prejudice, and because of ignorance concerning the great truths of her faith. And yet, as she remembered how he had torn Father Sheen's arguments to pieces, she doubted whether being brought into close contact with Catholics at the Priory would effect the desired change. True, she had great faith in the influence of her mother, while Father Ritzoom almost awed her. His strong face and unfathomable eyes led her to believe that he had entered into the secrets of power, and was thus enabled to achieve what to others would be impossible.

As a consequence she anticipated Rutland's visit with more than ordinary interest. There was something fresh and unconventional in his conversation, and he was utterly different from what she regarded as the approved type of Nonconformist ministers. While they had sat in the library on the previous Friday night, he had betrayed the fact that he was a lover of fun, that he enjoyed quick and witty repartee, and that he could laugh with the merriest. She enjoyed his criticisms of books too. Unlike Father Sheen, he seemed to have read everything, and was able to talk on subjects concerning which she thought he would be in entire ignorance. She had fancied, moreover, that when brought face to face with her mother and Father Sheen, after the debate, he would have been ill at ease, and have betrayed awkwardness, and perhaps with a want of tact, have referred to it in such a way as to make it hard to bear with his society. In this she was entirely mistaken. He had proved himself equal to the occasion, and had entirely ignored their former meetings. Besides, he was good-looking as well as interesting, and so on the morning of the day of Rutland's visit she felt exceedingly light-hearted, and when lunch was over, was more particular about the dress she wore than she had been for many days.

* Copyright in the United States of America:

During the morning her mother had handed her a letter from Father Sheen, and when she had read it, a look of satisfaction came into her eyes.

"You see we shall not have his help in entertaining Mr. Rutland," remarked Lady Neville.

"I see," she replied. "He has gone to Manchester to meet Father Ritzoom, he says. I thought the Jesuit was to stay in Lynford for some time."

"I thought so too; but it seems that he has been called to Manchester. I suppose he goes to Ireland to-morrow, and then he will come back here in about a fortnight. I have invited him to stay at the Priory. He is a wonderful man."

"I am almost afraid of him," said the girl.

"Are you? Doubtless he is very clever, and is of immense power in the Church. I suppose he has great influence in Rome."

"He seems to know everyone, too," said the girl. "By the way, what shall we do to entertain Mr. Rutland when he comes?"

"Well, we must show him around the house, and then, perhaps, you can play at billiards with him until dinner."

"But supposing he can't play?"

"It doesn't matter. His interests are so varied that it will be easy to amuse him."

When Duncan reached the Priory he was received with a welcome smile, so gracious, indeed, was Lady Neville, that the young man remembered the advice of the old weaver, and wondered if it was of value. He dismissed it in a moment however. He remembered that he was dealing with a woman who, whatever her religious prejudices might be, would scorn to do an unworthy act. With the assurance of a young man, he believed that Father Sheen and his friends had accepted with the best possible grace the fact, that he, Rutland, had had the best of the debate, and to show that they bore him no ill-will, they had decided to be friendly with him. He could not help realising that it was not common for people occupying Lady Neville's social position to seek the acquaintance of a Protestant minister. But with the carelessness of youth he discarded the fact as of no value. He reflected that although he was not the equal of her ladyship in wealth and social position, he was not altogether her inferior in education, and was regarded as more than the equal of her spiritual adviser in mental attainments. Consequently, he was at ease in her society. He saw that she treated him as an equal, and so he gave himself over to the pleasant sensations caused by his visit.

He did not seem at all chagrined at Father Sheen's non-appearance, indeed, the afternoon passed like a pleasant dream. Both Alizon and Lady Neville accompanied him in his tour through the house, and the young man was charmed. Old rooms, old pictures, old curiosities, delighted him beyond measure; he listened with intense interest to the descriptions given of events of bygone days, and spite of his beliefs, could not help sympathising with the men who in the reign of Elizabeth had been secreted in the Priory by the old Nevilles who had been true to their faith, rather than to the laws of their country. And yet no word was uttered about religion. Even when they visited the private chapel, and both Alizon and Lady Neville genuflected before the altar, no word was uttered; they performed their act of homage reverently but naturally, neither did they pay any seeming attention to the attitude of the young Protestant.

"Oh, it is glorious, glorious!" cried the young man, as they went from room to room, "simply glorious!"

"You like the house?" said Lady Neville with a smile.

"It is just a dream," remarked the young man enthusiastically. "All the houses I have visited have, almost without exception, been modern; they have had no history, no romance, no mystery. Here one is led to forget the prosy present. We live in an age before railways, before the advent of machinery. It is Arcadia."

"You like old things?" asked Lady Neville.

"I like everything that contains the elements of mystery," said the young man. "When I was a boy, my favourite author was Hans Andersen. Even now I am fascinated by every form of superstition. Wizardry, witchcraft, faith-healing—I simply revel in hearing about them."

"But you do not believe in them?"

"It depends upon my mood. If the critical faculty be uppermost, I, of course, laugh at them all. But sometimes I forget to analyse, forget to reflect, and then I believe in them as sincerely as a child of four years old believes in Santa Claus. I envy you beyond words, Lady Neville. To live at this Priory, where everything has a history, and is associated with romance, must be a continual source of delight."

"But one gets used to it," said Alizon.

"Naturally," replied Duncan, "but it has its influence all the same."

"Oh, I care very little for the house itself," replied the girl, "but I do love the park, the woods. I simply long for summer when I can lose myself among the trees. You say you forget yourself when you wander along dark passages, and visit gloomy dungeons; but I forget myself when I am out in the woods in the summer time. When I hear the beck rippling, and the birds singing, I cease thinking, I simply give myself over to delightful impressions."

Duncan looked into her face as she spoke, and he knew that she felt what she said. And while he looked, he fancied her wandering among the woods where rays of sunlight filtered their way through the leafy trees.

Life was very sweet to him just then. For the time he had forgotten that he was the minister of a Nonconformist Church, forgotten that he had to do with men and women who did not dream, but whose lives were moulded and permeated by the money-making town in which they lived. He felt no disparity between himself and the girl who stood by his side. True, she might speak of her ancestors who lived in this very house before the dawn of that religious revolution which shook the very foundations of European life, while he counted nothing concerning his own ancestry; but they were akin in spirit. At that time, too, he forgot that she believed in what, to him, were so many fables, while he was an avowed enemy to the faith for which she was ready to die. He was young, and ardent, and romantic, and so he could forget the grim realities which would face him on the morrow; to-day he was under a spell, and without a struggle he yielded to it.

"Yes, country life is very beautiful in the summer," he said, "but I am content now with a dark murky sky, and stones of granite. You see," he went on presently, "a house is suggestive of home, and home is very dear to us English people. I have no home."

"No home?" said the girl.

"No," replied the young man. "My father and mother are dead. They left me just enough to see me through college, and a pittance for bread and cheese besides; but I am homeless. Neither have I either brother or sister. I was the only child, and so—well, I am practically destitute of relations."

"And what did you do during your vacations?" asked Lady Neville.

"Oh, I lived at the college."

"It must have been very lonely for you?"

"I don't know. I read very hard mostly, and when one has books, one forgets. Besides, I wanted to take my M.A. at the London University, and the examinations there are no make-believe."

"But did you not feel the need of friends at Christmas time?"

"Yes, and no. You see my college mates often asked me to spend my vacations with them, but I wanted to get my work done."

"But would you not take your degree in your ordinary college course?"

"Oh no. It is true we had a course of classics there, but our main business was to study theology, and those subjects which appertained thereto. My studies for the London University were practically extra. No, I did not feel my loneliness as much there as I have felt it here."

"How is that? I know many nice people who belong to Tudor Chapel, and I suppose every one of them is glad to see you."

"Oh yes, they are very kind. In many ways, I think the Lancashire people are the kindest people I have ever met; but they are so eminently practical. They do not seem to care for beauty in the way I care for it, and they love to talk about things which have no interest for me. Of course, it is my fault, but the fact is none the less there. That is why my visit here to-day has given me so much pleasure."

"I am glad you have enjoyed being here," said Lady Neville graciously; "we shall be pleased to see you often. We see little society, and you will be always welcome."

He looked at Alizon, who seconded her mother's words, and the young man thanked them both, and promised to avail himself of their kindness.

The day passed away quickly, far too quickly for the young man, and when he left the Priory that night, his heart warmed at the remembrance of Alizon Neville's words asking him to come again soon.

This visit was the forerunner of others. They did not happen very often, because a large and growing Church took up a great deal of his time. Still he found his way to the Priory as often as he could, and each visit deepened the impression which the first had made. The atmosphere of this old home was so different from that of the other houses which he visited. Everything was so quiet, so orderly, so pure. He could not help comparing the conversation of Lady Neville and Alizon with that of his church officers. These men were kind and cordial, but in some of them was a taint of coarseness. They laughed at jokes which he did not like, and they did not care for some of the things which he loved. Besides, a minister's life is not a bed of roses. None but those who have had the care of a church can know of the thousand things which happen to wound a sensitive nature.

The excitement of the debate was over, and things had settled down to their normal state. The people were proud that their minister had borne himself so valiantly, but they held that he had only done his duty, and so no more need be said about the matter. Some few men who longed for publicity wrote letters to the Lynford Observer, but they were read by only very few, and with languid interest. The congregations at Tudor continued to be very large, and the increased activities of the church caused the minister a greatly added amount of work.

People with but few interests naturally live in a very narrow world, and as a consequence, grow jealous, and often fault-finding. They magnify their own importance, and feel hurt if others do not realise it. Duncan found this to his cost.

Such conversations as the following were often taking place, and each one of them wounded the young man sorely.

"Hollo, Mester Duncan."

"Oh, Mrs. Bray, how are you to-day?"

"Only middlin'. Aw noaticed as aa tha wert baan to gi' me the goa-by, so aw jist spok. Aw've bin very poorly. Yo' 'eerd on, aw spoase?"

"No, I hadn't heard."

"Yi, but I 'ave. Why, I've noan been i'side Tudor for three week. Ain't yo' noaticed?"

"No, I hadn't noticed."

"Yi, aw thowt as much. That's all th' noatice yo' tak' ov foak been away fro' chapel."

"Well, you see it's difficult to notice in a large congregation who's present and who isn't."

"Yi, aw spoase so. Aw'm one o' th' poor people, and so no noatice is took ov me. I 'eerd as 'aa yo' were in aar street; yo' called to see Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Longley, but yo' noan comed to see me. Yi, but yo're noan like owd Mester Simpson when oo wur minister at Tudor, 'oo never neglected me. Good mornin', Mester Duncan."

This may seem but a matter of little importance, but such conversations made Duncan miserable for days. He did all the visiting he was able; but the church and congregation were large, and lived all over the town, and thus a great deal of time was taken up in visiting a few people. It took him a long time, moreover, to know the members of his flock, and the history of the various families became confused in his mind.

If he called at a house, however, and confessed his ignorance concerning any member of the family, it was often taken as an offence. In short, he soon discovered that try as hard as he might, there was a number of people who grumbled at him, and spoke as if he neglected his work. This fact came to him in various ways, and he was quick to interpret the hints which fell.

In fact, the minister does not exist who pleases everybody, and as men grow older they cease to expect it, but Duncan was young and sensitive, and so every approach to fault-finding hurt him more than some direct attack would hurt many others.

True he found joy in his work, a joy unspeakable. He loved preaching, loved to prepare for his pulpit work, and his heart rejoiced beyond measure as he saw that young men and women were being influenced by his work. On the other hand, he found no pleasure in many of the meetings he was called upon to attend. Committee meetings, mothers' meetings, sewing meetings, and a host of others, were to him weariness of the flesh. And yet he was expected to attend them, and if he didn't, the fact was hinted to him in some form or another. One society grumbled that he took no interest in its welfare, and another complained that its meetings never made any headway since the last minister left them.

He discovered too, that although the Church was supposed to be free, it was bound by rules formulated a century ago, and often when he advanced something which he thought good for the working of the Church, he would be immediately met with a question as to what Rule 45 said about the matter.

Of course the great mass of the people was with him, and realised that never since the Church was formed had it been such a power for good, but many grumbled at innovations, and some would rather that work should be at a standstill, than done in any other way than their own. And so it came about that one jealous man stung him on the one side, and some conceited lad pricked him on the other, and he, because he was of a highly-wrought nature, felt pained beyond measure.

At some of the meetings he attended, men, who knew no more of the theology than of Sanscrit, aired their opinions with great confidence; while lads who hardly knew the A.B.C. of thinking, told him what he ought to do. He remembered the position held by the vicar of the parish in which Tudor was situated, and sighed. Sometimes when he was in a despondent mood, he wondered whether such methods of Church government were not contrary to the best interests of religion, and asked himself whether a minister could exercise a truly legitimate influence while he was regarded by the Church as simply a layman, with no more authority than themselves.

He reflected that he had spent six years of his life in studying the vital questions of church and religious life, and yet some weaver, or clogger, with the assurance of ignorance, treated his words as of the same value as his own.

Thus it came about that his visits to the Priory became trebly a pleasure to him. Here he met with people who understood him, people who were cultured, who had read the books he loved, and who enjoyed the thoughts that to him made life worth the living.

Several weeks had passed since the debate, and spring was fast approaching, the wide stretches of moors became less and less dreary, while, in spite of the smoke, the grass became greener, and the green leaves began to appear. Duncan had seen Father Sheen twice since the meeting to consider cab shelters, and on each occasion the old priest had been very cordial. He had been to the Priory four times, and on each occasion the influence of its inmates became greater.

Indeed, it became his delight to go to the old house, and thus when, one day, a letter from Lady Neville reached him, asking him to meet Father Ritzoom, a renowned scholar, who had brought with him some curious ancient manuscripts, he accepted the invitation with eagerness, and looked forward to conversation with a man who was a scholar and a thinker.

CHAPTER XIV.

HOW DUNCAN RUTLAND'S EYES WERE OPENED.

DUNCAN RUTLAND was much impressed by the learning, as well as by the geniality of Father Ritzoom. The manuscripts mentioned by Lady Neville proved to be some old parchments which had been recently discovered in one of the ancient monasteries in Palestine. They were said to be third century copies of parts of St. Paul's letters, and were of great value in proving both the genuineness and authenticity of the New Testament. Duncan, who was a very fair Latin scholar, entered eagerly into a debate with Father Ritzoom concerning their authorship, and presently the priest gave a very interesting account of the incidents which led to their discovery.

It appeared that an old man living in the monastery gave up his whole time to the deciphering and translating the various versions of the New Testament; dealing with the Epistles which Protestants declared to be uncanonical, as well as those which they had accepted. While busily searching among the vast collection of papers which were contained in the convent library, he discovered a crypt, and on further investigation, unearthed the precious writings on parchment which they were that night examining.

"Those old monasteries must be splendid store-houses of rare lore," remarked Duncan presently.

"Yes," replied Ritzoom, "and the Church has even been careful to treasure such riches. Throughout all the ages, even those when the clouds have been hanging heavily, she has always set apart her scholars to investigate, and thus to know the value of her great inheritance."

"Yes," replied Duncan, "and your position as the oldest Church has enabled you to have the greatest possible advantage in this direction."

"Naturally; no other section of the community can have access to our treasures," replied the priest, "that is, without our consent. The Greek Church has never been in a position to obtain these valuable relics of the past, while as for the Protestants—well, they are but of yesterday."

"That is true," remarked Duncan thoughtfully.

"Of course," went on the priest, "we have had to be careful of such MSS., it would have been a sin to have cast our pearls before swine. They have had to be guarded by the wise men in all ages. Had they been given to the ignorant, the thoughtless, the greatest riches of the Church would either have been destroyed, or turned to wrong uses. It would have been like giving ignorant quacks liberty to dabble with the mysteries of medicine."

"You do not believe in the old adage, Vox populi, vox Dei?" said Rutland.

"I believe it to be a device of the devil," replied the priest. "Why, just fancy the danger accruing from such a system. Think of placing power in the hands of the vulgar crowd. Supposing you gave over the government of your country to the mob; think of the anarchy which would result."

"And yet in a sense it is in the hands of the mob," remarked Rutland.

"In a sense! But what sense? This so-called enfranchisement of the people is only a plaything to appease the cravings of ignorant children. As a matter of fact, the government of England is in the hands of the few. The Prime Minister of the country, or the few who may be in league with him, formulate the measures which shall be brought before the House of Commons, which is itself only a debating society. In the end the members vote for the thing their leaders advocate."

"That is true in part, but only in part."

"A very great part. Why, how much do you or I know of what goes on in the Cabinet? I read The Times religiously every day; but I am in entire ignorance of what goes on in the councils of those who rule the land. Some time ago there were great naval preparations at Plymouth and elsewhere, there was much talk about the mobilisation of the British forces. I asked various members of Parliament belonging to the Government what was the meaning of it, and they were as ignorant as I was. Shortly after the Prime Minister spoke at a representative gathering, but he coolly told his hearers that he did not feel disposed to tell what it meant. Then we talk about the enlightenment of the British public."

"True again," said Rutland, "but, then, if a Government does not please the people, that Government is turned out at the next election."

"Yes, and another takes its place, which acts in entirely the same way. Of course, it sometimes appears as though the people rule; but they do not. It is the few who rule, and not the many. The newspapers raise a great hue and cry, and the people howl, but what effect has it?" and the priest laughed quietly.

"Mark you, I do not object to this," went on Ritzoom, "rather, I believe in it. A mob should never govern, a mob should have all its thinking done for it. This is true in all realms of life, it is the few who should control, and who, as a matter of fact, do control."

"Yes," replied Duncan, "but it is also true that these cliques have sown the seeds of revolution; they have legislated for their own class, they have kept all the power to themselves, with the result that the poor people have been oppressed and downtrodden, and the natural outcome of oppression is vice and ignorance."

"There you mistake me," replied the priest, "I believe that the heads of any community should regard themselves as the protectors of the common people. They should treat them as a father treats his children. He should do the very best for their comfort and their happiness, but directly he gives them the government of a household, anarchy, misery follow. This is true in relation to the placing of such valuable documents as these in the hands of the ignorant," and he pointed to the MSS. they had been discussing. "It can be dealt with only by students, by scholars, by those who know the value of such things. It is only scholars who can translate, it is only scholars who can teach the crowd the truths that they contain."

"DUNCAN ENTERED EAGERLY INTO A DEBATE WITH FATHER RITZOOM."

Duncan saw the drift of what the priest was saying; it was really an attack on the position he had taken when he gave his lecture on the Right of Private Judgment. He saw, moreover, that the Jesuit's words were full of fallacy, but at that moment the way to answer him did not appear. For one thing, he was influenced by the strong personality of the priest, he exercised a kind of charm which made his words seem weightier than they really were, and for another, he realised that he was the guest of Lady Neville, and that both she and Alizon were listening carefully to every word that was said.

"For my own part, I do not altogether agree with you," said Lady Neville presently, "in some respects I am a socialist, that is, I believe that a fair chance should be given to all. If there is a man in the mob who has intelligence, and who longs for culture, then by all means give him that culture."

"Your ladyship can have no more ardent supporter than I," remarked Ritzoom blandly. "In that sense our Church is the greatest socialistic force in the world. Is it not a fact that through all the ages, our priesthood, our scholars have come largely from the common people? In every town, in every village we have recognised genius, ay, anything of more than ordinary ability, wherever we have seen it, and that genius, however poor, has been given his chance. As you know, your ladyship, there have been Popes since St. Peter whose calling has been no higher than his upon whom the Church was built. But that is scarcely my contention. What I maintain is that the government of all communities should be given to the wise, and that the ignorant should not deal with those things for which they are utterly unfitted."

Rutland remembered the words of Goethe, who, when speaking of the Reformation, said that it had thrown back the civilisation of the world by centuries, because it had allowed the passions of the mob to decide on questions which could only be properly settled by wise men and scholars.

Under ordinary circumstances he would have been little moved by these things, but the influence of the old Catholic home to which he had been invited, the presence of two women who yielded their obedience to the Catholic system, and whose lives were pure and beautiful beyond reproach, seemed to make the priest's words appear in a new light. Besides, Ritzoom fascinated him. He felt that here was a man stronger than he, who had read more, thought more deeply, and whose knowledge of the world was infinitely greater than his own.

Moreover, as far as he could see just then, the conversation had arisen naturally out of the study of the manuscripts, and for the first time he realised how unwise it would have been to have placed precious documents in the hands of those who could not realise their value, or to allow ignorant men to interpret them. Well, and had not the Protestant Church done this, and were not the sects a rope of sand because every ignorant man had been allowed to use the Bible to support his own fads? After all, there was something in the Catholic position. In the presence of Ritzoom, it seemed to him as though it might be a dangerous thing to place the Holy Scriptures in the hands of the ignorant. He had often been ashamed of the numerous sects which existed, and which, while not now at war with each other, seemed to exist for no other purpose than the support of their own little Bethels.

But these were only passing thoughts. After all, his Protestant convictions were too real to be really shaken by this desultory conversation, and when soon after the conversation turned into other channels, the influence of the priest passed away.

Alizon had scarcely spoken throughout the whole evening; she had paid great attention to what had passed, but had taken no part in anything. Several times when Rutland had turned his eyes in her direction, he had noticed that she had been watching the priest closely, and sometimes her lips parted as though she would ask questions, but she had evidently decided to be silent, much to the young minister's disappointment.

"I propose we have some singing," said Ritzoom presently. "Come, Miss Alizon, I am sure you will not refuse us."

Without a word the girl went to the piano and commenced singing. Duncan had never heard her before; indeed, he did not know that she possessed any gifts in this direction, he was therefore surprised at the brilliance of her performance. She had a rich contralto voice, and sung with great sweetness and power. She chose some of the old Catholic Passion music, and rendered some of the solos in such a way that Rutland's heart was stirred to the depths. As he sat listening he forgot all that the priest had said, and for the time became almost oblivious to his surroundings. It seemed as if he were in some old Cathedral, and that the whole atmosphere of the place was pure and uplifting, he felt as the old patriarch must have felt when he heard the words, "Take off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground."

Outside the wind made music among the trees, but no other sound disturbed the silence of the night, while within the old Priory walls the girl poured out her soul in the music of those who had entered that sanctuary which may not be defamed by the unworthy.

Rutland listened like one entranced. Throughout the day his feelings had been wounded by people who were kind but who did not understand his sensitive nature, but to-night everything tended to soothe, to heal. Father Ritzoom had appealed to the intellectual side of his life, while now this beautiful girl ministered to his deeper feelings. The words she sung seemed to be a prayer for him, and somehow life became sweeter, holier, as he listened. What if her faith differed from his? What though she regarded him as a heretic? They were both as one in the great prayer she breathed forth in song. Why should he repudiate those who professed the Catholic faith? Did we not owe to them some of the divinest music the world had ever heard? The Church which had nurtured those souls who had entered so deeply into the spirit of harmony, could not be base. Besides, he had always admitted that Catholicism had given to the world the purest of saints? And so he became swayed by the music as tree-tops are swayed by the passing breeze.

About nine o'clock in the evening another visitor was announced. This proved to be a young man who lived about five miles away, and who was the only son of a Catholic squire. He was warmly welcomed by both Lady Neville and Alizon, while Father Sheen seemed to regard him as an old friend. When he was introduced to Father Ritzoom, the stranger professed great delight at seeing him, but he was cold and distant to Rutland.

It seemed that he had come to the Priory on horseback, in order to bring a message from his father, and Duncan was not long before he noticed the esprit de corps which evidently existed between the old Catholic families. The affectionate respect with which he treated Father Sheen also struck him. It was so different from the way in which the members of his own church regarded him. He knew that he was the target for every critical shaft which the discontented members of his congregation might see fit to send forth, while this priest commanded the respect of all.

Before long Duncan had the impression that Lady Neville was anxious for him to go. He saw that young Arthur Stanley had some news which he wished to communicate, and so soon after the young squire's arrival he rose to go.

"And I will walk back with you," said Father Sheen. "Ritzoom, I hope you will not be troubled by the Priory ghost."

"Nothing troubles me," replied the Jesuit, "I've seen too many strange things to be troubled by what Lancashire folks call 'a boggart;' but I'll call and see you to-morrow, so that you may be fully informed."

A few minutes later Duncan and the old priest were walking towards Lynford.

"It's been a delightful evening," said the young man.

"Yes," replied the other, "her ladyship is a model hostess, and Ritzoom is one of the most entertaining fellows I know. You don't know Mr. Arthur Stanley, I think?"

"No, I never met him until to-night."

"He belongs to a very old family, almost as old as the Nevilles. He will be wealthy some day, too. I suppose he is an aspirant for Miss Alizon's hand."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; I should not be surprised if he has not come on that errand. I think it would be a delightful arrangement. The estates of the two families join, and he is really a most estimable fellow. I thought she greeted him very kindly to-night, didn't you?"

"I really did not pay much attention."

"Oh, but she did. He has been in love with her for years. I must say it would give me joy to celebrate the marriage sacrament. She is a beautiful girl, and as good as she is beautiful. Arthur Stanley will be a lucky fellow if he gets her. Don't you think so?"

"She is very charming," replied Duncan, and the priest noticed that his voice sounded strangely husky.

"Is Father Ritzoom staying at the Priory long?" asked Rutland presently.

"About a month, I think. It is possible he will arrange for a Retreat there."

"A Retreat?"

"Yes. I suppose you scarcely know the meaning of the term."

"No; but I think I can guess what you mean."

"Very likely. It is simply a means for devout Catholics to deepen their spiritual life. Put in plain words, a number of people will for a few days leave the excitements of the world for the purpose of prayer. Father Ritzoom will be the officiating priest. I suppose you would not care to attend?"

"I—I don't know. I think not."

"Oh, these retreats are blessed occasions of grace. They make the spiritual world a greater reality. We all need them. But here I am at home. Good-night."

The young man hurried on like one demented. When he reached his lodgings he threw himself in the arm-chair before the fire. Every member of the household was in bed, and so perfect stillness reigned.

The fire burnt lower and lower, and the air grew cold; but he sat still. Midnight struck, but he never moved a muscle. His face was as pale as that of a corpse, his features were as still as those of a statue.

Presently he heard a step in the street outside. It was simply a policeman on his beat, but the sound disturbed him. He sat up and stared around the room like one dazed.

"My God, my God!" he cried hoarsely. "I cannot bear it; no, I cannot bear it!"

The first part of the Jesuit's prophecy had been fulfilled. Duncan Rutland realised that he loved Alizon Neville with all the strength of his nature.

CHAPTER XV.

"MAN PROPOSES, BUT GOD DISPOSES."

"WELL, what do you think of Rutland?" asked Father Sheen of Father Ritzoom, as the two men sat together in the study of the former the day following the visit to the Priory.

"I think that which confirms my first impressions concerning him," replied the Jesuit. "I think it is a great pity that such a he should be a heretic, and I am sure we shall be rendering our Church a great service by leading him to accept the faith."

"You think you will succeed then?"

"I think the sun will rise to-morrow morning," replied Ritzoom, "and I think that two and two make four."

"I am not so sure," replied Father Sheen, shaking his head. "That is," he added, seeing the Jesuit laugh, "I am not so sure that Rutland will be converted."

"Did I not know that you were of pure Celtic origin I should believe you had some taint of Anglo-Saxon blood in you," remarked Ritzoom. "An Englishman is generally certain when he should be doubtful, and doubtful when he should be certain. He can swear to a material demonstration, but never to a moral certainty. He can understand that a piece of steel can be attracted by a magnet, because he can appreciate physical forces; but he cannot be just as certain that a man of a certain disposition will yield to certain influences. To me, one is no less certain than the other."

"But human nature is a very complex business."

"So is a piece of machinery to a man who doesn't understand it. Everything is resolvable into some primary motive or principle; once understand that and all becomes plain. Besides, I believe in Providence."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, simply that Providence sent that Arthur Stanley to the Priory last night. Providence caused Alizon to greet him heartily. It brings matters to a speedy climax."

"In what way?"

"Did you not see Rutland's face last night?"

"I saw nothing particular."

"Sheen, you must be an Englishman. You could not be so dense otherwise. The fellow is already in love with her. He may not realise it yet; but he will in a day or two."

"How—how do you know?"

"How do I know that a man will laugh when you tickle him? By the way, did he say anything to you about Stanley? Did he ask you any questions?"

"I really have forgotten; but I know I told him that he was an aspirant for Alizon's hand."

"Ah, did you? Well?"

"I thought he took it quietly; stay, though, his voice was rather husky. But he changed the subject immediately after I had told him."

"Just so. He asked questions about me, didn't he?"

"My word, Ritzoom! But to tell the truth, he did. How did you know?"

The Jesuit laughed quietly.

"I don't think he slept much last night," he said presently.

"You believe then that——"

"I believe you are the most simple-minded fellow in the world, Sheen. You are too good to live."

"And you are the cleverest fellow I know. I wish you had met him in debate instead of my poor ignorant self. You would have pulverised him.

Last night he said ditto to nearly everything you said."

"Yes, and saw the fallacy of it all. Had I uttered those sentiments in a public meeting he would have torn them to pieces. No, no. Things are better as they stand."

"Well, but what is the next move in the game you are playing for this man's soul?"

"MIDNIGHT STRUCK, BUT HE NEVER MOVED A MUSCLE."

"I shall make no move."

"And he?"

"Well, I am not sure; but I don't think he will make any move."

"Then what are we to do?"

"Wait."

"But—but——"

"We shan't have to wait long. As I told you, I believe in Providence. In the meanwhile I can do a great deal of work at the Priory, and there is that Retreat."

"Oh yes. I mentioned something about it to Rutland."

Ritzoom looked at Father Sheen steadily.

"I told him that you were to conduct it, and asked him if he would care to come."

"Upon my word, Sheen, you are getting on. Well?"

"He said he did not think he would come."

Ritzoom looked steadily into the fire as though he were thinking.

"I am not sure, I am not sure," he said presently, like one thinking aloud.

"Not sure of what?"

"Oh, nothing! Have you read that life of Manning?"

"No; have you?"

"Yes. It is a dangerous book, a very dangerous book. It should be placed on the INDEX. I daresay it will be."

"But that will not prohibit Protestants from reading it. We are practically powerless in that direction."

"True. But never mind, Rutland will not read it. He will not read anything for some time to come. Poor fellow, I almost pity him."

"Do you think Alison cares anything about Stanley, Ritzoom?"

"Difficult to say. I should judge not. But you ought to know."

"Well, I don't; but another question: Do you think she cares anything about Rutland?"

"In a way, yes. But her feeling is by no means dangerous."

"She knows nothing of your plans?"

"As far as she is concerned, certainly not."

"Nor her ladyship?"

"No. I saw as soon as I had met her that it was out of the question. Still it does not matter. Both are anxious for his conversion; and both are willing to render what service they can to bring around such a desirable state of things. Oh, I'm perfectly satisfied!"

Meanwhile Duncan Rutland sat alone in his lodgings. As Father Ritzoom had said, he had not slept a wink during the night, and now, as he crouched before the fire, his head resting on his hands, he looked worn out and ill. His face was very pale, while around his eyes dark rings had gathered. The revelation of his love had come upon him suddenly, and it had almost stunned him. He had been playing with dangerous weapons, and had not known it. Never dreaming of the plot of which he was the victim, he had gladly gone to the Priory, and at each visit he had yielded more and more to the spell of a young girl's eyes. He did not know of the subtle influence which was working in his nature. He had thought of Alison Neville as a beautiful, cultured girl, one who welcomed him kindly and made his every visit pleasant. In spite of the fact that she regarded him as an enemy to truth, or perhaps it was because she so regarded him, he was much interested in her; but the thought of loving her had never entered his mind. Her social position, her wealth, her antagonism to his faith, made it out of the question. He had felt no pang of jealousy when Arthur Stanley came into the room—it was too absurd; nor, perhaps, would his secret have been revealed to him had not Father Sheen told him of Stanley's hopes.

Then the truth came to him, and stunned him. He knew he loved her, knew that his life would be barren and utterly dreary without her. She had kindled a fire in his heart which could never be extinguished, the whole wealth of his life had gone out to her, and without her the future seemed but a dreary mockery.

"Everything is against it," he cried, as at length he started from his chair and began to pace the room. "Everything, everything! I belong to a class which does not mate with that to which she belongs. She is an aristocrat, I am a commoner; she is rich, I am poor—and yet I love her! Even although it were possible for her to love me, she could never be the wife of a Nonconformist minister. She is the only daughter of Lady Neville, an ardent Catholic. No, no, I must fight it—kill it!"

He seized his hat and went out. He could not breathe in his little study, the air was hot and stifling. A few minutes later he was out on the moors, where the wind swept freely, and the air smelt sweet and pure. He walked for hours, but he did not grow tired, nor did his eyes cease to burn with an unnatural light.

Again and again did he declare that he would cast his love from him as a painful mockery, and as often did he find himself hugging it to his breast as the joy of life. It was the old old story. A man fighting against the dictates of his heart, and being defeated. The very habits of his life made his love more hopeless. He had not been accustomed to the society of women; he had had no love affairs. Had he, his present passion would not have been so strong, so overwhelming. From nineteen to twenty-six he had lived in his class-rooms and among his books. He had come to Lynford ignorant of the master-passion of life, and no member of his congregation had stirred his heart. Now—the flood-gates of his heart had been opened wide, and he was helpless.

He felt thankful for those wild, wide moors, and when he had got miles away from the town, so far that no signs of life were visible, he stood and looked around him. The sight was almost awe-inspiring; everywhere as far as the eye could reach the bare moorland stretched around him, rising and falling like great billows. Sometimes it seemed to him like a mighty sea, while he was alone, "all, all alone." Above, the grey sky spread itself, dull, gloomy, oppressive. Scarcely a streak of blue was to be seen. No sound was to be heard save the wailing of the wind, and an occasional cry of the moor birds.

"Of course she never dreams of such a thing," he cried presently, "it is absurd to think of it; it is worse than absurd, it is madness. Oh, I must kill it, I must kill it!"

He remembered the work he had to do, the great congregations to which he had to minister, the meetings he had to attend. He felt thankful that his sermons for the next Sunday were already written, otherwise he would have to stand dumb before the people. He knew that his preaching would be a failure on the following Sunday; he felt afraid. Close by him was an old turf hedge. It had been built in some far back age, but for what purpose no one knew. There were no other evidences that the moors had ever been inhabited. Still, at some period there must have been men who lived there, and who had their hopes, their fears, their passions, just as he had. Who were they? What did they believe?

He knelt down on the soft, springy turf and cried aloud. "Oh God, hear me!" he cried. "Oh God, help me!" But the wailing wind and the shriek of the moor birds were the only answers that he heard to his prayer.

And yet his wild cry helped him. It made him realise the fact that he was not alone. The Spirit of God was on those wild moors, and that Spirit cared for him.

Hour after hour he stayed out there alone. By and by the rain fell, and the winds blew louder, but he did not heed. He partook of no food, but he felt neither faint nor hungry. He tried to formulate his plans, tried to think of means whereby his mad passion could be destroyed.

He remembered the words of old Matthy Bray. Yes, he would find a wife! That would be it. He would drive the thought of Alizon Neville from his mind. This was his manifest duty. When he married he must have a wife who would help him in his Church, and who would be received by the members of his congregation. Yes, the eldest Miss Ashton would make a suitable minister's wife. She was nearly his own age, she had received a conventional education, she was pious, and had been connected with Tudor Chapel all her life. She was wealthy too. She would receive £10,000 for her wedding dowry, and her position in the town was assured. Everyone would declare that his choice was wise. He did not think she would reject him; apparently she delighted in his company, and would not refuse to be mistress of his home. At least, he hoped not. As for the thought of marrying Alizon Neville, it was utter madness. Fancy her marrying a Protestant minister—it would outrage the religious life of the town. Yes, that must be his plan. He would drive her from his mind, and in order to do that he would call at Mr. Ashton's that very night.

He reached his lodgings about eight o'clock in the evening, and then, realising that his clothes were wet, he changed them, and afterwards went to Mr. Ashton's house. As he expected, he was met with a hearty welcome. The Lancashire people are among the most hospitable in the world; besides, Duncan was their minister, and was beloved by every member of the family.

He did his best to enter into the pleasures of the evening. He laughed loudly, he told stories, he sought the company of the eldest Miss Ashton, and did his best to make himself agreeable. The eldest Miss Ashton was evidently pleased at Duncan's behaviour; she sung the two songs she knew best, and reached a very high note at the conclusion of "Killarney"—a note which had never failed to draw a cheer at the concerts held at Tudor school-room.

Miss Ashton was renowned for this song. It was regarded as her song, and she had sung it scores of times with about as much feeling as an organ-grinder puts into the music which he grinds to order.

Duncan cheered the song greatly. He had heard her sing it several times before, just as the previous minister had heard it, but his applause was none the less hearty. Then she sung her other song, "Ora Pro Nobis," which she rendered in just the same way as she had rendered the other. He had heard it on every barrel organ in the town, it had been sung at almost every concert he had attended. Under other circumstances he would have felt like laughing. Miss Ashton was stout and florid. Her face was placid, there was no passion in her nature. She ate well, she slept well, and was as little able to sing such a song as she was able to sing that sublime music which Alizon Neville had played with so much feeling the night before. The picture of the young girl came back to him, and he could not help comparing her with this buxom young woman who went on woodenly repeating both music and words.

No, he could not carry out his plans. It would be sacrilege to try and pretend to love her. How could this commonplace girl, good and true as she undoubtedly was, drive from his heart that which had so completely mastered him?

He left Mr. Ashton's house early, and for several days after he was not seen except at the meetings he was obliged to attend. Every day, wet or fine, he went out on the moors, as though they fascinated him.

He did not go near the Priory; sometimes he climbed the hills and looked down at the old house which nestled among the trees; but he went no nearer, he dared not. He called to mind what Father Sheen had said about "A Retreat," and wondered what it meant. He fancied Alizon kneeling in the little chapel and praying amidst a great silence.

He never intended, nor expected to tell Alizon Neville of the love which she had inspired in his heart, neither, indeed, did he take any steps in order to see her. Indeed, nearly a month passed away, and he kept away from the old house, then when the spring had fairly come he went across the moors in the very direction he had gone when he had first spoken to her. He was passing through the farmyard where he had heard her talking with the farmer's wife, when he saw her coming towards him from the farm house.

The blood surged into his pale cheeks, and his heart seemed as though it would burst. Still he mastered himself, and when Alizon Neville held out her hand to him he seemed fairly cool and collected.

"You have forsaken us, Mr. Rutland," said the girl kindly. "Have you been especially busy?"

"No," replied Rutland, "no, I have not been very busy."

"Then why have you not been to see us? Have you been ill?"

"Yes—no—that is, I don't know."

She looked at him keenly. His manner bewildered her.

"Has anything been troubling you?" she asked kindly.

"Yes," he replied.

"I am so sorry; but your trouble has passed, I hope?"

"No, it has not passed."

He spoke roughly, almost rudely.

"I am so sorry," she said again, "but perhaps it will soon be gone."

"No, it will never be gone."

"Never be gone?"

"No, never."

He had not meant to speak in this way, but the girl's presence seemed to drag the words from him.

"Are you ill? Excuse me, I will gladly help you if I can."

He walked on by her side some time without speaking, while the girl wondered what ailed him.

"I must tell you," he said at length, "I did not mean to, and doubtless you will be angry with me, ay, scorn me, but I cannot help it. God knows I have fought against it, fought with all my strength—but it is no use."

She had no idea of what was in his mind. That he should dream of loving her had never appeared to her even as a dim possibility. She fancied that he might be worried about his church work. Of course it was that, or, (and her heart beat with joy at the thought of it), was the truth revealing itself to him? Yes, that was it. He had become dissatisfied with Protestantism, the truths of her religion had mastered him, even while he was a Protestant minister. She had prayed for this so earnestly, prayed that he might be led to stand up in the Industrial Hall and confess his error. It had seemed too good to be true, but God was good, and had answered her prayers sooner than she had dared to hope.

"Yes, tell me, Mr. Rutland," she said kindly, "tell me everything. Perhaps I can help you."

"You will be angry with me."

"Oh no, I will not; tell me. Perhaps I know more of what is in your heart than you think," and she looked up into his face with a kindly smile.

"Very well," said Duncan, his heart throbbing mightily at her words, "I will tell you."

Peter Drummond and his Tract Depot.

IT was no small gratification to be conducted in the autumn of last year over the celebrated Stirling Tract Depot by the Editor, Rev. Dr. Andrew, since, alas, taken from his work to his reward. It happened to be about the jubilee of its institution. "The British Messenger" had been a welcome paper to us from its start in 1853; especially was it welcome in its early days, when it was conducted with remarkable vigour and freshness, so that it brought with it not only spiritual quickening, but intellectual stimulus and gain. As to the Tracts, we knew that they had been the means of reaching many whom a sermon failed to find. Accompanying Dr. Andrew through "flat" after flat, and room upon room, the capacity and organisation of the "Stirling Tract Enterprise," (for by this fitting name it is called), excited our astonishment; printers, binders, packers, clerks, in their several flats or rooms, all busy at their work; but what most struck us were the large frames with capacious compartments for holding tracts of different kinds, sizes, and languages—European, Eastern, indeed we know not how many languages, aids to workers in the different mission fields. Who was the author and organiser of this great undertaking? Every one knows the name of Peter Drummond, Stirling. The portrait of the man given here shows part of the full-length portrait presented by the inhabitants of Stirling to their distinguished fellow-citizen in 1872, when he was in his seventy-third year, and was retiring from his work; it was painted by the celebrated Scots artist, Macbeth. This fine work of art hangs in the chief room of the Depot.

The dates indicated above show that Mr. Drummond was born in the last year of the last century. The father, William Drummond, a fine specimen of the old Scots Seceder, dwelt at St. Ninians, not half a mile from the ever famous Bannockburn battlefield. In this historic village there were born unto him eleven sons and four daughters, only one of whom remains to this day, Mr. David Drummond, who went to Dublin to carry on the business there. One of the sons, Henry, was the father of the late well-known Professor Drummond. The business carried on at St. Ninians by William Drummond and his sons was that of land surveying and nurserymen; and so vigorously and prudently were their affairs conducted that the firm ultimately developed into a "Limited" concern. Peter, the fourth son, was deputed, when only a young man, to open and carry on a seedsman's branch in the town of Stirling. Peter was not of the weakling sort of men who do things by halves; what he did he did with all his intent and his might; when he became a seedsman he was all a seedsman, with the all but infallible result that the business prospered in his hand. No doubt that heredity, environment, and the personal factors of energy and religion, made Peter Drummond the man he was. It is no trifle to come of a good stock, as one's forbears are apt, more or less, to appear in oneself. The Drummonds had been a robust, godly, thrifty, and therefore, thriving people for generations; given to simple living and high thinking: one of them was worth more than a dozen "fast" men. As to environment, the life at home, the scenery in the midst of which stands the town on the Rock—you will have to travel far and wide to match it for variety, grandeur, and beauty. Then, the inspiration of Scots patriotism by the proximity of the field where "Scots wha' hae wi' Wallace bled," counted for something; nor must we overlook the element of true religion. These things were the making of the man. As we have seen, before he was twenty-five he had to bear the burden of responsibility of an important business in Stirling, and in his hands it continued to grow until it became an important and flourishing concern, till his name became "well kent" in the town and the country around. "The Agricultural Museum" which he established was a great success. Farmers and gardeners coming into the town might see and examine the latest inventions in agricultural implements, and the rarest varieties of seeds, roots, bulbs, plants, etc. So valuable was this Museum that it won him the gold medal. With the acquisition of means he built a house for himself at Viewforth, and adorned the grounds with statues of such good men as Wallace, Bruce, John Knox, and Chalmers. His soul underwent a quickening to the things of God in 1839 under the preaching of that modern John the Baptist, Rev. W. Burns, of China fame;

the new life was fostered and fed by the ministry of one of the foremost champions of evangelical religion in Scotland, Rev. Dr. Beith. But how was he led into this famous Tract Enterprise? Not a mile from Stirling stand the ruins of the once splendid Abbey of Cambuskeneth, with grounds and gardens all about. Here crowds were wont to spend Sabbath afternoons and evenings in mirth, if not revelry. Peter Drummond resolved upon a crusade against this crying evil. He wrote a Tract upon the sacred claims of the Sabbath, and got it printed, and went down, he and a few friends, among the gay crowd, giving his tract and speaking to the people. This good work was continued till the evil was checked. His tract became so popular that a million copies were circulated, and one of the curios in the Depot is a copy of this first tract. The next assault was upon the desecration of the Sabbath by railway trains; except a single train for mails on the main lines, there are no Sunday trains in Scotland. Then came his successful crusade against horse-racing; numbers of men, mere harpies, came to the town to trade upon the vices of the people. This movement was well organised, and even a band of boys (one of whom is now Provost of Stirling), were engaged to circulate the tract against the racing scandal. Following upon this was the tract against intemperance; this terrible evil awakened the opposite feelings of sympathy and indignation in Mr. Drummond's breast, and his tract was strong and his labour strenuous to abate the mischief. Then came other tracts against profane swearing, promiscuous dancing, theatre-going, popery, infidelity; others again were written on some Gospel theme. Now came his first box of "pigeon-holes," with sorted tracts in each, so that when writing a letter he could reach a tract and enclose it. This box is another relic kept at the Depot. The pointing of the finger of Providence caused Mr. Drummond in 1852 to relinquish his business and give his life to the Tract Movement. To this his brothers generously agreed, giving him still his share of the profits of the business, which enabled him to carry out his "Enterprise" without fee or reward. The idea of a religious newspaper was new then; the first he saw was "The American Messenger," which so fascinated him that he resolved to follow the American lead, hence came the "British Messenger." There was not much of the "news" element in it, but its fresh and vigorous treatment of practical religious questions made it of value. Mr. Drummond's practical genius next started a large-type periodical, known as "The Gospel Trumpet," and this was followed by a Mission serial, "Good News." The vitality of this work is seen in the fact that down to this day about a quarter of a million of these three serial publications are issued monthly from the Depot. For lack of space the seed warehouse was left in 1856 for larger premises in Murray Place. The spirit the man was of appeared in his collecting all his employes around him every Saturday afternoon for praise and prayer for a blessing upon the week's work. But by 1862 the Murray Place premises became too strait for the ever-growing business, and a removal was made to a larger place at the foot of King Street. In the new establishment not only was the Saturday afternoon service continued, but a morning family worship was instituted. This marvellously energetic man, in addition to his Depot work, found time to undertake evangelistic and temperance work in Stirling and the villages round about; his high character, his fervent spirit, his gift of forcible address, his apt and striking illustrations, made him an attractive and effective evangelist. By 1872 the excessive strain so told upon him that he had reluctantly to face the fact that his active work was done. It was then that the town rose up to testify to the greatness of the work he had accomplished. He lived for five years in retirement in Edinburgh, with his seven children; and in his seventy-seventh year went in perfect peace to his God and his reward. He rested from his labours, but his work still follows him.

THE DRUMMOND TRACT DEPOT.

"A Little Cloud Like a Man's Hand."

(LAST REPORT.)

"Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand."—1 KINGS xviii. 44.

HE sea is the main reservoir of the clouds. From its wide waste of waters spreading out for millions of square miles, the sun is continually pumping up invisible vapour which collects as clouds and floats along the bosom of the atmosphere in masses driven by the winds, and then condenses into rain and distils upon the earth as so much creative wealth, as grass and corn and flowers and trees in the making. One is delighted at seeing it rain after a protracted season of drought. One is ready to shout: "It is raining bread and meat and clothes: drink is coming for all thirsty things: food for man and beast is falling: life is flowing down in torrents from the skies."

And it is another instance, in addition to thousands that might be mentioned, which go to show the beneficence of the Creator, that the clouds before they dissolve are allowed to assume such fantastic shapes. He might have made them as uninteresting in their aspect as possible, resembling a dirty sheet drawn over the sky, the same at the middle and at the margin and throughout; nothing of beauty either in the shape or the colour of it; but everything on the contrary to repel the eye and to depress the spirits. He might have constituted them a necessary evil, as ugly as they are useful. But what is the fact? Why, that cloud-land is dream-land, that cloud-land is fairy land; that the clouds are a gallery of pictures of all kinds changing every moment; that they form a series of dissolving views, melting away as you gaze on them; that they are a region of poetry and romance where the imagination may revel for hours together.

I once saw, when at college, looking out of my study window early one summer morning, a piece of cloud-scenery which I have never forgotten, it was so enchanting. It resembled a mountainous country rising by an easy ascent, tipped and tinged with hues of bewitching beauty, and there were valleys and rocks and precipices; and there was actually the appearance of a pathway such as a pedestrian might follow, leading from the plains beneath up to the summit. I called a fellow student of brilliant conversational powers to enjoy with me a sight which I well knew would in a few minutes pass away for ever, and as he stood there devouring it with his eyes, I remarked: "What a pity it is that we cannot have it painted!" "Paint God!" he said, somewhat severely. He meant to say that this work of God was so superior to any imitation of it that the skill of an artist could produce, it was almost as profane to think of painting God Himself as of putting upon canvas an adequate representation of a scene like that.

I dare say it was with some of us a favourite occupation when we were young to watch the clouds; to track some fairy ship as it sailed with flowing canvas across the azure deep; where they resembled beds of down, to imagine ourselves reclining upon them with an exquisite sense of repose; and, where they looked like a range of mountains, with summit sharp-cut against the blue sky, to imagine ourselves running along the level ridge with a feeling of buoyancy that was delicious.

When Elijah began to pray for rain, kneeling on the top of Mount Carmel, he sent his servant to look out towards the Mediterranean Sea, which washed the foot of the mountain, and from which, if from any quarter, the rain was likely to proceed. The servant went and looked, but brought back the discouraging report: "There is nothing." Elijah directed him to go again and again and again, until he should have been seven times if it were necessary. He did so, and up to the sixth time his report was always the same discouraging one, There is nothing. Perhaps he wore a very incredulous look as to whether there ever would be anything, and thought within himself: What a strange man my master is to think he can procure rain by means of prayer, and to keep me here running to and fro looking out for it when there has not been a drop of it for this miserable country these three years and a half, and perhaps never will be again. But when he came back from his outlook the seventh time he proceeded, we fancy, at a faster pace than before, and his sprightly countenance showed that he had got good news to tell, and he spoke in a quick, animated way as he delivered his report in these words, "Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand."

The description which Elijah's servant gave of the little cloud which he saw in the distance, and which soon overspread the sky and came down a teeming shower upon all the land that was so dry and parched, has since been used innumerable times to describe movements which were small in their beginning but which afterwards became great. It appropriately depicts the origin of Christianity—the tokens of coming changes for good—and the first signs of a revival of religion.

I. The language of Elijah's servant well describes THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY.

It is deeply interesting to trace up to their beginning—as we sometimes can trace up—movements which have altered the face of society, and improvements which have multiplied the resources of mankind, and discoveries which have widened immensely the boundaries of human knowledge. These advancements have sometimes proceeded from the active brain of a single individual, and that individual was once obscure and was once a little child just beginning to observe and to learn and to think. Could we have been introduced to such a one in his childhood, having a full knowledge of what he was destined to be and to do, we should have gazed on him with a feeling akin to reverence, because we should have seen his diminutive form invested with all the importance of the consequences he was going to produce. In the child afterwards known as Lord Bacon, we should have seen the vast discoveries of modern science: in young George Washington, the Independence of America: in Mazzini, the liberation and unification of Italy: and in little Walter Scott, a wide realm of noble literature lifted at one bound above the prevailing impurities of fine writing.

Or going to the Scriptures for our examples: Abraham, as he went forth from Chaldæa to Canaan a childless man, would have appeared the embodiment of the Jewish nation, and of that covenant with God which was the glory of their nationality. The babe Moses, floating in the ark of bulrushes on the River Nile, and weeping in the arms of Pharaoh's daughter, would have been surrounded to our eyes with all the majesty of the Dispensation of the Law which he was to inaugurate. And young David, tending his father's sheep, would have been seen followed by an illustrious line of kings, while all around him the air resounded with the melody of myriads of synagogues and sanctuaries chanting his inspired psalms. What, then, should we have seen while we gazed on the infant Jesus in the arms of His mother Mary? We should have seen a multitude which no man could number gathered out of all nations redeemed from their iniquities.

Christianity has sprung from Jesus Christ. All in it that illumines and blesses and does us good, all that disposes us to do our duty in this world, and at the same time prepares us for another and a better world hereafter, we owe to Him. Every true Christian has both an historical and a spiritual connection with Christ. He is historically connected with Him, for he has received his religion from those who were Christians before him, and they again from others, until if you trace up the succession of generations and of centuries, the number of Christians growing less and less, like a river which dwindles as you ascend to its source, you will find yourself at last in a disreputable village of Palestine called Nazareth, and in the home of a carpenter of that village, where you will see a young man who, when He is addressed by any other member of the family, gets called Jesus. Within the breast of that young man the whole Christian Church of the future was contained.

But every Christian has a spiritual as well as an historical connection with Christ. The connection which the branch has with the parent tree from which it derives the sap by which it is nourished: the connection of every limb of the body with the heart is not more necessary to that branch and to that limb than the union of the Christian by faith and love with Christ is necessary to that new life into which he has been introduced. It is not with a dead Christ embalmed in history, but with a Christ who, though He once was dead, now liveth, and is alive for evermore, that he is in sympathy and in daily communion. "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."

That is the character, and that is the position of every true believer in Christ Jesus. He is historically, and he is spiritually connected with Christ. Now let your eye take in the whole number of such believers. Except in some brief period, they have been continually increasing since the day His ministry began until now; you see them in imagination a grand procession marching past you in the order of their generations, all followers of the same Saviour, and all, notwithstanding their diversities of occupation and of opinion, animated by the same spirit of love and loyalty to Him. How vast and how beneficial has been the influence which He has exerted upon mankind! How immense the number of those who have owed to Him their deliverance from the worst evils and their introduction to the highest good!

But now when you have seen the whole number of His followers to be so great and His cause so mighty in the world, go back to that day on which He first emerged from His obscurity, when, on the banks of the Jordan, He was pointed out by John the Baptist to two of his disciples—probably John and Andrew, as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and these two spent the rest of the day with Him, and afterwards introduced to Him Simon Peter, and you will see the little cloud which has since developed into all this greatness, and which must go on expanding till the earth is deluged with righteousness. "For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet."

II. The text appropriately represents THE EARLY TOKENS OF COMING CHANGES FOR GOOD.

The great changes that come over the face of the world—over its opinions, and over its institutions, and over its governments may be consummated in a very short space of time, but they are usually, in proportion to their importance and to their permanence, a long time preparing. The gossip of the hour occupies itself with the events that appear upon the surface: it knows nothing of the work of preparation that is going on beneath the surface, and nothing of the undercurrent of thought that is circulating. But if you confine your attention to the particular event by which some great movement is wound up—such as the battle that settles in blood an international dispute—you will miss much of the impressiveness of the movement as a spectacle for observation, and what is more, you will miss the indications of an over-ruling Providence which he who watches it throughout will see in the feeble beginning of that which at the close is irresistible, and in its gradual growth and onward march in obedience to a hidden force working for the welfare of men.

Undoubtedly, great changes for good are now taking place—changes that will overturn institutions which have been in existence for hundreds of years—changes that will affect the well-being for time and for eternity of millions upon millions of people. The hand of God is in them, and though they have been feared by the timid, though they have been resisted with passionate pleading by those attached to the old order of things, they will be confessed hereafter to have been the glory of our time. Some of them are very palpable, and we hardly know whether to wonder most at those who cannot see them, or at those who see them plainly enough but think that they can stop them. Stop them! They might as well attempt to stop the tide when it invades the beach. Stop them! They might as easily stop the chariot of the sun when its glowing wheels roll up the heights of heaven. We have lived to see things accomplished which our fore-elders would have reckoned impossibilities, and the world is not going to stand still. We have seen doctrines which at first could gain no hearing except from a few choice spirits spread until they commanded universal attention and universal respect. We have seen schemes which were derided at first as arrant folly accepted at last as the profoundest practical wisdom. Let us devoutly acknowledge the hand of God in great social and political changes which improve the condition of mankind. Let us watch from the Carmel of calm contemplation the first tokens of coming revolutions, and take care that we do not come under the lash of that rebuke which was administered by Christ to the Sadducees and Pharisees of His day—"When it is evening ye say, It will be fair weather, for the sky is red; and in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering. O, ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky: but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

III. The text faithfully depicts THE FIRST SIGNS OF RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.

It is not God's way of working to affect all at once a great number of people with gracious impressions, but to begin with one or with a small company, and to use them as the medium for conveying the power of His Spirit to other minds until the sanctified influence has spread far away from the spot where it first appeared. A band of men whose hearts God has touched instrumentally impart the truths which they have seen and felt, and the holy earnestness with which they have become possessed, to others and these to others again, until it may be the effects are felt in far-off lands.

It was thus with the great Methodist revival. It began with a small band of Oxford students, who, in the year 1729, agreed to spend three or four evenings in the week together to read classics on common evenings, and on Sundays some book in divinity. They were only four in number, and now twenty millions. The Methodist revival was not confined to those who bear the name. The Evangelical party in the Church of England, the Congregationalists and Baptists are largely Methodists without the name—indebted to Whitefield, rather than to Wesley, for the renewal of their youth, and for the baptism of fire which they received last century. It matters little about the name so long as they became partakers of the blessing. The Holy Club at Oxford was the little cloud like a man's hand, and like that other cloud seen by Elijah's servant, it has spread.

The Primitive Methodist Connexion, so remarkably successful in the work of evangelisation, originated in a day's praying, or a camp-meeting, on the top of Mow Hill, near the Potteries in Staffordshire. This circumstance has often been recalled by the people as they have witnessed the growth of their work, and has been expressed by a homely couplet:—

"The little cloud increases still That first arose upon Mow Hill."

The class of ten members, which was all they had to begin with, has swelled to a multitude of classes comprising close on 200,000.

We have seen a recent instance of growth from little to large in the rapid spread of the Christian Endeavour movement. The first society was formed with this unpretending name by Dr. Clarke in connection with his own church in America some eighteen years ago; and now there is an extensive network of such societies both in America and in England containing three millions of members. It has proved to be a real revival of religion, and has supplied the link so long desired between the Sunday School and the Church.

There is a useful suggestion to those who long for revived life in their own churches in the fact that, when the servant of Elijah saw the little cloud rising out of the sea, his master was praying on the mountain, and had persevered in prayer all the time that the previous discouraging reports were being presented one after another. When the spirit of prayer is diffused the little cloud may be expected; nay, is not the very existence of such a spirit a harbinger of showers of blessing? It is a question by which we may test the sincerity of our prayers: Are we led to look out for answers to them? This, too, is a searching test: Are we impelled by them to do anything? Are they followed by effort where effort has a place?

The first thought of better things which comes into the mind, and comes to stay, prepares the way for others of like kind to follow, and has in it the promise of all the happy results to which it leads. Let us cherish, then, the beginnings of good, though small and feeble, seeing in them not merely what they are now, but what they will be, and so waiting and working till they are brought to perfection.

IV. TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD TABERNACLE: WHITEFIELD'S SOUL-TRAP.

BY REV. ALBERT A. BIRCHENOUGH.

URING the middle of the eighteenth century the far-famed Tottenham Court Road Tabernacle, which has been recently taken down on account of its insecure condition, and is being replaced by a more modern structure, was the scene of George Whitefield's eloquent four to attend his Tabernacle discourses at five. I have seen Moorfields as full of lanterns at these times as I suppose the Haymarket is as full of flambeaux on an opera night. As a preacher, if any man were to ask me who was the second I ever had heard, I should be at some loss; but in regard to the first, Mr. Whitefield exceeded so far every other man of my time that I should be at none. He was the original of popular preaching, and all our popular ministers are only his copy."

istry. The devoted John Newton records: "bless God that I have lived in Whitefield's time. any were the winter mornings I have got up at

At the present time, Tottenham Court Road is one of the busiest and best known thoroughfares of the crowded Metropolis. At the dawn of the last century it was fringed with an open space, on which were held annual carnivals, one of which was widely-known as the Gooseberry Fair. These yearly festivals were associated with much horse-play, rowdiness, drunkenness, and their accompanying vices. After Whitefield's separation from Wesley, on account of their theological differences, some of his friends belonging to the Calvinistic Methodists erected a large wooden shed in this moral "waste, howling wilderness" of Moorfields. It was built in the year 1741 upon a plot of ground that was lent for the purpose, and near to Wesley's Foundry

THE TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD OF LAST CENTURY, SHOWING WHITEFIELD'S FIRST TABERNACLE.

Chapel. The pulpit was in keeping with the building, and consisted of a grocer's empty sugar barrel. As the shed was only a temporary erection for the holding of religious services, it was called the Tabernacle, in reference to the ancient tabernacle that was used by the Israelitish Church during the wilderness wanderings.

The foundation-stone of Tottenham Court Road Chapel, or Tabernacle, was duly laid in May, 1756, when the Rev. George Whitefield preached to a large congregation. The chapel was designed by Whitefield, and was built on a plot of ground leased from the Fitzroy family, which was then known as "The Crab and Walnut Field," and was described as being situated near to a pond called "The Little Sea." In writing to his patroness, the pious Countess of Huntingdon, Whitefield says: "I have taken a piece of ground not far from the Foundling Hospital, whereon to build a new chapel." The immediate cause of its erection was the determined opposition manifested by the vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields to the evangelical doctrines as taught by Whitefield in his ministry at a chapel in Long Acre. The original Tabernacle was an unpretentious double-lined brick building, seventy feet square, and capable of accommodating a large congregation; over the main doorway was a carved representation of Whitefield's coat-of-arms. There was nothing handsome or pretentious in its architectural appearance. It was one of those bald-looking conventicles that were regarded by our Non-conformist forbears as being a Puritan Paradise—a place of spiritual delights. The opponents of the eccentric evangelist satirically called the new chapel, "Whitefield's Soul-trap," to which Whitefield quietly replied: "I pray that God may make it indeed a soul-trap to many of His wandering creatures."

When the Tabernacle was finished, Whitefield was bitterly disappointed because the Bishop would not recognise it as a Chapel-of-ease in connection with the Church of England. It is said that Whitefield made application to the Bishop of London to consecrate the spare ground adjoining the Tabernacle as a cemetery. His lordship having refused to perform the ceremony, Whitefield obtained several cartloads of earth from a churchyard in the city, which he had spread over the adjacent surface, and thenceforth he regarded it as being "sacred ground."

As one writer good-humouredly remarks: "How deep the consecration went downwards, was a question he did not even attempt to decide."

Owing to Whitefield's popularity the congregation so rapidly increased, that within a few years after the opening, the chapel had to be considerably enlarged, and an octagonal front was added, which gave the building a grotesque appearance, and caused it to be known as "The Oven." His numerous friends and congregation contributed of their wealth and enabled him to erect twelve almshouses for the poor, and also to build a spacious chapel-house.

During his ministry at the Tabernacle, Whitefield's occasional hearers included some of the most distinguished men and women of the day belonging to the realm of politics, literature, science, wealth and fashion. They comprised King George III., the Prince of Wales, and his Royal brothers and sisters; Lords Chesterfield, Halifax, and Bolingbroke; the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Bath, and the Earl of Ormond; Sir Joshua Reynolds; burly Samuel Johnson, of dictionary fame, and Oliver Goldsmith, who wrote "The Vicar of Wakefield," Horace Walpole, David Hume, and David Garrick; the prelates were represented by Bishop Warburton; the distinguished ladies included Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, the Countess of Huntingdon, Lady Chesterfield, and Lady Fanny Shirley.

On one memorable Sabbath, Ned Shuter, a "prince of melodramatic comedy," ventured into the Tabernacle. At the time of his visit to Whitefield's Chapel he was engaged at one of the leading London theatres, and was playing the part of "the FELCH THE SECOND TABERNACLE, CONDEMNED BY THE COUNTY COUNCIL AS A DANGEROUS STRUCTURE.

Rambler" in a popular drama. Whitefield, who "was instant in season and out of season," turned to Shuter and addressing him personally, expressed the hope that in the course of his "ramblings" he might be led to "ramble" to the Lord Jesus. For the moment Shuter was disconcerted by this unexpected personal appeal, and publicly remonstrated with the preacher for his unseemly liberty. Shuter, however, was religiously impressed, and became a despised Methodist.

Occasionally the Tabernacle pulpit was occupied by such distinguished divines as Fletcher, of Madeley, Augustus Toplady, who wrote "Rock of Ages," and the godly William Romaine. In the autumn of 1766, Fletcher visited London, and frequently officiated in Whitefield's Tabernacle. He was delighted with the help of the Madeley clergyman, and he wrote to the Countess, saying: "Dear Mr. Fletcher has become a scandalous Tottenham Court preacher!" Fletcher, in describing one of Whitefield's services, says: "When I was in London I went to Mr. Whitefield's Tabernacle, and heard him give his society a sweet exhortation upon love. He began by observing that when the Apostle John was old and past walking and preaching, he would not forsake the assembling himself with his brethren, as the manner of some is but upon little or no pretence at all. On the contrary, he got himself carried to their meeting, and with his last thread of voice preached to them his final sermon."

Whitefield was frequently burlesqued by Samuel Foote at Drury Lane Theatre in such popular plays as "The Minor" and "The Hypocrite." These attacks did not disturb Whitefield's peace of mind, for he smilingly remarked: "I am afraid Satan is angry." The epilogue of "The Minor" contained a farcical representation entitled, "Dr. Squinten," which was an attempt to ridicule Whitefield's appearance and mannerisms. During its run Whitefield died, and the epilogue was discontinued. On its being clamoured for by the audience, Foote came forward and magnanimously stated that he was incapable of holding up the departed divine to ridicule.

In briefly glancing at the life-story of the first pastor of Tottenham Court Road Tabernacle it may be stated that Whitefield, who may be regarded as one of the makers of Methodism, was the son of a licensed victualler, and was born at the Bell Inn, Gloucester, on December 16th, 1714. He was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, and preached his first sermon to a crowded congregation assembled in Gloucester Cathedral. The impassioned earnestness of the young man, and his soul-stirring utterances, made a profound impression upon his hearers, many of whom had gone to the service through mere curiosity. After taking his B.A. degree, he preached in London, Bristol, Bath, and other important populous centres. When the parish pulpits were closed against him, he became an open-air evangelist, and he moved thousands to tears and a state of reflection by his irresistible impressiveness and his charming eloquence. It is computed that he preached on eighteen thousand occasions to ten millions of people during his itinerancy in England, Scotland, Wales and America. Whitefield made seven evangelistic visits to the United States, where he died somewhat unexpectedly on September 30th, 1770. Two months later, his funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. John Wesley at Tottenham Court Road Chapel.

In his appearance Whitefield was slightly above the average height, and of well-proportioned figure. He had dark blue eyes, which were disfigured by a slight squint. His voice was nature's greatest gift, which was clear and bell-like. Without distressing himself he could make himself heard by an auditory of twenty thousand people gathered on a hill-side. His discourses often bristled with wit and pleasantry. His popularity was increased by his eccentric phrases and methods of expression. His published sermons appear to be commonplace, and they do not represent the spiritual magnetism of the preacher. They lack Whitefield's penetrating voice and dramatic delivery.

In the year 1779, Matthew Wilkes succeeded Whitefield at Tottenham Court Road, and he held the pastorate until his death in 1829. Wilkes was born at Gibraltar, was born again at West Bromwich, and was educated for the ministry at Trevecca College. He is said to have augmented his salary by selling coals on commission. His pulpit methods were as turbulent as the winds and waves that beat against his birth-place. In some senses, Wilkes was an extraordinary man. He was one of the founders of the London Missionary Society, and preached a preliminary sermon at Tottenham Court Road before the holding of its initiatory business meeting. He was one of the leading promoters in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Tract Society, the Itinerant Society, and he assisted in starting The Evangelical Magazine.

Wilkes always obtained the best supplies for the Tabernacle pulpit. In May, 1824, the eccentric Edward Irving preached at Tottenham Court Road for three consecutive hours from the text, "The Kingdom of heaven is at hand." There was a break in the middle of the discourse, when the huge congregation joined in singing a hymn. The collection amounted to £207 16s. 8d.

After Wilkes came Dr. John Campbell, who distinguished himself in the literary realm as the Editor of The Christian Witness, The Christian Penny Magazine, and The British Standard. In the early fifties, Mr. J. Ewing Ritchie, better known by his pen-name of "Christopher Crayon," published a sketch of Dr. Campbell in his "Popular Preachers," which for pungency of flavour resembles James Everett's "Wesleyan Centenary Takings." He says: "You can see what manner of man Dr. Campbell is in the twinkling of an eye. It is not often he preaches now, but if you chance to be at the Tabernacle when he does you will feel the description of him is correct. The memory of that apostle in an age of sensualism and sin, George Whitefield, still sheds a fragrance round the dreary-looking chapel in which some few hundreds meet Sabbath after Sabbath. If you go, take with you a good stock of patience, for you will not find the service easy, or the sermon short. There, in the very pulpit where Whitefield, the persuasive, the silver-tongued stood—the Whitefield whom lords and ladies flocked to hear, who lit up with light and life a wicked and adulterous generation, an age destitute alike of faith and heart and hope—you will see a big cumbrous man, of severe face and repulsive manner, with a voice harsh and rough as a mountain stream. The face is almost hidden between two uncomfortable collars, which create your sympathy for the unfortunate mortal in such an unpleasant fix. Continuing your search, however, you see piercing eyes beneath bushy brows, a nose of a decided character, a most firm chin, and a head of thick grey hair, the obstinate irregularities of which would throw a fashionable hairdresser into despair. In the pulpit he has it all his own way, he harangues with the air of a judge. His voice is husky and at times inaudible; his manner bad. The oratory belongs to the deadly-lively school, and consists of mild commonplaces, pumped out with a ferocity reminding one of the stern Puritans of the olden times, but rather out of place in the Tabernacle in which the doctor reigns supreme."

THE NEW TABERNACLE NOW IN COURSE OF CONSTRUCTION.

It is interesting to note that Dr. Joseph Parker, the distinguished minister of the City Temple, began his eventful public life by serving Dr. Campbell "as a son in the Gospel." Dr. Parker was twenty-two years of age when he became co-pastor of the famous Tottenham Court Road Chapel. In a humorous vein, Dr. Parker describes his first interview with Dr. Campbell at Tabernacle House. He says: "In half a minute my hand was in Dr. Campbell's, and there was comfort in the warm grip. Look at him! Broad, erect, with abundant grey hair standing up, as if it had been suddenly startled into disorder, and with linen enough around his neck to dress half a denomination. What a collar! I had seen collars like it in engravings, but until that moment I had seen nothing like it in actual linen. Then the voice—what nervous young man from the mountains could be quite easy under such gruff tones? Its very gentleness was a kind of muffled roar; what then must it have been when sounding in full compass!"

In a Parkeresque style he continues his interesting reminiscences of that ever-memorable Easter Sabbath morning in the year 1852, when he, the unknown Tynesider, and Dr. Campbell entered the famous pulpit together for the first time. It appears that the doctor, by pre-arrangement, was to give "a running comment" upon the Eastertide lesson, and Parker was to preach. "Friends at home" had seen the few sheets of paper that contained Parker's sermon, "and with too partial love had spoken well of them. But that morning the very ink had almost faded out, and the orthodoxy appeared to have got a twist." Neither that day, nor on any other occasion, did Dr. Parker regard Dr. Campbell "as a pulpit orator in the ordinary sense of the term. His pulpit, a very volcano in the days of Whitefield, seemed to be a mountain of ice, and his words like storms of hail." However, as Dr. Parker says, "After the hail could come the dew, out of the terrible mouth could come the gentle and healing word." The sacred memories of Whitefield's pulpit, and the hallowed associations of Whitefield's Tabernacle, appear to have been a source of inspiration to Dr. Parker, and to have influenced his powerful ministry.

In the year 1828, at the expiration of Whitefield's lease, the famous Tabernacle was closed for two years. It was subsequently purchased by trustees, and greatly improved in its appearance. About the year 1860 the chapel was enlarged and re-fronted with stone. In 1868, Leonard Street Chapel was built, and the famous Whitefield pulpit was placed therein. The old Tabernacle contained monuments to the memory of Augustus Toplady and also to Whitefield, whose wife was buried beneath the floor of the chapel. The remains of John Bacon, R.A., a renowned sculptor, were buried under the north aisle.

As recently as 1889 it was discovered that Whitefield's Tabernacle was built on a foundation of timber laid lengthwise upon the bare mud. Having become unsafe it had to be taken down, and is being replaced by a new Tabernacle, the foundation stone ceremony of which was laid in October last, when the Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker and others took part. The building will seat 1,150 persons, and the basement story, beneath which the author of "Rock of Ages" is buried, and which will be known as "Toplady Hall," will accommodate 800 worshippers.

The present pastor, the Rev. G. A. Suttle, and his band of energetic co-workers, are "maintaining a brave fight against squalid heathenism and demoralising Ritualistic charities" in this crowded centre of the busy Metropolis. They have set themselves a formidable task in the erection of the new building, which will cost £12,000. Of this sum £5,000 is in hand, or promised, and £7,000 is still required. The congregation has given liberally, and now appeals to the wider Christian public. May the response be prompt and liberal.

Revivals: How to Make them Permanently Effective to our Churches.*

REVIVALS imply previous decline.

Now, however, the days of decline are past, and the breathing of God amongst the dry bones has brought a new life. The question before us is, how we shall conserve, or keep with us, those who have professed allegiance. That question presents us with an old, important, and difficult problem.

A few years ago we were in Worcestershire, the land of orchards. It was springtime, the time of bud and blossom, and well do we remember a cherry-orchard lovely in its best of bloom. There is no misuse of words when we say "it was a thing of beauty." A few days elapsed ere we again saw it, and truly, a marvellous change had come over that orchard—the bud and blossom had mysteriously disappeared. "Whatever does this mean?" we inquired of a friend "Mean? it means a peculiar kind of blight has visited this orchard and destroyed seventy-five per cent. of promised fruit," was the sombre reply. That is our problem. We have our religious awakenings, bud and blossom seemingly in abundance; and yet when the days have passed by, we find a spiritual blight has visited us, and seventy-five per cent. of our promised fruit is gone. The business of the gardener is to cope with that orchard blight. Your business and mine is to understand the cause or causes of the Church's blight, and, God helping us, to protect ourselves from its ravages.

It may be, at the very outset, we shall find ourselves at a directly opposite angle to some, when we question if that word "revival" should be in our Church vocabulary. It is both a happy and an unhappy word. It means what? "That the spiritual tide has come in," you say. Yes, it does; but does it not also mean that, in other days, the spiritual tide had gone out and out? It is a word that means history. It has a past tense as well as a present tense. It speaks of yesterday as well as of to-day, and while it speaks of the light of to-day it cannot keep silent about the darkness of yesterday. It speaks of present power, but in such a way as to disclose past inertia.

The other day we were flooded in the lower reaches of our town. It was a high tide among high tides, but relatively, it was but for the moment, and soon returned to its usual state. It is not such a tidal wave which soon backs to its old life that the Church needs. Not thus will the Church be able both to get and keep its converts.

To secure and keep its converts, the Church, we maintain, should rather be as that constantly supplied reservoir, ever full of the Divine life. Is this merely a Utopian picture of the Church? or is it possible, nay, more, is it enjoined? Or does God mean the Church to have an intermittent spiritual life acting like the intermittent spring? The secret of the intermittent spring, we are told, is that it is fed from an inner chamber in the rock in which the rains accumulate; but it is only when the water rises above a certain level that we have an outward flow. Keep the inner chamber full, and the outward flow will be constant. Thank God, the inner chambers can be kept full, and the Church that has its inner chambers full shall have a constant outflow of spiritual power. We heartily concur with Rendel Harris when he says:—

"I want to tell you that there should be no such word as 'revival' in the dictionary of the Christian Church: we want 'life,' not 'revival.' You hear people saying of certain religious movings, 'They are having quite a revival;' alas! and were they dead before? . . . Neither in earth nor in heaven has a Christian a right to go below 'par' in his spiritual life."

Take physical life. In health, is the pulse intermittent? Now a thud, then a rush, like the rush of cavalry, and later, pulsations that are scarcely perceptible. Nay! nay! healthy physical life means a regular, steady beat. Irregularity is indicative of mischief; it tells of impaired health; it gives a reminder that some part of the complex mechanism is wrong. So it is in spiritual life. Our Church life should not be that spasmodic, uncertain thing it too often is. It should rather be deep daily communion with God, and that means for all time a vigorous spiritual life and much spiritual power.

Our first position then is: The normal life of the Church should be as good if not better, than that of "revivals." Our plea is for a continuous spiritual life as essential both to get and keep our converts. That life can be ours; should be ours.

"I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him; but ye know Him, for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." In His High-priestly prayer, Jesus prays, "And the glory which Thou gavest Me, I have given them; that they may be one, even as We are One: I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one, and that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me."

Paul tells us: "It pleased God to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him among the heathen." "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless, I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me." For the Ephesians he prays: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith."

It is that communion and union with God of which Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe sings:—

"As some rare perfume in a vase of clay
Pervades it with a fragrance not its own,
So, when Thou dwellest in a mortal soul,
All Heaven's own sweetness seems around it thrown.

Abide in me; there have been moments blest
When I have heard Thy voice and felt Thy power;
Then evil lost its grasp, and passion, hushed,
Owned the Divine enchantment of the hour.

These were but seasons, beautiful and rare;
Abide in Me, and they shall ever be.
Fulfil at once Thy precept and my prayer:
Come, and abide in me, and I in Thee."

A Church with such an experience will see the glad some change from a dearth of conversions into the experience of many renewed and kept by Christ.

But some one urges:—"The Church has not reached that high level yet. We must assuredly seek to usher in a brighter day, but until that day dawns, we must use our occasional spiritual visitations, and have our revivals." Our plea, for a daily deeper life as the great essential, does not mean we are out of sympathy with true revivals; it only means we have a strong conviction that the other is the truer method. We must all recognise that there have been times of special Divine nearness, and at such times many have been born for Zion.

Certainly until the better day does dawn let us have revivals; but let us have true revivals. It may be a dissenting voice is heard here:—"The subject before us is not how to get, but how to keep." True, but there are revivals and revivals; and it is essential we know the antecedents of a revival, for the antecedents have much to do with its permanency. We make that claim, and it is by no mere play of words, or in caprice; it is vital to the subject in hand. We draw no caricature when we say we have known not one Church, but several Churches, that have lapsed into spiritual decrepitude, and they have sat in solemn conclave, and decided, "we must have a revival." So they order a spiritual stoker, in the shape of an evangelist, to poke them up to a better spiritual life. We speak what we know, when we say there are Churches that have been cursed by that kind of thing. Months before, with almost unfailing regularity, they have ordered a revival for the winter days. You cannot order a revival. You cannot poke it up; it comes down, as it came of old, by waiting. "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." We speak reverently when we say: God is not fastened down to a man or to men. He can work if He will without His Church; but has He not taught us He seeks by His own to evangelise the world? We are to be His channels for conveying Divine power. The electrician tells us that certain substances are conductors of the electric fluid. Can such be a spiritual conductor? It fails; and its second state is generally worse than the first. The Church that seeks a revival must first, by a living faith and self-surrender, know the mystery and power of spiritual life. We protest against these so-called revivals, that are arranged in the councils of men, but have never been arranged by God and a consecrated Church.

A true revival will spring out of the life of the Church. In such a revival you can hope for permanency.

For personal enlightenment, and for the purposes of this paper, we have talked with labourers grey in the service of the Church. Said one: "We have had many so-called revivals in our Church, but I have pleasant memories of two that were deep at the time, and abiding in their results, and both sprang out of the life of the Church, and were carried on by the Church." Said another: "I have before me one revival that eclipses all I ever knew; and it burst forth from the life of the Church, and was sustained by the Church;" and the old man's eye glistened as he recounted name after name of those faithful to-day, and of others now serving in the Temple above.

These are not isolated testimonies, but our own experiences can be added, and there are myriads of others who can corroborate.

A true revival, for success and permanency, does not depend on sensationalism, on fireworks and sky-rockets and other artificial means. It is a matter of regret that sometimes the Church has sunk so low that she has resorted to methods alien to her best judgment. We believe in a hearty expression of religious life, but noise and religious fervour are not synonymous terms. Power lies not in the rattle of the thunder, but in the flash of the silent lightning. We do not object altogether to somewhat unusual methods, if with these methods there is spiritual life; but sensational methods without spiritual power will mean ultimate barrenness. Then, if there be spiritual power, sensational methods will be but little used, because little needed. We join with the writer who says: "We have little faith in any so-called revival that is not the natural outcome of the Church's life."

Then, how can we keep them? We repeat, it largely depends on how you have got them. Before we discuss how to keep them, let us be sure we have them. You may have them in name, but not in fact. Under the spell of excitement they may vow loyalty; but has that message been theirs, "Thy sins are forgiven thee?" If so, then, how can we keep them?

This question we will go on to consider in our next.

Men Worth Remembering.

IV.—REV. WILLIAM SANDERSON.

BY THE REV. JESSE ASHWORTH.

MINENT piety, combined with remarkable usefulness, like the rose, retains its beauty and fragrance after death. If the Egyptians, with such great affection, and at such expense and care, embalmed the bodies of their departed friends, shall we not at least endeavour to preserve the memories of our loved departed ones? Men like William Sanderson, as they ascend to the skies, seem to let fall the portraits of their character instead of their mantles, to be copied by the aid of memory into the heart and lives of those who survive them.

"Forgive, blest shade, the tributary tear,
That mourned thy exit from a world like this;
Forgive the wish that would have kept thee here,
And stay thy passage to the realms of bliss."

We are not proposing here to present a biography of our beloved friend; this has been ably done in a small volume by the late Rev. Charles Kendall, which those who possess will no doubt greatly prize. Neither is it our intention to write a lengthened eulogy on Mr. Sanderson's powers of oratory, this having been so ably done in a recent number of our Quarterly Review, by the Rev. J. Ritson. But, pleading guilty to fondly loving Mr. Sanderson, we shall be glad if we can make a younger generation somewhat better acquainted with him, at the same time we recall pleasing recollections to those who had the honour and happiness of knowing or entertaining him.

Our earliest acquaintance with our friend began in the month of August, 1847, at the Yearly Meeting of the Itinerant Preachers' Friendly Society, which was held in old Jersey Street Chapel, Manchester. The late Rev. Thomas Ford attended as treasurer, and Mr. Sanderson as secretary. We retain a very vivid impression of the marked contrast between the two men. Mr. Ford assumed a commanding air, spoke in an authoritative tone of voice, and came down rather heavily on any defaulter; while Mr. Sanderson was mild, pleasant, and tolerant.

At the public meeting in the evening there were present such gifted preachers as the Revs. Thomas Batty, Samuel Smith, Robert Hill, Thomas King, John Oscroft, James Garner, William Rowe, and others; but the crowded meeting rose to its highest pitch of enthusiasm under the thrilling eloquence of Mr. Sanderson. By those present, the bursts of praise, and shouts of Halleluia, can never be forgotten as he rose to his climax in describing the glorious Redeemer mounted on His white horse of mercy, going forth from conquering to conquer. We also remember his able advocacy of the missionary enterprise a few years later, when he produced an equal effect on the large audience at the Annual Missionary Meeting in Spurgeon's Tabernacle.

It was, however, during our eight years' stay at Peterborough that we became more frequently and intimately acquainted with our departed friend. This was during a portion of the period when Mr. Sanderson was residing as a supernumerary at Kirton Lindsey, when he often went as special preacher into the Norwich District. In those days there was only one parliamentary train in the day, and that generally early in the morning, so that if in performing a journey you had to change lines, the parliamentary train of the other Company would be gone. Consequently as a matter of economy, Mr. Sanderson would stay a night at Peterborough, in order to take advantage of the Great Eastern parliamentary train the following morning. Those were memorable occasions—really seasons of grace. Mr. Sanderson carried sunshine and heavenly influence into every family where he was entertained. Than he no one was more welcome to our humble home, or to that of the late Mr. and Mrs. Lee, of Peterborough.

On one of these welcome visits, our worthy circuit steward, Mr. Edis, kindly offered to drive Mr. Sanderson and myself to a week-day chapel anniversary at March, in the Downham Circuit, Norfolk. March, being twelve miles from the head of the circuit, and the chapel keeper living over a mile away, there was no one to meet us when we arrived about dinner-time. After a morning ride of seventeen miles through the bracing air, it will be readily believed that all three of us were prepared for a welcome repast; but no such treat came our way. There was a boy lounging near the chapel gates, who informed us there was going to be a "frolic" there that day, this being the name for a tea meeting. After lingering about for a time the chapel-keeper, who was of the gentler sex, arrived, and we entered the place of worship. Instead of a good dinner, we divided among us a few sandwiches which my good wife had placed in my pocket for my accommodation. Mr. Sanderson then said to the chapel-keeper, "Mrs., if you will borrow me a little soap, with towel, and water in a basin, I will wash and shave here in the chapel." So he was accommodated, but had no looking-glass by means of which he could adjust his toilet. No word of murmuring however escaped his lips; he walked about till service time in the afternoon, blessing and praising God. Then he gave us a splendid sermon, and an eloquent speech at the public meeting in the evening. This may help our readers to form some idea of what it was to be an anniversary preacher in the days of the past.

Not only were we favoured with these passing visits of Mr. Sanderson through Peterborough, but we had him also to a number of special services in the circuit, such as foundation stone layings, chapel openings, and anniversaries. When he opened our Crowland Chapel, the Wesleyan superintendent minister told us, that a number of their people asked him why he did not get them such preachers on special occasions as Mr. Sanderson.

We can never forget the effect upon the audience under his great sermon, "What is man?" at the opening of our Newborough Chapel. Although it is over forty years ago, we not long since met a Peterborough Congregationalist deacon who was present on that occasion, who spoke in the most glowing terms of his recollections of that sermon. The writer has had the privilege of hearing Dr. Adam Clarke, Dr. Jabez Bunting, Dr. Beaumont, Dr. Morley Punshon, Billy Dawson, Henry Ward Beecher, Dr. Talmage, and others; but, we speak it respectfully, we would not place any of their sermons before the one we had the opportunity of hearing that day.

On another occasion, we remember attending with the Rev. William Garner, a week's missionary meetings in the Scotter Circuit. While we were waiting to cross the river for Westferry, Mr. Sanderson came in sight, when a lady present exclaimed: "Yonder he is—bless him! I have heard him at nineteen missionary meetings, and he will be as fresh to-day as ever." This was quite true; for there was always a remarkable freshness and power, both in his sermons and speeches. Yet, notwithstanding his varied gifts and extensive popularity, one of the most prominent features of his character was deep humility. We have heard the Rev. John Farr say that, when he was a young man he had often watched with admiration Mr. Sanderson walking down the middle of the street of Westferry with such a gentle, unassuming mien, as if he felt almost unworthy to walk on the side-path.

From what has already been advanced respecting our esteemed friend, a further acquaintance with him can scarcely fail to be desired. Let us, therefore, first take a rapid glance at the varied circumstances of his early days. He was born in the small and obscure village of Haswell, near Market Weighton, and consequently at that time of day he could not possess many educational advantages; early bereaved by death of a mother's tenderness, affection and care; apprenticed to an ungodly tailor and draper, who speedily added public-house keeping to his other businesses; so that in connection with the house of his master there was card-playing, cock-fighting, man-fighting, fiddling, and dancing to any amount. The only religious opportunities afforded him were occasional Methodist services held in the humble cottage of a poor widow. Here, however, he found a piously inclined youth for a companion, named Thomas Wood, who afterward became so distinguished in our far-famed Driffield Circuit. The seed of the heavenly kingdom sown in this humble cottage led these two youths to go out frequently into the fields, sit down on the grass, and talk together of their spiritual condition till they both profusely wept. One can but exclaim, "Who hath despised the day of small things?" And how desirable it is for youth to form excellent companionships!

Led forward by these early religious impressions, young Sanderson, in the year 1819, when our beloved Connexion was only nine years old, was attracted to a camp-meeting in Market Weighton gravel-pits, where he was greatly moved by the earnest prayers and powerful preaching carried on through the day. The following February he was so gloriously converted that he went home shouting through the streets, "The Lord has pardoned all my sins, I am happy! I am happy!" The reality of his change, and the boldness of his testimony, silenced the fiddlers and dancers, and caused them, while cursing the people called Ranters, to pack up their things, take their flight, and he saw no more of them on that occasion.

From the conversion of young Sanderson a glorious revival of religion immediately followed, in which about thirty were saved in the village. Surely those were days in which signs and wonders were wrought in the name of the holy child Jesus! Why not in the villages, towns, and cities of our own day should we not look, by prayer and faith, for equal and even increasing manifestations of divine grace and saving power?

It may seem truly remarkable that this youth, with all his unfavourable environment, should almost immediately become, even during the time of his apprenticeship, a laborious and useful local preacher. In this capacity he travelled many long journeys, and witnessed numerous conversions as the fruit of his humble toil.

Let us now follow the subject of our sketch on his entrance into the itinerant ministry.

Being filled with such spiritual and converting power, a few pounds were found somehow to induce his master to give up his indentures. Thus released, he entered heartily upon his life-work.

We can scarcely forbear asking: Whence did he obtain his equipment for this momentous undertaking? There were no stimulating examinations; no collegiate training for two or three years under gifted professors; no access to great libraries containing stores of every kind of knowledge. These are priceless advantages with which young Sanderson was not favoured. Yet to what an eminence he rose, and what success he achieved! What a divine unction rested upon his labours! What may we not rationally expect from those young candidates for the ministry who, compared with him, have their lines fallen in such pleasant places, and who have come heirs to so goodly an inheritance? They will gather, no doubt, both courage, persistence, inspiration, and gratitude from the careful and prayerful study of such remarkable lives.

We can do little more here than briefly mention the places in which Mr. Sanderson exercised his ministry. These were:—Driffield (twice), Pocklington, Brotherton, Lincoln, Hull (twice), Whitehaven, Alston, Keyingham, Scarborough, Bradford, Halifax (twice), Scotter (three times), London, Ramsgate, Doncaster, Epworth, and Gainsborough. Those were evidently days of frequent removals; but some of the above-named places would be branches or missions of Hull or Scotter Circuit, the former having as many at one time as thirty-five, and the latter sixteen ministers appointed to it. At Brotherton, in those early days, Mr. Sanderson remained three years, which fact must be regarded as a very high testimony to his deep piety and ministerial ability. In 1824, Mr. Sanderson preached at the Halifax Conference with great liberty, which, says his biographer, "would mean a lucid exposition of the great truths of our holy religion, and a feast of eloquence for his hearers." On this occasion he became intimately acquainted with the founders of the Connexion; and it is easy to imagine Hugh Bourne devoutly praising God for raising up such a young soul-winning minister in those early days.

It was while in the extensive Lincoln Circuit Mr. Sanderson did his little bit of courtship, which led up to a happy marriage union with Miss M. C. Shaw. Of this he, in his own characteristic way, said, "It was a blessing to him and nothing else. I got her out of a pious family," he observed, "and found personally I had little more to ask the Lord for." How delightful were this the universal experience of all matrimonial alliances.

On his first appointment to Hull, Mr. Sanderson's residence was Chapel Court, by the side-entrance of West Street Chapel. Mr. Clowes, he says, came to live with us, and before the year was over, we had to entertain John Nelson and his family. Only think of it! The large town of Hull—head of the District—and Chapel Court and three families therein! What days were those of overcrowding and self-denial! How do agreeable changes call for grateful recognition at the present day!

It will give some idea to our younger ministers and friends of the great difficulties of removing from circuit to circuit experienced in those early days if we notice that Mr. Sanderson's journey from Driffeld to Whitehaven occupied not less than two days and two nights, travelling as he did, partly by stage waggon for economy, and partly by coach. The second night Mrs. Sanderson felt as if she must be frozen to death. But, he remarks, they found much at Whitehaven speedily to efface the memory of their hardships on the painful journey.

Had Mr. Sanderson left a diary, extending over his thirty-two years of itinerant ministry, it would undoubtedly have sparkled with the record of great endurance, thrilling incidents, wonderful conversions, remarkable answers to prayer, providential openings, and triumphant death-bed scenes. The diary unfortunately he omitted to keep, but he has left the following highly satisfactory statement: "Beside filling up all deficiencies, I and my colleagues added one thousand three hundred to the Church membership. I had also the honour of numbering among my spiritual children three distinguished ministers, namely, the Rev. Charles Kendall, (who became his biographer, and who ably filled the presidential chair at the Hull Conference of 1881), John Holroyd, and William Lonsdale," both of whom were greatly esteemed.

It is noteworthy that during his itinerancy Mr. Sanderson had for his contemporaries such worthy men as the seraphic Clowes, the dispassionate and scholarly William Garner, the heroic and well-read in Puritan literature John Bywater, the pathetic and effective preacher, George Lamb, the mighty platform speaker, William Harland, the gifted pulpit orator John Flesher, with many others, whose names are in the book of life. He was also, in the earliest days of his ministry, intimately acquainted with that distinguished man of faith and prayer, John Oxtoby, who was called Praying Johnny.

In those early days of the Connexion the power of prayer, and exercise of faith, were kept very prominently before the people. It was frequently asked in ordinary conversation, What is faith? What difference is there between faith and believing? Was it the faith of the man sick of the palsy, or the faith of the four who brought him to Jesus, or was it the faith of the whole five which secured the healing? These and similar questions would often excite useful and inspiring discussions on the great subjects of faith and prayer.

It is further worthy of observation that, in those earlier times there was frequently an understanding, both among ministers and laymen, that one should carry on the conversation while the others present should continue to wait on the Lord for a blessing there and then to descend upon them. By this method conversions were often witnessed round the tea or dinner table. We are informed that on one occasion, when Mr. Clowes, who had been thus waiting on the Lord, rose to ask a blessing, the divine power came upon those present in such a manner, that instead of sitting down to tea they knelt down for prayer. They prayed till the tea was cold, the toast was cold, the fire was out, and there was only time left to hurry off to the service. Surely those were days not only of waiting for, but also days of the descending of the Holy Spirit. And even now, "the ear of the Lord is not heavy that He cannot hear, nor is His arm shortened that He cannot save."

PSALM cvii.

I.

They wandered in a desert way,
They found no place wherein to dwell;
Like witless sheep that go astray
They wandered in a desert way:
Uncomforted by night and day,
Cursed with the curse of Ishmael,—
They wandered in a desert way,
They found no place wherein to dwell.

What hunger and what thirst they felt
Until they cried, O God, to Thee!
Till those hard hearts began to melt
What hunger and what thirst they felt!

Ere, sobbing in the dust they knelt
Sick of a vagrant liberty,
What hunger and what thirst they felt
Until they cried, O God, to Thee!

The hungry heart He satisfies,
The longing soul He fills with good.
The heart that all the world denies,
The hungry heart He satisfies,
Where in the wilderness it bies,
Outcast, accursed, and faint for food,
The hungry heart He satisfies,
The longing soul He fills with good.

Timely Topics for Primitive Methodists.

V.—THE FREE CHURCH FEDERATION.

IT is a common remark that criticism is easy. In the sense of merely finding fault that is no doubt true enough. Perhaps the only person qualified to criticise with advantage in this sense is the man endowed with the charity so beautifully described in the first Epistle to the Corinthians. It is certain that such will be slow to criticise: he will suffer long and be kind. He hopeth all things, endureth all things. Nevertheless, he will long to cure the faults he sees, and when opportunity offers, will endeavour to do so. Probably in the eyes of the leaders of the Free Church Federation that remarkable organisation has no faults. It is their own child, and in such cases love is blind. I cannot lay claim to any such honourable relation to the great movement, and yet I yield to none in my admiration for, and my joy in it. All the same, I am not blind to its faults. But whether in this article I should be more concerned to point out these faults, or ask others to bear with them, I am not myself sure.

To begin with, I am painfully conscious that these faults are being complained of by others. Criticism has been heard in high places, and, not least, in one of the leading pulpits of Liverpool Nonconformity during the sittings of the National Council. It may be taken for granted that the critics have voiced a feeling that is pretty general in some quarters, and that their invective reveals a more or less serious danger. Whether any personal element enters into the question I do not know; but a writer who is removed from the area of the Council's operations may be taken to have no axe of his own to grind, and to write without any sort of personal bias.

So far as Primitive Methodism is concerned, the Free Church Federation movement has had no more enthusiastic supporters than the members of our own Church. Our people love their own communion, but they have always been singularly free from sectarian bigotry. They have ever been ready to give other Churches a fair field, and therefore it was only to be expected that they would be prepared to welcome a movement which promised to make all branches of Nonconformity more effective. Keenly alive to the disabilities under which Dissent has laboured in many parts of the country, they were eager to welcome a movement which promised to remove these disabilities. In many a rural circuit there has been a bitter sense of helplessness under the iron rule of the parson and the squire, and the prospect of a union of all the sections of Nonconformity against the common enemy was heralded as the earnest of deliverance from a galling yoke. Moreover, as a people, we are, and have ever been, most thoroughgoing in our Nonconformity. From the beginning we have stood for religious equality. Our disestablishment principles are not of yesterday; they date from our birth as a Church.

Then our hatred of anything savouring of priestcraft or sacerdotalism is well known. Our Protestantism, at any rate, is beyond question. The priesthood of all believers lies at the foundation of our whole system of Church polity, and the share of the laymen in the affairs of the Church is unusually large. We may not be as democratic as some other Churches, but Luther's great principle, that "Ordination consists simply of this, that out of a community, all of whom are priests, one is chosen for the particular work of administering God's Word" has ever found hearty acceptance. The minister is simply the first among equals, and in our repudiation of anything like priestliness or Apostolic succession, we have even eschewed the laying on of hands in our simple ordination services. Is it surprising that in this national uprising against Sacerdotalism Primitive Methodists should be found willing and eager to join? And we imagine their activity in the work of the Federation is attested by the large number of their members who are elected as delegates to the Council from all parts of the country. We wonder how many Primitive Methodists have within the last three years been elected as Chairmen or Secretaries of local Councils. The number must be large considering the relative size of our Church.

Personally, I believe in the movement with all my heart as being full of promise for the future of the Free Churches, and of blessing to the masses of the people. The spiritual side of the work is coming more and more to the front, and the united missions held in various parts of the country have already resulted in great good. For all the purposes for which the Federation was intended it is a potent instrument, and anything calculated to lessen its effectiveness is to be deplored. It is to be hoped, therefore, that our people will not slacken in their efforts to promote the success of this great movement.

At the same time it is useless shutting our eyes to the fact that there is a certain sense of grievance existing in some quarters, which, if left without redress, may seriously injure the usefulness of the Federation. The defect seems to centre somewhere at head-quarters. A certain amount of centralisation exists which is scarcely consistent with the democratic spirit of the time. It is true the Executive Committee is elected annually by the Council; but the initiative in certain important questions is limited to that executive. For example, the Executive practically appoint the President. Of course, it will be said that they merely nominate, and that the appointment rests with the Council itself. But it is not difficult to see that this makes it very awkward for any member of the Council to challenge the nomination. The unseemliness of such a course is manifest, and so far the nomination has been accepted unanimously. All the same, there has been a certain amount of dissatisfaction, and in regard to the last appointment there is considerable heartburning. I am not aware that anything is alleged against the gentleman appointed personally. He is probably highly esteemed and popular with those who most resented his appointment. Their grievance is easily stated. It has been assumed that the claims of all the Churches represented in the Federation would be recognised so far as possible in the election of the President. The Congregational Churches were honoured in the persons of the late Dr. Berry and Dr. Mackenral; those of the Methodists in the person of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes; those of the Presbyterians in Dr. Monro Gibson, and those of the Baptists in Dr. Clifford. Again the turn of the Methodists had come, and a Methodist minister was duly appointed. But there are several sections of Methodists, and it was naturally expected that as the Wesleyans had been recognised in the election of one of their ministers on a former occasion, one of the Minor Methodist bodies, as they are called, would have been honoured on the present occasion. This, however, has not been done, and the result has been that considerable dissatisfaction has been expressed in some quarters. It is felt that an unwritten law of the Federation has been violated, and wrong done to some of the most loyal supporters of the movement.

Of course, the mischief is done so far as the present is concerned, but it is well to let it be known that the error has not been unobserved. It is to be hoped that in future the claims of all the Methodist bodies will be remembered, and that when it comes to the turn of Methodism again, the chief honour of the Council will not be awarded to the Wesleyans, who have had their share for at least a decade to come. It is, of course, only fair to remember that we have not heard the defence of the Executive itself. There may have been very good reasons for their action that do not appear on the surface. But it is the opinion of many that they have not acted wisely or fairly. Nor must it be forgotten that Primitive Methodists may be themselves in some measure to blame in this matter. They have their say in the election of the Executive Committee, and should see to it that our Church is as well represented as possible. Then the Connexion will be heard when the President is nominated. We have both ministers and laymen who would do honour to this position, and so have the other Methodist Churches. If the unity of this great movement is to be maintained, the rights of all must be respected.

There is another point on which a word of warning is perhaps needed. The Federation is publishing magazines for the propagation of its principles. This is perfectly right, and there is ample room for literature of this kind. Nay, more, it is much needed, for too many Free Churchmen are lamentably ignorant of their principles, and could not give an intelligent reason for the faith that is in them. But there is just a danger that the Federation magazine may be pushed in a way to damage our Connexional literature. If a small and struggling cause is saddled with a number of Federation magazines which it must sell or pay for, the results may be disastrous to our own serials. We do not compel our people to take our magazines, or hold them responsible for the disposal of a certain number. We have difficulties enough in this regard already without any more being added. It is well that the Federation literature should be pushed with all due vigour; but the fact should not be overlooked either by the Executive or the local Councils, that many of the Churches have serials of their own, some of which—and this is eminently true of ours—are doing as yeoman service to the cause of Free Churchism as even the "Free Churchman" itself, and care should be taken not to interfere with the rights of individual churches in this regard.

JOSEPH RITSON.

“The Magic of Lonely Places.”

It is not always that the magic voices can be heard, the magic visions seen. The heart must be attuned to hear the sounds, the spirit must be pure to receive the impressions. As Olive Schreiner says in that wonderful novel of hers: “There are only rare times when a man’s soul can see Nature. So long as any passion holds its revel there, the eyes are holden that they should not see her. For Nature ever cries out ‘Thou shalt have no other Gods before me.’ Only, when there comes a pause, a blank in your life, the Divine compensation of Nature is made manifest. When that day comes that you sit down broken . . . then, oh, with a beneficent tenderness Nature enfolds you. So surely as . . . desire, ambition, and the fierce agonising flood of love for the living . . . spring again, Nature will draw down her veil: with all your longing you shall not be able to raise one corner.”

It may be that you are something of an artist, and your thoughts wander off to that long August afternoon when you sat alone by the great lake, sketching the scene before you, in the breathless heat of an exquisite summer’s day. So hot that nothing seemed stirring—even the rabbits were asleep in the long grass. A mouse crept slowly in and out among the withered leaves; a wasp came whirling round your paints, the low hum of the gnats dancing in the leafy shade but heightened the stillness. Only the coots and the moorhens and the wild ducks fought and cried, out on the lonely spaces of water, the grating “cr-r-oak” of the former jarring out upon the silence as now and again they splashed among the reeds. The sun, blazing upon the lake, glinted and scintillated with almost unbearable brilliance in the long strips of water between the stretches of floating emerald weed-beds. Afar off palpitated the soft summer haze, swathing the belt of dim trees that bordered an edge of the lake in pale ethereal gauze of opal hue. Close to the water, and below this beautiful faint distance, stood the dark, firm line of thick-growing rushes, at the foot of which glowed a deep, redly-golden streak of water-weed.

Your eyes are fixed upon this far-off line of reeds rising from the umber-coloured weeds. Your thoughts have wandered. The wind sighs round, in and out, among the upstanding reeds close by. Visions detach themselves from their surroundings.

Not long ago, when the winds were still as now, and the sun blazed scarlet behind those then leafless trees, reddening all the white still world around, you had stood alone on the frozen pool with a gleam of the dying sun in your eyes. You had shivered as you stood, gazing afar off to where the skaters were many, and the hum of the steel rang in your ears. The ice close around you was rough and poor among the frozen weeds—no one would be likely to disturb your solitude! The glorious sun shone on glistening twig and bramble at the lake-edge. You turned your face up to the wide and endless beauty of the far, blue sky. Dear God! what meant the sudden desperate throb of recollections that turned you faint and sick! It was all so like—and yet so unlike, a day in the past that was for ever engraven on your mind. The same lovely hues of sky, and wide sweep of rustling brown and yellow rushes stretching their russet tints into the dim and misty smoke-grey of the boundary trees. The busy whitened margin where figures were moving thickly to and fro like ants; the lonely expanse of blue ice beyond, where skaters were few and the surface smooth; the exhilarating air—all a counterpart of that other scene. The same—but with the pulsing fire of happiness extinguished.

The wind rises faintly and shrills over the bare, cold ice, losing itself in the sedges beyond. The stars come out and sparkle in pin-points above. The sky grows darker and deeper as you gaze up at it, and the words flash into your heart—

"deep as love, and wild with all regret,
O Death in Life, the days that are no more."

You wake from your dreamings with a start, and then off they go in a fresh groove—to the smell of the pines coming delicately to your senses, the faint soft rush of the wind through the needles from across the purple moors where the torn mist hangs in wreaths and festoons. The overpowering weariness that was making your life a burden is, in fancy, dispelled once more by the tonic mountain air which is renewing the life within you. You contrast this scene with that of the small, close London rooms—the view of the boundless moors in their gorgeous mantles of indescribable colours and varying forms, with the little plot of withered leaves and green seen through a bead-blind;—the freshness of the mountain air with the stifling breath of the great city;—the rattle of carts, and the street cries, with the murmur of the wind, the mysterious hummings and faint, far boomings of myriad moorland sounds;—the sense of freedom and the breath of life with the cramp and staleness of London life. Great is the struggle there, poor its rewards. In the moorlands, day follows day smoothly, evenly, wholesomely. You lie down when night closes in and the stars shine, with the certainty of a sleep as calm and peaceful as a child's. In London, the petty cares and hopes and endeavours of each day extend themselves into the dark and the dreams. Here, the hours pass by without effort, uncounted, with healing in their wings. There, each minute brings its own grain of dust with which to score its passage upon your life's record.

You hear again, in fancy, the infinitely delicate rustle of the seaweed beds as they are lifted by the swell, and the voices of the shepherds as they hoist and scramble the meek-eyed Highland cattle into the ferry-boat and push off for the mainland. These are the only sounds that break the blue silence of those sleeping western isles. The sky is dim with sleep, the islands float in a sea as still and blue. The sepia and grey rocks, dipping their feet into the blue, are darker than the golden-tawny bodies of the long-horned, large-eyed cows. Flecks of yellow seaweed make lights of wondrous hues upon the groundwork of grey-brown rocks. They are dark and sharp. The pale blue-greys of the distant headlands divide the ripples from the cloudlets. The glens and corries are marked by marvellously delicate shades of misty purples and indigoes. One cow stands out a deep, bright, red-brown against the green-brown seaweed-covered boulders.

All is very quiet. The words:

"And no sound was heard, save only Distance-lulled the Atlantic roar,
Over the calm mountains coming
From far Machraharnish shore,
Like an audible eternity
Brooding the hushed people o'er," are the place—"audible eternity" brooding everywhere over the hushed refulgent land. The herons stand immovable in the water. The seals dip and re-appear, looking up at you curiously with their sad and human eyes as you sit on your heathery seat gazing out over the molten gold of the sea between the islands.

Is not that a scene to sink into your heart and there remain—a possession for ever? Has it not made a better man or woman of you to have, even once, seen such things?

But there is magic, also, in other kinds of solitudes than these—where peace and quiet are aliens. There was that January evening in which you fought your way home in the teeth of the raging north wind; when the strangely pathetic and eerie cry of the peewit rose up through the twilight while you crossed the lonely moor. And as it went past in the dark it seemed to contain the grief of a human soul. Now and again the moon-rays struggled faintly down from the clouds and the mist above.

But the spirit that lives in all winds entered into you and possessed you. You could not feel sad. The shrilling of it gave you a fictitious strength. You revelled in the battling elements. You felt that you loved the wild desolation that stretched out to the dim horizon. The solitary birds winging slowly through the dark above were not so solitary as you, nor so defiantly wild at heart. Why had you not been born a savage? you cried. Why was it that even our best friends bored us at times? For poor human beings there is no one who "understands" completely.

In contrast to this you conjure up another and far different set of emotions, evoked by the solitude of the place and the hour. A country lane in the midlands, widening out in a curve where the brooklet made a triangle of silt and mud by the roadside. A miniature island—a mere shock of coarse, grey grass—rising from the midst of this, and three big stones, moss-grown and deep-sunk in the mud leading to it, old rotten palings dividing it down its length, the boundary of fields the other side. The soft, grey dusk darkening towards nightfall as you linger, seating yourself on the broken rails. One solitary thrush in a field afar-off trying over the beginnings of his spring notes, soberly, sweetly. The road, winding uphill, losing itself behind a sudden curve. You sit on by yourself, listening to the solitary bird, and to the gentle purling of the brook which surrounds your island. A cow lows softly from some distant farm, and then a dog barks. A boy with a satchel over his back passes, calling to a hidden companion somewhere near-by. Very, very far away the bleat of a very young lamb steals through the silent gloaming. Time passes, and daylight wanes. That peace which is so infinitely sad because it is the peace of accomplished destiny—peace which is very near akin to pain—is settling around your heart. The present has slipped away; all the immediate, hurrying, insistent thoughts, all the life of action, eagerness, turmoil, and discontent, and only the vague remembrances and yearnings of childhood remain. You want nothing just now but the dear young hopes, the brothers and friends of those half-forgotten years—the days of tadpoles and wildness, of dogs and ponies and lawless freedom. Where are they all? Gone like the dew in the sunshine, as fleeting and evanescent and glorious-hued as yon sparkling rain-drops on the nodding grasses. Gone are the joys and ambitions and cherished dreams, even as the colour is fled from your cheek, the lustre from your eyes. The struggles of the years have been in vain it seems to you, since nothing remains of it all but "one long disappointment." Nothing remains but the remembrance of days that once were full of happiness, faces and forms that have been loved very much, but which need you no longer. Does the devotion of years, then, count for nothing? Each of those dearly loved ones has his or her own interests now—they have forgotten.

A boy in a cart comes down the hill, cracking his whip, and the youth and joy that are in him burst into song, a song with senseless words, but with the lilt of pure delight in its shouted staves echoing over the twilit land. Happy boy! Once you were his age, you reflect, and as happy as he!

It is very lonely here, but with quite another loneliness from that of the moors where the peewits cry. That loneliness is filled with the sense of a great Spirit's nearness and protection. This—with the sadness that seems to haunt the land of man and his finite plans. The voices and the visions are but the ghosts of what once was.

VERNER FENTON.

Present-Day Prophets and their Messages.

By JAMES P. LANGHAM.

I.—JOHN PULSFORD, THE MYSTIC.

II.

HIS COMMUNION WITH, AND HIS OBEDIENCE TO, GOD.

THE strongest impression left on the mind after a perusal of Pulsford's writings is: "THIS MAN WAS SURE OF GOD." You may be unable to fully comprehend some of his statements; you may dissent from some of his conclusions; but you cannot resist the conviction that to him God was the one reality behind all phenomena. In God all his affections centred, to God all his aspirations tended, from God all his satisfactions were derived. Not that he lost interest in the outward realm through his living apprehension of the inward; but he realised in the outward the perpetual presence, immanence, and significance of the inward.

To him, as to Festus,

"Through all
A clear and tremulous sense of God prevailed,
Like to the blush of love upon the cheek,
Or the full feeling lightening through the eye,
Or the quick music in the chords of harps."

How did he come to this living apprehension of God? By what path did he travel? Were his experiences exceptional—granted to him by God for a specific purpose,—or were they typical of what, under healthful conditions, might be the normal experience of all men? Abnormal experiences awaken curious interest; but they do not inspire strong desire, nor nerve men for heroic action. The feeling that the experiences of Christ, our Great Master, lie outside the range of what is possible to men generally, has given birth to the thought that His example is not imitable; that He is so far removed from us that it is impossible to follow "in His steps." The controversy provoked by the publication of Sheldon's "In His Steps," is sufficient proof of the truth of this statement. Once let believers in Jesus Christ see that the IMITATION of Christ, in a richer and fuller sense than is found in Thomas-a-Kempis, is the privilege and duty of all Christ's disciples, they will also discover that unity of experience between the Master and the disciple is the inevitable result of whole-hearted obedience. There has also been a feeling that the lofty attainments of close followers of their Lord are not possible for men generally. Hence the full worth of the experiences of great souls has never been realised by the bulk of Christian people. Men of the Pulsford order are often thought and spoken of as visionary and impracticable. Our own conviction is that the road our Saviour travelled, and along which Pulsford followed, is open to all who are willing to obey the laws of the road. The one demand made of all who would travel in this road is, ABSOLUTE DEVOTION TO THE PURSUIT AND ATTAINMENT OF GOOD AND TRUTH AS THEY EXIST IN GOD.

That Pulsford complied with this demand is evident from his self-revelment in his books. His books, like mirrors, reflect his own life, and, at the same time, like windows, let in the light of heaven, and reveal prospects of spiritual attainment stretching away towards the infinite.

His search for God was carried on under the conviction that the realised will of God would constitute for him a perfect heaven. Thus he sought God, and God was verily found of him; for God waits in the path of everyone whose heart hungers for Him. A book has recently been written, called "Great Souls in Prayer," which collects together the holy petitions of some of the most eminent of God's saints. Man reveals himself in his prayers. How few prayers are worth writing down! If men were compelled to listen to their own prayers, as we may now, by the help of the phonograph, listen to the voices of the dead, how frequently would they hide their faces in shame, as the selfishness, the pettiness, and the ignorance of the petitions re-echoed in their ears. Only prayers which are the echo of God's voice speaking within the soul can bear repetition. God mercifully buries our poor and foolish prayers in the bosom of His love, as the earth hides the fallen leaves in her breast. Twenty years before he published "The Supremacy of Man," Pulsford wrote a very remarkable prayer. That prayer he, with some diffidence, put into the preface of this great book. This prayer is a notable example of what prayer becomes when the man who prays rises far above all selfish desire: it is a breathing back to God of the thought, love, desire, which God Himself breathed into His waiting and obedient soul. Here is what this humble child of God desired, and then wrote down.

"Father, Father, Holy Father, Thy name is too great, too wonderful, too high for me. And so high is Thy praise; I cannot reach it. Thou art Thine Own praise. I am Thy reproach. Yet is my origin hidden in Thy height. Therefore also my depth lifteth itself up to Thee. . . . Thy love moving in my darkness is my heart-ache for Thy Light. My self-loathing is my desire to be like Thy Perfect Son. My sin, which is my sickness unto death, is compassed about by Thy Life-warmth; and I shall be well again."

"Let Thy Life, as it is in Thy Son, open, and open, in me, that I may be conscious of Life in Thee. Thy Life is more than all knowledge, more than theology, more than nature, more than the Church. If I am in these rather than in Thee, they will be as scales to my eyes, and fetters to my feet. Let me freely use them, for all are Thy servants; but let me not receive the law of my growth from them. Let the law of my growth be 'Christ in me,' the unity of Thy Life welling up in my repentance, in my faith, in my reason, in my imagination, in my love, in my fear, in my praise, in my prayer, and in sensibilities and instincts which cannot be expressed, but which are like the latent pulse of Thine unutterableness in the Spirit of Thy Child."

"If it be for Thy glory, and for the good of all, that I be kept watching daily at Thy gates, and waiting at the posts of the doors of the least and outermost mansion of Thy Eternal House, then my only prayer is, Father, Thy will be my heaven. Amen."

This thought that heaven for man is God's will realised in man is a dominating thought in the mind of Pulsford, and gives colour to many striking passages. This is how he speaks of

LOVE'S PERFECT HOME.

"Imagine a world in which there is no self-will, every individual being blended together as one soul in One Will—the Will of Perfect Love. There is now forming out of the human race, precisely such a world, under our Lord Christ. The loveliness, the order, and the blessedness of it must be inexpressible. It has not entered into the heart of any man to conceive the exquisite delightfulness of a world in which there is no contrariety of will, nor of operation: but where the Will of Infinite Love prevails in every soul, and is carried out in every arrangement. Think of the One All-Beautiful Will sweeping as a Force of Love, unobstructed Love, through every member of Society, and all conspiring together to make one common joy. That is heaven indeed, where everyone is in the service of all, everyone gathers honey for all, and everyone contributes to the harmony, wealth, and happiness of all. If we do Love's Will, Love will qualify us for such society; and the hour of our awaking in Love's Perfect Home will surely come."

From passages like this we learn the character of the life he lived, and the communion with God which he enjoyed. His consciousness of God was very real and abiding. Yet there is little in his books of what is commonly called "testimony." Nevertheless his books testify most unmistakably to the reality, the fulness, and the divinity of his spiritual experiences. The artist who paints a picture of some lovely sylvan scene testifies by the production of the picture to his love and knowledge of nature. So the man who shows God to his fellows thereby testifies that he knows God. Pulsford's books reveal on almost every page the reality and constancy of his communion with God. Although he does not say, This is my experience; yet it is self-evident that he never could have written such books as "Loyalty to Christ," and "Morgenröthe," without having entered into an experimental knowledge of the higher planes of spiritual life. With clean hands and a pure heart he went up into the hill of the Lord, and stood in all humility and self-abnegation in the holy place of the divine self-manifestation. His soul continually cried out for the Father, and the Father constantly manifested Himself to, and within him. Moses, waiting in the cleft of the rock, beheld a shadowed manifestation of the Divine glory; Pulsford, withdrawn into the depths of his being, heard the Divine voice saying, "I am thy Father, the fountain of thy being, the reward and crown of thy highest and holiest endeavour." What Carlyle realised in his old age as the ineradicable need of the human heart, he rejoicingly acknowledged every day. Carlyle's testimony may here be quoted.

Carlyle, on Feb. 12th, 1869, wrote thus to Erskine:—"The other night, in my ceaseless tossings about, which were growing more and more miserable, that brief and grand prayer, 'Our Father, which art in Heaven,' etc., etc., came strangely into my mind, with an altogether new emphasis: as if written and shining for me in mild and pure splendour, on the black bosom of Night, when I, as it were, read them there, word by word—with a sudden check to my imperfect wanderings—with a sudden softness of composure, which was much unexpected. Not for perhaps thirty or forty years had I once formally repeated that prayer; nay, I never felt before how intensely the voice of Man's Soul it is: the inmost inspiration of all that is high and pious in poor Human Nature; right worthy to be recommended with, 'After this manner pray ye.'

That hour of restless tossing was to Carlyle an hour of revelation, when he saw, felt, and knew indubitably that God is indispensable to the being and bliss of man. So whenever man detaches himself from his sensuous moorings, and floats out upon the sea of being, he feels that the haven of rest and delight which he would fain discover, must be found in God. The inmost man, the soul of man's soul, came from God, and can never be satisfied until it finds its everlasting home in the many-mansioned house of the Father's perfect love. Many people seem to think that the mere taking down of the earthly tabernacle will be sufficient to introduce them into the home-life of the Heavens. But death, the child of sin, the enemy of man, and the grief of God, can never transform the self-loving and self-serving man into a happy dweller in the eternal home, where unselfish love is the controlling motive in every action. Only the full reception of the life of God can do this. If men will open themselves to the inflowing life of God now and here, they may now and here become inwardly conjoined with the great family of God which dwells, with endless variety of style, occupation, and delight, in the great house of the all-embracing love of God. Some people are conscious now, and here, that they are members of that family, that its life and love fills and encompasses them. Of this number was John Pulsford. He writes as one who knows, not as one who speculates. He does not often say, I know; but the evidence of his knowledge is abundant.

The action of Christ upon his soul was to him the fact of facts, the one fact which coloured all his thinking and dominated all his life, both conscious and unconscious. Thus, with the daring born of absolute devotion, he dedicates "Loyalty to Christ" to Christ Himself. In most men such a course would seem presumptuous; but this book is so full of the Christ-spirit, that its dedication to our Lord seems perfectly natural and proper. Here are the opening sentences of one of the most remarkable prefaces ever penned:—

"In the worship of Love, with unutterable thankfulness and humility, I inscribe and consecrate this work of my old age whose words fill me with warm, reverential silence, brooding silence; and whose Spirit kindles in me the delight of Innocence, Wisdom, and Holiness."

Further on in the same book, he testifies to the reality and intimacy of his fellowship with Christ:—

"Yet in the whole world there is no relation so real, or so close, as His relation to us. Our life plays a part between ourselves and Him. We cannot say, We will break away from Him, and have nothing more to do with Him; nor can we break away from our unbeautiful and sinful selves. The world attracts us, and He attracts us. We are wonderfully under the dominion of our fallen souls; and yet we have the secret feeling that His dominion over us will in the end be irresistible. We cannot yet live His High Life of pure heavenliness; nor can we cease to look up to it. Adoringly we turn again and again to Him, and silently bow to His beautiful reproof. And many of us know that the influence of our own flesh and the world are decreasing, but His influence over us is steadily increasing. Now, this is salvation. . . . To be drawn to Him, and open to the touch of His Spirit, is the way of salvation. 'I am the Way;' and everyone who is attached to Me is in the Way."

We referred in our first paper to the troublous times he had in Hull. His first pastorate in Hull was George Street Baptist Chapel. His ministry there was brought to a painful close. He never attempted to keep to the beaten track of pulpit utterance, but spoke to the people the message which he believed the Lord gave him. This message fell upon unprepared soil. His hearers had not the insight and sympathy necessary to appreciate his teaching, and grew first restless, and then openly hostile. The misunderstanding, at last, became so acute that the deacons requested him to draw up a declaration of his faith. This request he complied with; and the Church from which he went out, because that Declaration of Faith was not acceptable, has since discovered how truly great was the man whose message it then declined to listen to. From George Street Chapel he went to South Street Baptist Chapel to continue his ministry amongst those who were prepared to follow his leading. South Street Chapel was built about 1840 for the Rev. John Stamp, who had left the Primitive Methodist Connexion on account of his peculiarities of dress and conduct. Here, for the rest of his time in Hull, Pulsford found a sphere of usefulness, and through that useful ministry left behind him an imperishable name. Through the kindness of Mr. Hodge, Junr., of Hull, I am able to give views of the interior of George Street, and the exterior of South Street Chapels.

Reference to Pulsford's Spiritual Science, and his views on Christ's Coming Kingdom, must be left for another paper, and I will close the present one with a copy of the Declaration of Faith before referred to.

PULSFORD'S DECLARATION OF FAITH.

"I believe in the Divinity or Godhead of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I believe that as to this Divinity He is the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Only wise God. I maintain that there is no other Divine Person but one God, and that that one God was manifest in the Flesh.

"I believe that man is saved wholly of, and by, Divine mercy; and that works of righteousness are the fruits, and not the cause, of salvation.

"I believe that man's salvation consists in his being regenerated and renewed by the Holy Ghost.

"I believe that the Incarnation, Work, Sacrifice, Resurrection, and Glorification of Christ were necessary as the means of securing to us the Holy Spirit, and therefore absolutely necessary in order to our reconciliation with God. Reconciliation and Atonement mean the same thing.

"I believe that Christ is the only way to God; and the only channel through which Divine mercy is communicated to man.

"I believe that man receives the salvation of God by faith in Christ. Jesus said that, 'They that believe on Him would receive the Spirit;' the Spirit enlightens, renews, and saves the soul.

"I believe that persons regenerated and renewed by the Holy Ghost are justified persons, and therefore at peace with God and heirs of eternal life. See Titus iii. 4-7.

"J. PULSFORD."

"In His Steps."

THE BOOK—ITS AUTHOR, ITS HISTORY AND TEACHING.

REV. C. M. SHELDON.

AT a small supper-party recently, a lady, speaking across the table, interrogatively remarked to the writer: "I thought the public would not purchase religious books?" "As a rule that is so," was our reply. "How then," rejoined she, "do you account for the remarkable sale of Mr. Sheldon's book, 'In His Steps'?" The answer to this question is not easy to give, but we think it lies in the fact that this is not a book about religion—religion as a theory; but a book of applied religion—religion considered in its personal and practical relation to every-day life; religion exemplified in its truest aspects; it is a book that challenges the professor, calls a halt, and bids him think upon the vows he has so often made yet failed to fulfil, and then directs his attention to the example of Christ, and bids him follow in the Master's steps wheresoever they may lead.

From some cause or other, there seems to be a growing idea in the human mind, at any rate, among Western nations, that any amelioration in the social and moral condition of the masses is to be looked for only in the teaching of Christ. Consequently, when some one more gifted than the average among his brethren, takes his pen and boldly writes of Christ in a manner that appeals to the hearts of the multitude, his words are eagerly read. The Christ-life he depicts and sets in its new surroundings is examined to see what real, living, practical help for every-day life it affords; and if so be the soul is stirred, the heart warmed, and the reader sent away inspired with a nobler ideal and a more earnest purpose in life—shall we not say that the writer is blessed indeed?

Is the secret of the success of "In His Steps" to be found in the fact that it meets this requirement? The title is, of course, a good one; the very words strike a chord to which the Christian's heart cannot but respond. Sometimes a title is by far the best thing about a book; but here the title is merely the key to the contents—the index of the volume. To-day so many Christians are longing for a full consecration of themselves to God—do they here find stimulus and help? or is it the trumpet-call to Christians to practise in daily life what they profess, and hold themselves and their possessions at God's disposal? or is it the startling exposure of the inconsistencies in the lives of some professing Christians that has led to the enormous demand for the book? Whatever the actual reason may be, we are inclined to think there is much in the clear, short, striking, definite title to arrest the attention and tempt the curiosity. The fascinating story holds the reader and fires his ambition, or else leaves him with a feeling of unrest that can only be satisfied by the endeavour to come up to the ideal set forth.

"In His Steps" is really a series of sermons that were written in the winter of 1896, and read, chapter by chapter, to the author's congregation during evening service.

We propose to spend a few minutes with the author, then follow the history of the book, and conclude with an examination of its teaching.

THE AUTHOR AND SOME OPINIONS HE HOLDS.

As yet there seems to be little known in this country of this now celebrated author. Continuous and persistent endeavour to procure some biographical matter concerning him seemed only to accentuate the fact that he was entirely unknown to the English public. All we could glean was that he was a Congregationalist minister, with a small church at Topeka, Kansas. Still, being desirous of securing what information we could, we ventured to apply to the two leading press agencies of this country. One of them at once told us they had absolutely no information whatever to give, but on payment of a special fee of one guinea, they would endeavour to trace some biographical facts that might be of use to us. The other agency favoured us with a very different story. Their reply was to the effect that they had parted with all their information to a certain company, who had since gone through the Bankruptcy Court, and that the facts thus supplied had been lost; but they would make further search and see what could be done. They also went on to say they very much regretted it was impossible to get us an interview with the Rev. gentleman, as he had recently died. Communication was therefore impossible. They should, however, be pleased to give us an introduction to his widow, who was now residing at Twickenham, England. It need hardly be said, we declined the proffered introduction, and ventured to suggest that some mistake must have been made. This suggestion was met by an indignant denial. Is this a specimen of the authentic news served up for the daily press?

"Great Thoughts," however, has come to our assistance, and to it we are mainly indebted for the following facts. The Rev. C. M. Sheldon is still a young man, of fair complexion and moustache, and would, but for a tendency to baldness, be taken for about thirty years of age. He is retiring and modest in disposition, and gentle, though in speech he is forceful and deliberate. That he is a man of original ideas is demonstrated, not only by his writings, but by the departures from the conventional he has made in his pastoral work. For instance, he believes that a majority of the church-going people of to-day know a good deal more Christianity than they practise. Acting upon this thought he has given up the second Sunday service in his own church, and insisted upon his people getting out and doing some practical Christian work among the weak and erring of Topeka. "What is the use," he said to his congregation, "of my preaching to you twice on Sunday? You already know a great deal more Christianity than you practise. Jesus said, 'If you know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.'" He believes that Christian work is necessary to keep Christianity alive, and he deprecates the fact that many of the churches of to-day are merely meeting places, while all about them in the great cities the sinning and the suffering and the dying are neglected.

Mr. Sheldon prefers to write in the open-air. "In His Steps" was written almost altogether on the porch of his home, with the thermometer about 104 in the shade. Now he has a little study on the side of the Rocky Mountains in Colorado, and there he writes in the shadows of a great spruce tree, the birds sometimes lighting on the table, and the squirrels chattering in the trees. There, in the heart of nature, with the atmosphere redolent with the fragrance of the pine, he writes his books.

A fair idea of the spirit of the man may be gathered from the reply given to a representative of the "Toronto Globe," who commenced his interview by asking: "What would you have said had I sought an interview on Sunday?" "I would have refused to grant it," answered Mr. Sheldon; "not because of any disrespect to the press, but to protect the reporter as well as myself. Why should a reporter who labours hard all the week not have a day of rest?" Mr. Sheldon explained that he never willingly permitted a newspaper man to work on the Sabbath over any report of his sermons. He arranges for them to come to him beforehand if they want a report, and, although he does not usually write out his sermons, he does it for them, and hands it over to a typewriter to make plain copies. Then the reporters can do what they like with the manuscript.

He considers it time the intelligence of the world should be putting itself to work to solve the question of Sunday labour, not only on the press, but on the railroads, both steam and electric. Given a Christian staff of reporters and editors, Christian business managers, and Christian printers, he feels they could get together and invent some means of doing away with Sunday work. It is an ideal condition, he admits, but not impossible were they supported as they should be by Christian people. He hopes to see the time when such a paper will be produced, and he feels it could be made just as interesting, just as enterprising as the present journals, and be absolutely clean. In discussing the Theatre question, Mr. Sheldon speaks of a prominent clergyman, who with his family, used to act "The Pilgrim's Progress" most interestingly.

"Now, this is an ideal theatre perhaps, but I take it that the word 'ideal' does not mean impossible," he added. "The word 'ideal' means what ought to be, and what ought to be, can be. The world is in the habit of thinking that good things are stupid, but they are not so necessarily. It seems to me that they could be made just as interesting as bad things are. We have been afraid sometimes of making good things interesting for fear they were not orthodox."

Referring to the progress of Christianity, he says, "I like to think that after 2,000 years of Christianity there are a good many Christians in the world to-day. I was saying to some one only to-day, that if a persecution should arise, and church members and Christians were in danger of going to the stake for their religious faith, they would be surprised to find how many would be willing to go."

THE BOOK AND ITS HISTORY.

Of the history of the book in America we know but little; suffice it to say that this was the latest of a series of issues of a similar character, all of which were first read as Sunday evening sermons. The writer, feeling the need of something different from the usual sermons in order to draw his congregation from their homes, hit upon the plan of these sermon-stories, and they, having been from the first successful in their purpose, were continued, and afterwards published in book form.

The introduction of Mr. Sheldon's books into this country was marked by experiences of a somewhat chequered character, and for a time it seemed as though they would remain practically unknown here. Some two years ago a business acquaintance of the writer, while travelling in the United States, had his attention called to this latest work of Mr. Sheldon's, and knowing his books were meeting with so much approval there, sent a copy to his partner in this country, with an urgent request that he would give it a careful perusal and be prepared to discuss the question of publishing an English edition on his return. His partner evidently was not impressed with its commercial value, thinking it "too American" for the English market, and being very pronounced in his opinion, the issue was abandoned.

About the same time the book was offered to another house, one of the foremost publishers of religious literature, they also declined to issue it to the English public.

A little later, the work was brought to the notice of another firm, one of the most enterprising publishers of this class of fiction. They also gave it a careful perusal and were impressed by its powerful setting, so passed it on to their reader for his judgment. He carefully and thoughtfully pondered the question, was struck by the many gems of beauty it contained, and the great power for good it might become if it "taught on" with the English public. But he had to consider the financial as well as the literary and moral side of the question, and at length, maturing his judgment, reported that the book in his opinion would be either an immense success or a startling failure. On the whole he was inclined to the idea it was unwise to publish. So again it was passed by.

It now fell into the hands of one of the youngest publishers of the day. He, like the others, was uncertain, irresolute, believing in the book, but afraid to embark much capital in putting it on the market. In the end, unlike the others, he did not put it aside, but sent across to America and purchased a small number of copies, asked the Rev. F. B. Meyer to write a dedicatory preface, and sent the book forth to the English public in a somewhat timid and hesitating manner.

Just about this time another publishing house was somewhat favourably impressed with the book, and proceeded to print an English edition which met with a moderate reception. Six months later a third firm printed an edition which also met with a fair amount of attention; but success was still in the future.

About November, 1898, the book was brought to the notice of another publishing house, a house full of restless energy. The leading partner purchased a copy one evening on his homeward journey and began the perusal of it about eleven o'clock, so fascinated was he that he could not leave it till he had completely devoured it. The book made such an impression upon him that the next morning, as soon as he had cleared his morning's correspondence, he proceeded in the most deliberate manner possible to write out a printing order for one hundred thousand copies of an edition to sell at sixpence, paper cover, and one shilling, cloth. Here, then, we have the commencement of the boom. The book, after having been refused by two Congregationalists, an Oxford professor, very tenderly handled by another Congregationalist, and a Bible Christian, and yet again by a Baptist, it was left to a shrewd business man of the world to judge of its real merits, and make the first genuine attempt to scatter it broadcast. Now commenced the enormous demand that for a time taxed to the uttermost the energies of several publishers. So great was this demand that in a few months there were placed in the market no less than forty-three editions, published by some twenty-one different publishers at prices varying from one penny to five shillings. The total English sale up to the end of March was close upon 2,000,000 copies, to which may be added the American edition, reported to total 3,000,000 or thereabouts. Here, then, we have a power operating for good or evil on the lives of some five million readers, or, if we take the modest estimate that each copy has been read by two persons only, then 10,000,000 lives have been influenced by the most powerful book of the present century; and still it goes on its mission, arresting the attention, and proclaiming its message, and enforcing its question:—"You profess to be a follower of Christ—are you living the life?"

Nothing in the publishing world has achieved so much success, or caused so great a sensation during the past quarter of a century. In fact, it is questionable whether any other book has had such a phenomenal circulation in so short a space of time as that bearing the now well-known title, "In His Steps; What would Jesus Do?"

ITS TEACHING.

A book which has called forth criticisms so varied, and opinions wide as the poles asunder, evidently requires and demands very careful consideration on our part, if we are to elicit its true meaning and discover the ideas actually intended to be conveyed by its author. Let us first of all, then, select a few examples of the varied and divergent judgments which have been expressed on "In His Steps" by particular readers and the public press.

The book, while presenting to the average reader clear and distinct teaching and genuine stimulus, shows to others a scene of danger and abounding with pitfalls. The one sees nothing but beauty, the other scarcely anything but barrenness. One finds in it a grand incentive to a nobler life; the other, only a phantom that is unattainable.

The Rev. C. F. Aked, of Liverpool, says: "I object to it because of the black and irremediable pessimism it tends to create;" while Dr. Clifford tells us: "Few will read it without being fired with the resolve to walk 'in His steps.'" A gentleman well known in certain religious circles, and signing himself "H.D.B.," says: "We boldly affirm that this is one of the most dangerous books that has appeared in the present day;" while the Rev. W. Cuff says: "Its aim is pure and beautiful—the book works for the highest good." Rev. Silvester Home, in the Christian World, says: "It is unconsciously, and unintentionally perhaps, but none the less really unjust to the Churches;" while the Secretary of the N. E. London Settlement says: "My free-thought friends say if the book is a presentation of the practical religion of Jesus Christ, and it had been lived by His followers, our crusade would not have made many converts." "H. D. B." again says: "The Jesus of this book is not the Christ of God, but the mere phantom of man's brain;" while G. R. Sims, in the Referee, says: "Every thoughtful reader of this delightful book at once tries to apply the idea to his own life. . . . I can imagine no life more supremely beautiful than that of a true follower of Jesus." Mr. Clement Shorter sums up the book as "highly immoral;" while the Daily Chronicle says: "To lead men to act on the principles of Christ in our actual life is the object of Mr. Sheldon, and the revolution is not postponed to an indefinite future or another world; it is urged here and now." These are a few specimens of the criticism the book has evoked, many more examples of which might be given. With these we cannot now deal, neither have we time nor inclination to consider the articles appearing in a well-known religious weekly, where whole columns are occupied by the writer in successfully hiding his opinion of the merits of the book. We will now look at some of these criticisms, and, if possible, find out wherein the truth lies.

If we commence with Mr. Aked's "black and irremediable pessimism," the question naturally arises, Is asking Christians to follow Christ pessimism? If so, then every Christian must be a pessimist; but is this so? We boldly answer "No." Then where is Mr. Aked at fault? Is it not here: he says, "'What would Jesus do' is a good rule of thumb (whatever that may mean), but it is very faulty; as an unfailing standard of life it breaks down. What would Jesus do if He was in my place? He would not be in my place. He would leave it and be a preacher." If these are really Mr. Aked's beliefs, no wonder he calls the book pessimistic; for what, then, does he preach? He gives us the answer in his letter—to get people "to join the Church." That seems to be his supreme aim, and not the endeavour to bring them to Christ. Yet we venture to think it is of far more importance to get people converted and brought into living contact with Christ, than to get them to join the Church. Let us aim at the former, but not neglect the latter!

Does he forget the first thirty years of Christ's life—the life in the home and the carpenter's shop; did Christ leave these? Oh, but he says, "You have not to walk in His steps—that is too mechanical—but live in His Spirit." Yes, just so, but can we possibly be living in His Spirit without walking in His steps?

The author of "The Social Horizon" says, What people want to know is how in that spirit they are to make it possible to earn their living, to run their businesses. The answer to this question was beautifully given by "a working man" the other day in a letter he wrote to the Christian World:

"What I learn is that by living in His Spirit I shall know His mind and will better, and knowing them, be able to follow in His steps. Thus I am enabled to do what I consider Jesus would do if He were in my place." This, we submit, is the actual teaching of the book, and hence Mr. Aked misses the entire meaning and intent of the author.

It has been well said: the mission of Christianity is not to propagate orthodoxy, but to work out spiritual and moral reformation. In this book you have so many concrete examples of Christians who have set themselves the task of assisting in working out a moral reformation. We may not approve of all their methods, and might possibly work on somewhat different lines, but we must not overlook the personal element in the question. It is my conception of the Christ that is to guide me, and yours to guide you. If we cannot approve all that is done by others in their work for Christ, let us not blame the others. They are, perhaps, following out their idea of Christ, and may be, they are on truer lines than we.

Do not the majority of the adverse criticisms of the book spring from a misconception of its purpose? It is again and again urged that the teaching of the book is so high that people are heard to say: If that be Christianity, I can never be a Christian; that people of all classes are "taught not the Gospel, but to ask themselves in every conceivable condition of life, 'What would Jesus do?'"

Now is this a correct statement of the scope of its teaching? We unhesitatingly say, "No." The whole idea underlying the story, so far as we understand it, is that it is a call to Christian men and women who have found Christ and are professing to live a Christian life; to these the appeal is made, and they are forced to listen to the appeal: "You say you are Christ's; are you living the Christ Life?" It is not a book intended for the unregenerate, unconverted soul, though it will, of course, fall into their hands, and we can conceive some such persons, timid and half-hearted, who may be desirous of becoming Christians, but on whom the world has too strong a hold, being daunted in their quest of Christ. Yet for each such case, we are acquainted with scores of others who have received direct benefit and stimulus to pursue a life higher and nobler than they have ever previously attempted.

Is the author unjust to the Churches? It may be that we may find incidents and characters in this book not to be easily paralleled by what we meet with in this country. But then it must be remembered it was not written for English readers. It is an American book, written by an American author for American people; and therefore must not in every case be judged by English standards.

The leader writer in the Daily News well points out that "the book is not to be criticised; it is rather to be taken as a portent of the times, and is not to be understood without some knowledge of America, the America of the Yellow Press, the America of the Social problem;" but whether it is unjust to the English Churches or not—and we do not believe it is—if it has pointed out dangers that may be in store for us, and riveted attention on those that already exist, and aroused the Christian conscience, and sent forth the professed followers of Christ with a more earnest purpose to do as Christ would have them do, it has not been brought across the water in vain.

If the Churches are to be the witnesses of Christ to the world, showing a living example of the Christ-life, "why, then," asks Will Reason, of the Mansfield Settlement, "should we whittle down the demands of Christ in order to make it easy for men and women to enter the Church. . . Let us put aside the stupid lie that it is unspiritual to apply the teaching of the Master to the real things of life, and spiritual to revel in unapplied emotions." It is not so much for us to put ourselves in His place—the place of ecstatic meditation and communion so commonly found in the lives of the Saints, but put Him in our place, the place of daily duty, toil, and care, and by doing so learn the lessons taught there, and, strengthened by the breath of private communion, go forth to act out in daily life the principles of the cross of Christ, while always remembering that Christianity does not consist so much in believing certain dogmas and giving expression to certain feelings, as in putting into practical use in everyday life the teachings of Christ.

A great deal has been said about the Atonement's being almost entirely ignored in the story, and even where it is introduced, that the teaching is so unscriptural as to be the great leading error in the book; but among the various phases of Christian thought, and the many subtle theological distinctions, and shades of teaching on this subject, who is to decide just what is truth and error? and it is quite possible if we had the whole sermon before us, the barest outline of which is given in the book, we might find the less to criticise and the more to admire. Of this we may be assured: If the ministry of the Rev. Henry Maxwell resulted in such a remarkable manifestation of the work of the Spirit in the lives of the members of his church, and led them to such heroic work for Christ, in which he joined with such utter abandon, it is evident the hand of God was upon him, and that he was being led by His Spirit. It must also be borne in mind that the idea of the author is not to teach doctrine, but to enforce practice. You have found the Atonement, then live the life.

To our mind the book is exactly summed up in the following statement: "The teaching of 'In His Steps' is twofold. I. The Social problem of to-day can only be solved by the Christian Church. II. That the problem will be solved when each Christian asks and answers for himself, what would Jesus do if He were in my place?" It is all very well for some good folk to tell us, as they do, that the idea of bringing the blessed Master into the factory and workshop, and asking what He would do there, is lowering the idea of God, and that we are to "seek in the power of the Holy Spirit to follow more and more in the steps of our Lord and Saviour, but that it is only by sitting at His feet, by studying and meditation upon His holy word, and abiding in Him, that we shall ever know what the Lord Jesus has done, what He is doing, and what for us and for others, in His grace and glory, He yet will do." We do not at all object to the close and constant intercourse with God, but we do say, unless what we learn there is put into daily practical use by the members of the churches, we are not serving the Master to the best of our ability. Does anyone doubt that the greatest moral and spiritual force in the world to-day is the Christianity of Christ? The churches may not be living up to their highest privileges, individual Christians may not be all they should be, but that is not the fault of the Christianity they profess; it is still as powerful as of old, and to them has been committed the high privilege of displaying to the world the example of Christ. Wherever the Church has been faithful and in dead earnest, wherever it has been in close communion with Christ, and been filled with deep spiritual power, the social problems of the world have been faced and fairly solved. On the other hand, where the Churches have become lax and self-satisfied, the same problems have risen again in renewed vigour. Mr. Sheldon, realising this, and being impelled by the Holy Spirit, sends forth his challenge to the Churches and to individual Christians; and with a trumpet voice, calls upon them to consider their ways, to ask themselves the questions: whether they think Jesus will approve all they do; whether they have ever given careful consideration to the injunction to walk in the steps of the Master, and if not then to take the matter to heart, and follow the teachings of God's Spirit to the end, whatever that end may be. Mr. Sheldon has in his book shown how some Christians lived the Christ-life, and what a power they became in the various spheres they occupied. These characters may all be fictitious, we do not know, but it is asserted that Mr. Sheldon has well provided himself with real experiences, and that the characters drawn and the experiences depicted are faithful reproductions of scenes and incidents he has met with in real life. Be that as it may, we do not in any way consider them overdrawn, and if they result in the arousing of the Christian conscience they will have fulfilled their mission.

It is often confidently asserted that the idea expressed in this book, and the teaching of the sermon on the mount cannot be applied to the everyday life of the present time. Are we then to assume that the Christianity of Christ is out of date and unsuitable to nineteenth century civilisation? We do not know why it should be thought so; true it is a very lofty ideal that is brought before us; are we, therefore, to abandon it as beyond our reach, even when helped by the grace of God? If the civilisation of to-day makes it impossible to carry out the principles so clearly put by our author, so much the worse for the civilisation. No thinking person can, however, shut his eyes to the great, the almost insuperable, difficulties thrown in the way of any attempt to carry these principles into practice by the worldliness and materialism of the present day; but are not these part of the cross we have to bear, just as much as the rack and stake were to our forefathers? Still, may not the ideal become the real? Are there not men and women on the world's roll of fame who have lived the life? are there not men and women to-day who have deliberately set themselves to follow this call and who are here and now working it out in their lives? We call them eccentric, enthusiasts, etc., but whatever we call them, they have set before them a high purpose, and, faithful to their convictions they are, as they understand the injunction, walking "In His Steps," and should the conscience of the country be aroused, and the whole church of Christ resolve to be as faithful as they, who would dare to predict what the future has in store for us?

"That the coming century will bring changes of a tremendous nature none can doubt; there are abundant signs that our existing civilisation cannot continue unless on the condition of some renewal of its framework."

"If the tree is known by its fruits, then the tree of secular civilisation, bearing such fruits as our slums, our weary labouring population, our noisy vulgar crowded life, which gives us no leisure to grow wise, our armaments, our International snarling and cheating, military and materialistic Europe, must stand condemned, at least from the Christian point of view, and the condemnation is not less real because the civilisation bears as it were, in the spirit of irony, the venerable Christian name."

Once more, to quote the author of "The Social Horizon," "Of this, I think, we may be quite certain, that if 'In His Steps' represents the true principle of life it must be possible somehow to bring the world's business into harmony with it. That this is the true principle, and that this harmony is slowly coming about, seems to me as certain as that to-night is slowly wearing away towards the day."

A friend of the writer's reviewing the book the other day, summed it up thus: "Christ and a crust." Yes, that is just the true underlying truth, the man or woman who has Christ and a crust has all that is needful for this life and for the next. All beyond is luxury, but we like something in addition to the crust.

The Infinitely Small—How it is Photographed.

Illustrated by Original Photo-Micrographs.

BY ARTHUR E. GOODMAN.

how photography may assist in the understanding of the minutiae of creation.

As far back as 1844, a scientific work was published in France, in which the illustrations were designed from daguerreotypes. The taking of photographs of ordinary objects by this method was a slow process at best, but when applied to the photography of objects which had to be magnified in order to be rendered visible, and where the light available was diminished proportionately as the magnification increased, the process became exceedingly tedious, and only such as were endued with the proverbial "patience of Job" had any chance of obtaining any result at all.

By the introduction of the present photographic dry-plate, which is very much more sensitive to the action of light than its predecessors, most of the great difficulties of the photo-micrographist were overcome; and now, with moderate care and precision, practically everything, with the exception of colour, which can be seen by the eye direct through the microscope, may also be photographed. In fact, a photo-micrograph, as in the case of a celetial photograph, often reveals details of structure which are invisible when viewed through the microscope for the reason that the photographic plate is more sensitive to differences in the amount of light falling on its surface than the human eye, as well as to the fact that by lengthening the exposure the effect is increased. Looking at the flame of a candle for a space of time does not increase, but rather tends to decrease its apparent brilliancy, owing to fatigue of the eye, whereas the longer a photographic plate is exposed to such a light, the greater is the effect.

Whilst the discovery of the dry-plate is a great consideration, there are many other difficulties which beset the path of the novice. They are only, however, of such a nature as may be mastered by anyone willing to exercise patience and perseverance.

The apparatus consists essentially of a good microscope, and a specially constructed camera. To this must be added, in the majority of cases, a lamp of some description, or some other means of illumination. In Fig. 3 is shown the general method of arranging the parts of the apparatus, the most important point being the position of the light. This must be so arranged that a beam of light may pass in a horizontal direction through the object and body of the microscope on to the photographic plate—the microscope being swung round into the horizontal position.

The source of light should be brilliant, as white as possible, and small in size; in fact, the nearer it approaches a point of light the better. Sunlight is by far the best, but its use, owing to the apparent motion of the sun across the heavens, involves the employment of a special mirror (heliostat), which is capable of being revolved in a contrary direction to that of the sun, by means of clockwork in order to render the reflected beam constant in direction. For the amateur, therefore, sunlight is unsuitable. The other sources of light which are available, given in the order of precedence as to intensity, are:—electric arc lamp, electric incandescent lamp, oxy-hydrogen limelight, oxy-ether limelight, and the oil lamp light. Of these, the oil lamp is the only convenient method for illuminating the objects for those whose work, as in the case of the writer, is more or less interrupted in character. Along with the lamp should be a plano-convex lens mounted on a stand, and known as a stand condenser. This lens is similar in shape to the glass in a bull's-eye lantern. According to its distance from the light it converts the diverging rays of light, either into parallel rays or converging rays. In either case, the amount of light sent through the microscope is considerably increased.

FIG. 1. MONOCULAR MICROSCOPE.

The microscope cannot be of too good a quality, and good work cannot be done by an instrument of less value than £5; whilst one similar to that shown in Fig. 2, together with a proper set of lenses, might cost anything from £30 to £100, according to the number and quality of the lenses. The great cause of the costliness of good microscopes lies in the extreme carefulness with which every part of the workmanship has to be performed. That this care is essential will easily be understood when it is remembered that in viewing any object through the microscope, not only is the object itself magnified, but any movement or vibration imparted to it is likewise equally amplified. For this reason, not only must the microscope be perfectly rigid, but the table on which it stands, as well as the floor of the room, should be of the most solid nature. Even when these conditions are fulfilled, images which are highly magnified, and which require a prolonged exposure in order to be photographed, have to be taken at night-time when everything is quiet. The walking about of people in the same house, and especially the passing of vehicles, give rise to sufficient vibration to spoil the sharpness of such photographs.

In taking photo-micrographs the microscope takes the place of the ordinary camera lens. In the microscope there are two sets of lenses, one set being placed at the top of the tube near the eye, and known as the "eye-piece," or "ocular," and the other set at the bottom of the tube near the object under examination, and known as the objective. Either the two sets of lenses may be employed simultaneously, or the objective may be used alone; some workers preferring one method, and others achieving better results by the second method.

The camera is the simplest part of the apparatus, and as already indicated, contains no lens. The body of the camera should be capable of extension to some considerable distance, and hence the "bellows" form is the most convenient. The writer's first camera for this purpose, however, was home-made, and consisted of two square tubes of cardboard, one fitting fairly tightly within the other, and so capable of extension like the joints of a telescope. The end next the microscope had in its centre a tube to receive the eye-piece end of microscope, whilst the far end was made so as to receive the ground-glass focussing screen and dark slide containing the photographic plate.

Having arranged the apparatus, the only thing now requisite is a suitable microscopic preparation (Fig. 4). The image of this object is carefully focussed on the screen, and the photograph taken in the same manner as in an ordinary case. The exposure necessary is the one great difficulty, and this can only be learned by experience. By using a very slow developer, however, a moderate error in the length of exposure is immaterial, and even in the case of a big error, the negative is not completely spoiled.

Such, then, is a brief outline indicative of the modus operandi of taking the photographs of minute structures such as has been employed from time to time to illustrate these articles.

Like all other forms of photography the work is engrossing, but it has the advantage over all others in that it can be carried on indoors, and is independent of climatic conditions.

But photo-micrography is more than a mere amusement or a hobby. It is as important a factor in all forms of microscopic research, as we endeavoured in our last article to show that photography was to astronomers. By its means the researches of one man are made known to his compeers at the other end of the world, and to the medical profession alone this is of vast importance. The study of infectious diseases affords a case in point. The majority, if not the whole, of the serious ailments of mankind are now known to be caused by the presence in the organs of the affected person, of micro-organisms, which may be referred to here under the general term of bacteria. All of these pass through many forms of structure during their lives, so that half-a-dozen apparently different organisms, as dissimilar as a caterpillar and a butterfly, are really so many different phases in the life-history of one organism. It is evident, therefore, that to fully know the cause of a particular disease, a medical practitioner must now-a-days have a complete knowledge of these organisms in all their various conditions. But to be able to do this from his own microscopic observations would take so much of his time that the other and equally important branches of study would have little chance of being as thoroughly known as they are required to be. Here photo-micrography comes to his aid, and presents him with photographs of these injurious organisms, so that he may see them and familiarise himself with them in a tithe of the time the other process would have taken; whilst the specialist is enabled to devote the whole of his time to this particular phase of medicine with the result that the work is much more thoroughly done than the average doctor could have done for himself.

FIG. 5. TRANSVERSE SECTION OF STEM OF NETTLE.

If for no other reason than this, and this is merely one of its many applications, photo-micrography may claim to rank higher than a mere pastime.

A few specimens of photographs are here reproduced indicative of the diverse nature of the subjects which may be photographed.

FIG. 6. TRICHINA SPIRALIS IN HUMAN MUSCLE ENCYSTED.

In Fig. 5 is seen a section across the stem of the nettle in which may be clearly traced the various tissues which go to build up a stem of this nature.

The structure shown in Fig. 6 is a small portion of human muscle into which the parasitic worm, Trichina spiralis, has eaten its way from the stomach and encysted itself. This worm is introduced into the body by eating raw or under-cooked pork, ham, or bacon, in which very frequently the encysted form may be found. By thoroughly cooking the flesh of pigs these parasites, should they be present, are killed, and no danger ensues on eating them.

The nine discs in Fig. 7 are nine halves of so many diatoms. Diatoms are minute water-plants which deposit in their cell-walls pure flint. As the name would suggest, each diatom consists of two halves, which fit inside one another in exactly the same way that the bottom and top of a pill-box fit together. On the death of these plants the vegetable part decays and the deposit of flint remains like a skeleton of the plant. The skeleton in each species has its own distinctive markings, and in these "spider's-web" diatoms they assume a very striking resemblance to the object after which they are named. In order to give some idea of the real size of these diatoms, it may be pointed out that the whole of the nine form a spot only just visible to the naked eye, and that they would find ample room arranged as they are in Fig. 7, within the smallest of the white dots in the centres of the diatoms. In Fig. 8 is shown the central diatom of Fig. 7 very much more highly magnified, and in which the markings can be more easily distinguished.

The markings on this species are, compared with those on many other species, very coarse.

To show the beads on one of these skeleton plants named Amphipleura—in which there are no less than 100,000 to the inch—forms the ultima Thule of the microscopist, being the severest test that can be applied to ascertain the capabilities of a microscope, as well as the skill of the microscopist, whilst few have succeeded in photographing them;

Primitive Methodism and the Temperance Reformation in England.

V.—SUPPRESSION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

"November 19th, 1896.

"MY DEAR FRIEND :

HALF a century ago some temperance men became convinced that while moral suasion was a mighty weapon, and had accomplished great things, if the nation was to be delivered from the curse of intemperance, the aid of the law would have to be invoked to diminish the temptations to drink, and the facilities for getting drunk. Therefore they began to discuss the legislative suppression of the common sale of intoxicating liquors. Our friends on the other side of the Atlantic were first in the field on the lines of prohibition. The State of Maine has had a prohibiting law since 1851, and some other states have gone a long way in the same direction. Many of our own Colonies are far ahead of us on this question. A majority of the votes of the people of Canada has been recently recorded in favour of the prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the dominion. However, we are thankful that the question has been brought within the range of practical politics in the United Kingdom. It has taken nearly fifty years to do this. The following letter from the Rev. James Macpherson, respecting the first days of the movement, will be of interest to some who may read it. Mr. Macpherson has been a Primitive Methodist minister for fifty-seven years. He has been Connexional Editor, Theological Tutor, and President of Conference. He is eighty-five years of age, and hale both in body and mind. We ought to say that it was only by great pressure we induced him to write this letter.

"It is not worth your while to give any publicity to the incident to which you refer. However the facts are these. I travelled in Stockport in the years 1851-54, and was known to be a strong abstainer. I signed the temperance pledge in 1828, before teetotalism was agitated. Perhaps this fact accounted for my being waited upon by the gentlemen whom I now name. Mr. Nathaniel Card and Mr. James A. Nelson called one evening after tea. They were both ardent workers in the temperance cause. They informed me that they had come to Stockport thinking of what further steps could be taken for the advancement of temperance. They said they had long worked on the moral suasion principle, and thought it was time to adopt political action. If ever such action were taken it must have a beginning, and there must be some place where it should begin, and some time when they should make a start. In fact, they said, We have come to Stockport now in order, if possible, to make a beginning. They then said, Can you tell us where we might have a place in which to hold a meeting? I replied, I am planned to conduct service to-night in our chapel at Lancashire Hill, and I shall be very pleased to give place to you. They accepted my offer, and then asked me to preside at the meeting, and I consented. The meeting was opened in due form, and a resolution was passed to the effect that in addition to moral suasion it was now high time to take political action for the prohibition of the liquor traffic. The gentlemen returned to Manchester rejoicing that the movement which eventually became the United Kingdom Alliance, had begun. I cannot give the exact date of the meeting. I believe, however, it was in the autumn of 1852. During the following summer, at the request of the General Committee, I forwarded my thoughts on this important subject."

Dr. F. R. Lees, in an address delivered in Exeter Hall, London, in 1862, made this statement: "I recollect the first meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance nine years ago, when I came from America to bear my testimony to the working of prohibition there. What took place before that? A Quaker, an honest, humble servant of his Master, now gone to his rest, was impressed with the conviction that this country was groaning under a tremendous burden which was opposing all that was good. He, the late Nathaniel Card, consulted his friends respecting a meeting for a Maine Law, and was told that the scheme was a wild one. Only in one person, our brother Thomas H. Barker, did he find a sympathiser. They formed a committee and inaugurated the movement." The United Kingdom Alliance was formed June 1st, 1853, and held its first annual meeting in October of the same year. The Primitive Methodist Conference was held in 1854, in the Rosamond Street Chapel, Manchester, and a deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance attended, and Samuel Pope, now Q.C., addressed the Conference on the question of political action for the suppression of the liquor traffic. The letter from the Conference in response to the Deputation, is entered on the minutes of the United Kingdom Alliance, and reads—

"June 12th, 1854.

"GENTLEMEN,

"The Conference of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, now sitting, have determined that the following resolution be respectfully forwarded to you:—First, That the gentlemen of the Deputation from the Executive Committee of the United Kingdom Alliance, who waited on this Conference at twelve o'clock to-day, shall be respectfully informed that we cordially approve of the benevolent object of the committee, being deeply convinced that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is prolific of many and various evils to vast numbers of our country people, young and old. And second, That we desire each of our members, official and unofficial, to become acquainted with the nature and design of the work undertaken by the said Alliance, to consider prayerfully the benefits likely to accrue to society should the objects of the Alliance be realised, and to render it such support as conscience may dictate.

"THOMAS RATCLIFFE, President.

"JOHN DAY, Secretary."

The substance of this resolution was printed in the Conference Minutes for 1854. In the second Annual Report of the United Kingdom Alliance presented to the Annual Meeting, October 25th, 1854, there is the following reference to the visit of the Deputation to Conference:—"On the 12th of June last, a Deputation from your Committee waited upon the Conference of Primitive Methodists assembled in Manchester. The greatest courtesy was experienced, and the statements of the Deputation were listened to with marked attention by a large assembly of ministers and laymen." It seems that the first public meeting held in England for the advocacy of the legislative prohibition of the liquor traffic was held in a Primitive Methodist Chapel, and was presided over by a Primitive Methodist minister of high standing, and that the first public representative body that received a deputation from the United Kingdom Alliance and commended its objects was the Primitive Methodist Conference. The Conference has never halted in its support of the principle on which the Alliance is founded.

While the Conference was sitting at Norwich in 1892, Parliament was dissolved, and the Conference passed the following resolution without a discordant word, and without one opposition vote:—

"That this Conference, representing our churches now numbering nearly 200,000 members, and acting in harmony with the traditions of our Connexion, which has always been foremost in the van of Temperance reform, and believing as we do that the drink traffic is the fruitful source of crime, pauperism, immorality and religious indifference, demands of the Government of the country immediate legislation for the absolute closing of public-houses on Sunday, popular control of licences, and the placing of clubs where intoxicants are sold under police supervision."

A representative meeting of Temperance Reformers was held in Exeter Hall shortly afterwards to consider the policy to be pursued in the general election. The President of our Conference was called upon to address the meeting, and closed his speech by reading the above resolution. The audience cheered again and again. The late Mr.

J. H. Raper followed, and held up the Primitive Methodist Conference as an example worthy of being followed on this subject by other denominations.

The Manchester Conference of 1897 received a deputation from the Alliance. The Rev. Canon Hicks, M.A., one of the deputation, said: "The deputation from the Alliance had come to thank the Primitive Methodists for what they had done in the past, to salute them gratefully and joyfully as comrades in a great cause, and to ask them to continue their labours with increased zeal, so that, thoroughly understanding the bearings of the question, they might fight all along the line, and bring their labours to a triumphant issue." The Conference passed a resolution recommending sermons to be preached on some given Sunday to explain and enforce the principles of the United Kingdom Alliance. This is referred to in the last Annual Report of the Alliance as the chief event of the year.

These papers have gone beyond the limits we intended, or we would have made some reference to the part which our Church has taken for the closing of public-houses on the Lord's Day. It has always been in the front rank on this question. It has sent two monster petitions to the House of Commons, and thousands of smaller ones. The late Mr. John Bright, in presenting one of them, which was nearly one mile long, said that no people in this country could speak with greater authority on behalf of the working classes than the Primitive Methodists, for whom he was proud to act on that occasion. Mr. Stevenson, late member for South Shields, and who for many years had charge of the English Sunday Closing Bill, frequently expressed his thanks for the help he received from Primitive Methodist ministers and churches. Perhaps the present writer, or some one else, at no distant date, may show how hosts of our ministers and laymen helped to build up the temperance cause in different parts of the land, and how successive Conferences, almost from the beginning, have countenanced and helped the work. So far back as 1840, the use of unfemented wine at the Lord's Table was recommended in the Connexional Magazines, which shows that temperance sentiment had a great place in the Connexional life at that early date.

Mr. P. T. Winskill, in his book, "The Temperance Movement and its Workers," writes:—"From the beginning of the temperance reformation there have been warm friends and supporters amongst the Primitive Methodists, and as a denomination they come next to the Society of Friends in their zeal for the cause of temperance. The venerable Hugh Bourne, one of the founders of Primitive Methodism, was a practical and avowed abstainer before the formation of teetotal societies; and the Rev. Samuel Smith, of Preston, then resident P. M. minister, is said to have been the first minister of the Gospel to identify himself with, and become an advocate of the new doctrine—teetotalism. . . . When the persecuted temperance advocate needed a friend and counsellor in time of trial and difficulty, he invariably found one in the Primitive Methodist minister of the locality in which he was labouring, especially in the country districts. . . . There were no better nor more acceptable helpers than the hearty, enthusiastic, and fearless lay and ministerial workers found amongst the Primitive Methodists." We close by quoting an article by that veteran of temperance, Mr. Thomas Whittaker, J.P., which appeared in the Scarboro' Mercury of June 16, 1877:—"How much the temperance cause owes to the Primitives can perhaps be best reckoned by getting to know how much the Primitives owe to it. They have run well together from the first. Men reap what they sow, and the advantage and gain has, no doubt, been mutual. Other sections of the Church were, as a rule, not only not with the Temperance movement, but opposed to it, and this did much to beget that indifference to their religious teachings amongst large numbers which continues to this day. The Primitives stood first as an exception to this rule, the Wesleyan Association—now the Methodist Free Church—and the Society of Friends followed; and had it not been for these three societies, the lot of the early workers in the Temperance cause would have been much worse than it was. The Society of Friends found the money with which to work, and the Primitives the platform on which to stand. The former often, in quiet, devising means, and drawing plans, while the latter, with that warmth of heart and earnestness of purpose which have ever characterised their work, went to the front battling with the foe, giving no quarter to the enemy of both God and man. Verily, they have their reward; and we have the conviction that if they only hold fast the beginning of their confidence, they will be made a hundred-fold more powerful than they now are." We cannot, however, live on our past. Much has been done, but the decisive battle of sobriety has yet to be won, and now that all sections of the Church are coming into line, let us not retire or suffer ourselves to be pushed into the rear. Our historic position is in the forefront of the battle, and in the thickest of the fight. Men of God, help.

BEFORE great Cæsar's day, the most powerful of the British tribes, the Brigantes, along with the smaller tribe of the Parisii, swarmed on these hills. And, from relics found, before the advent even of these, Neo-lithic, and even the river-drift, man had here his home and last resting-place. The etymology of Brigantes—the free, the hill men—indicates their political and geographical status in relation to the other British tribes. On this very Highcliffe they had one of their great towns, if not, as some have said, actually the Metropolis. Signs of hundreds of their dwellings have been found back on the moors, running along the edge, and sometimes along the face of the hill on to Roseberry, around which they passed like a girdle. Their houses were constructed by digging a hole from six to twelve feet deep and piling the earth dug out around the edge. Some have been dug through the upper shale stratum, and must have cost a considerable amount of labour in those days. Occasionally the floor was flagged, and the sides walled around. Branches fixed on the edge of the hole and meeting in the centre formed a conical roof, which was then wattled and thatched. Ord, who was a great authority on Cleveland archæology, states that, "on one level piece of rich, alluvial soil, right off the Kildale Road, near the only accessible glen through which an invading army could reach the heights, these habitations are exceedingly numerous; indeed, the hill is completely scooped out like a honeycomb, sufficient to afford room for a whole tribe of Brigantes." Long lines of trenches and fortifications can also be intermittently traced from Roseberry, across the Hutton Moors, Highcliffe, and on to Belmont Bank, where they now terminate in the old alum quarry. It must have been a fearful business living up here in such holes in the winter. Hardy as they undoubtedly were, a long, severe winter would bring death to many in its train. The crumbling homes of the living and the dead are here inseparable. Time has dealt more gently with the latter than with the dwellings of the living, as if it regarded them as a sacred, precious trust. All these mounds, barrows, tumuli, howes—as they are variously named—are the tombs of Britons whose sons withstood longest and most successfully the fierce onset of the Roman eagle. They were vanquished and scattered at last in order that a new era might dawn. Earthenware urns of various sizes, holding the ashes of the dead, have been found in some of them. The fact of the preservation of even one during all these centuries in this exposed situation is a marvel. We muse and wonder if the larger urns held the united dust of husband and wife, or parent and child. Probably they did. The same human instincts and affections influenced these rude dwellers on the Cleveland moors as those of whom Sir Thomas Browne writes:—

“The ashes of Domitian are mingled with those of Julia; of Achilles with those of Patroclus. All urns contained not single ashes. With confused burnings they affectionately compounded their bones, passionately endeavouring to continue their living unions. And when distance and death denied such conjunctions, unsatisfied affections conceived some satisfaction to be neighbours in the grave, to be urn by urn, and touch but in their names.”

North, East, and South, and on almost every hill and Nab for miles around, numerous tokens of British towns and camps are to be found. Glazedale, Egton Grange, Danby Dale, Little Fryup, Crown End, near the ruins of Danby Castle, Smathorne, Gerrick Moors, Crofton, and Sleights Moor, have all been examined and relics found. Before the advent of the Romans, the great camps on Highcliffe, Roseberry, and Eston Nab would be strategically one and impregnable. Dimly, and in a broken manner, we get a notion of life as it then was. These remains tell us of the hunter, the warrior, the religion, the home, and there on the banks of the Tees is the unspeakable contrast spouting out millions of tons of liquid iron, and covering the Briton of the nineteenth century and all his concerns in a murky canopy of suspended soot.

Often have the old dwellers up here seen the beautiful, golden shimmer of the setting sun on the Tees as it is this evening; the same, and yet so widely different. To them it was the river of nature, perhaps valued mainly as a barrier against their foes; necessity and knowledge have restrained and educated and made it to us a highway of fellowship and world-wide commerce. Need has revealed its capability. It is the same river and land that supports its larger burden of humanity to-day. A number of stone instruments have been found in a cleft of the rock on Roseberry, along with some copper, brass, and jet. A rude inscription was observable on a brass plate, but upon exposure to the air the corroded brass crumbled to pieces. What secret, what message long expected, what hope in life or death, or affection unreturned did that little brass plate speak about? Its words, which some one thought were of sufficient importance to be engraved thus and perpetuated, are gone for ever. It has been carefully preserved all these centuries to perish just at the moment of discovery. It was probably the last articulate word of a human life; the last cry of a heart that none but God may know. Roseberry to-day has many engravings, but not in brass; some thousands of Anglo-Saxons and people of other tribes have written out with knife and chisel their names, addresses, and dates on the rocky surfaces of the old peak. If their owners still wish them to remain for future ages to gaze upon with wonder, many of them will have to see to it quickly, for the remorseless tooth of time is fast gnawing them out.

Nearly eight hundred years ago the famous and beautiful Guisbro' priory was built by the De Brus already mentioned. The east window is now the main relic. Even in its isolation and decay it is a fine piece of work, and the complete building must have been a noble structure. A capital view may be had of it from the Applegarth, but it is better still to get a permit for the Hall gardens, then you can examine it thoroughly and ascend the narrow spiral staircase of the left pillar of the window. Here you will also see stone coffins, the wine cellar, the little spring in Bow Street which has probably never been dry since the monks drank from it—on the hottest day in the year it is said to be as cold as ice and as clear as crystal; the arches of one of the priory gateways; and the grave of a giant, beside whom Goliath would be as little David was to him, at least some folk have said so. But there is some little doubt about the matter, as no one has dared to open the grave and measure his bones. One of the largest and most singular chestnut-trees in the kingdom is to be seen close to the priory window. Its branches have dipped into the earth, taken root, and sprung up around the parent in an affectionate family manner. The girth of the trunk is about twenty-seven feet, and the size of the whole is enormous. In the monks' days there was a chestnut garth, and this noble patriarch was probably planted, or grafted, by the grey old fathers of the priory. Ancient documents tell us how these cunning monks lived and feasted upon the best that air, land, and water could give them in spite of the stringent dietary rules of the house. The grandfather of the great Robert Bruce was buried here, and some slabs from his tomb can still be seen in the entrance of the parish church. I have examined them and find they are fairly well preserved; some of the members of the carvings have been chipped here and there. Crowns, eagles, cocks, scallop shells, lions rampant, winged lions, angels of peace, a rayed face and a crescent face, apparently representing the sun and moon, a vase, soldiers and ecclesiastics, all these and other symbols are carved upon the slabs. Who can tell, with certainty, what their separate significance was? I noticed the soldiers were twice the size of the monks; had this any special meaning? Some have contended that the great Bruce himself was buried here, but that, of course, is not correct. Here, nevertheless, the Bruce family first took root on British soil. Carved and moulded fragments of the priory have been found in various parts of the town, and some of them put to such ignoble uses as to justly excite the indignation of lovers of the great past. Doubtless, a considerable amount of the stone in the houses contiguous to the abbey belonged to it. It has often been said, and as firmly believed, that there is a subterranean passage from the abbey to Tocketts, and even to Skelton Castle. But suppose we take the Tocketts route and tell its inevitable weird legend. Half way along it is an immense chest of gold guarded day and night, and year after year, by a raven. How they got there is not explained. Of course, they were much talked about until at last one man, more daring, and perhaps more avaricious, than his fellows, thinking to become rich at a stroke, and ridiculing the idea of a raven preventing him getting the prize, pushed his way along the passage until he came to the box and its warder. Yes, sure enough, they were there; the great square chest full of the glittering treasure, and the dark-plumaged raven with bright flashing eye on guard. There was nothing to be done but stretch forth his hands and fill his pockets. But before he could take a golden coin the very marrow froze in his bones, and

"each particular hair stood up on end,
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine."

The raven had been suddenly transformed into the devil, who gave the poor wight such a belabouring, that neither he nor any one else has ventured to explore the mystery since.

Shall It Be?

The winds are full of whispers:
The air is charged with strife:
An awful shadow stalks abroad,
And haunts the paths of life.

The wheels of time roll backward,
By zealous bigots turn'd:
Who seek to reinstate the lies
Our martyr'd fathers spurn'd;

To veil the searchlight of that morn
Which dawned o'er high and low:
And shake the faith by Britons found
Three hundred years ago;

To stunt the spread of truth and light,
And sow foul cank'rous weeds:

And hold from man the precious food
His craving spirit needs.

And shall this heinous thing prevail?
Shall wrong o'erpower right?
As soon expect this world of ours
To stay his onward flight!

No! truth is truth, and lies are lies:
The dark has pass'd for aye;
Never again shall British hearts
Be under Roman sway.

For staunch and true we take our stand,
With God's word for our guide:
Ready to guard our cherished faith,
Or die as our fathers died.

Wordsworth's valuation of the "Excursion"

is a case in point. It is, in his own view, his magnum opus; and he somewhat magniloquently describes it as a Gothic Church, to which the "Prelude" (to my mind a much finer poem) is as the ante-chapel, while his minor pieces may "claim to be likened to the little cells, oratories, and sepulchral recesses ordinarily included in those edifices." If the poet's fame were made to rest only on the "Excursion" it would be ephemeral indeed. Byron's criticism may be too summary:

"A drowsy frowsy poem called the 'Excursion,' Writ in a manner which is my aversion," but there is not a little to give it point and justification. Dreary and didactic to a degree are large tracts of the work. As Myers well says: "Judged by ordinary standards the 'Excursion' appears an epic without action, and with two heroes, the Pastor and the Wanderer, whose characters are identical. . . . Wordsworth compares the 'Excursion' to a temple of which his smaller poems form subsidiary shrines; but the reader will more often liken the small poems to gems, and the 'Excursion' to the rock from which they were extracted." All who know will agree with him, however, when he adds: "The long poem contains, indeed, magnificent passages." It is one of those passages which I make my text to-day. It stands near the opening of the poem, and serves to lure the reader on—often, alas!

to his serious disappointment. But in itself it is superb. It is part of the description of the earlier life and spiritual development of the Pedlar.

' For the growing Youth,
What soul was his, when, from the naked top
Of some bold headland, he beheld the sun Rise up and bathe the world in light! He looked—Ocean and earth, the solid frame of earth,
And ocean's liquid mass, in gladness lay
Beneath him:— Far and wide the clouds were touched,
And in their silent faces could be read
Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
Nor any voice of joy: his spirit drank
The spectacle: sensation, soul, and form,
All melted into him; they swallowed up
His animal being; in them did he live,
And by them did he live; they were his life.
In such access of mind, in such high hour
Of visitation from the living God,
Thought was not: in enjoyment it expired.
No thanks he breathed, he proffered no request;
Rapt into still communion that transcends
The imperfect offices of prayer and praise,
His mind was a thanksgiving to the Power
That made him, it was blessedness and love."

The sublimation, the metamorphosis, the transfiguration of Prayer—there is our present topic. If duty may be delight, prayer may become a still and holy passion; an abiding mood and attitude; a soul-habit indistinguishable from the form and texture of the soul itself. Of that high estate I do not conceive that there can be, within the range of literature's possibilities, a more exquisite or perfect expression than that contained in the last six lines quoted above. Once for all Wordsworth has said it, and has left no room or need for a second attempt.

I am always reminded when these lines croon themselves over in my mind—as, indeed, they do oft—of the words of Jesus, according to John, "And in that day ye shall ask Me nothing. Verily, verily, I say unto you, If ye shall ask anything of the Father, He will give it you in My name. Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name; ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be fulfilled." At the first reading these verses look like a tissue of contradictions. Interpreted hastily and unsympathetically, they sound like a bare, empty play upon words,—a mere tripping catch upon “nothing, something—something, nothing.” What is the key to it all? There is here the true mystic’s note of paradox, of apparent intellectual inconsistency—a grand carelessness as to logical sequence. Are we to ask or not to ask? to pray or not to pray? is the question. Is prayer a duty or a superfluity?

And yet if we look steadily at these statements, and seek to see them whole, they quickly take on a coherent meaning, and arrange themselves in a logical order, which leads us straight to the ideal of Jesus, and of the poet of Grasmere. It is the idea of time which is the reconciling, illuminating idea—the thought of a spiritual evolution. Note the words “hitherto” and “in that day.” What we have here, really, is the Natural History of Prayer; or, perhaps, more properly, the stages of the evolution, the purification and progress of prayer—prayer in the lower, higher, and highest stages—in the positive, comparative, and superlative degrees. Looked at in that light, these apparent contradictions become at once luminous and logical. Prayer is represented in its infancy—“hitherto ye have asked nothing in My name;” in its adolescence—“If ye ask anything of the Father in My name, He will give it you;” in its maturity—(prayer sublimed, spiritualised, exalted)—“In that day ye shall ask Me nothing.”

In the crude and childish beginnings of prayer we ask nothing in the name of the Best; everything in our own name. The Hebrew use of the word “name” for inmost nature, for personal quality, character, and spirit, is well known. Among early races the name is the man, and hence the reluctance to pronounce it lest the man should suffer injury thereby. The punishment of “naming” a gross offender against the rules and conventions of the House of Commons is a survival of that idea. Prayer is ever the secretion, the essence, the exhalation of character. As a man is, so he prays. Some prayers are, hence, all fume and fetor; others, all grace and sweetness. Prayer, in its origin, is mostly selfish. We ask for what we like, regardless of the rights or the requirements of any one else. And, relatively, that is right. It is but natural. Fear, the instinct of self-preservation, self-interest, self-enrichment, are the great master motives in the earlier stages. Our wishes are to be the law of the universe. Self is the centre, the axis, round which the whole system of things is made to turn. Let me here say a word, not in favour of the “cursing psalms,” as they are called, but in mitigation of the unintelligent censure often pronounced on them. They appear to be full of mere selfish imprecations—such Psalms, for example, as the 35th, the 54th, the 55th, and others. So long as we were accustomed to regard them as only personal outbreathings, no words could be strong enough to condemn them; but when they are interpreted rather as the expression of the church-consciousness of Israel, in which private malice is swallowed up in the sense of membership in a great corporate life, they take on a slightly different aspect. Not that they are even then blameless, by any means. Too easily has Israel caught up the bitter spirit of its persecutors. But personal spite is one thing, communal resentment is quite another. The latter is, after all, the faint adumbration of the second and higher stage of prayer—prayer for other ends than those of the little personal self. I am afraid our modern hymn-books contain many hymns with this exclusively personal note. “When I can read my title clear,” etc., is one of that class; and so is the verse, “What peaceful hours I once enjoyed,

How sweet their memory still!
But they have left an aching void,
The world can never fill.”

Without staying to query how a “void” can possibly “ache,” we may well ask if such pre-occupation with self and its changing moods is at all the symptom of a high or healthy spiritual life. Prayer has been defined as the “desire to get good as far as we can see.” In the lower reaches we see only a short way. Self bounds the circle of our vision. We ask in our own name.

But see prayer in process of refinement. “If ye shall ask anything in My name, I will do it.” “In My name”—and yet how we have materialised even that! No fetish is meant—no charm-word, no formula of magic—or “open sesame,” as in the children’s story, where the poor fellow who forgot the key-word is found in the treasure cave and slain by the angry robbers. “In My name” means:—in sympathy with My spirit, in conformity with My great purpose of love and grace. “Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks unto God and the Father by Him.” Do all, that is, in the spirit of charity, brotherhood, peace, love, joy—which are the great ideas and forces for which the name of Christ stands. “In My name” means:—for the sake of My love, the brotherhood I have founded, the humanity I came to save; the great work of uplifting I have in hand; the growth of human goodness, the triumph of the Spirit of truth. Christ’s name stands for all that is highest and best in the world. Ask anything for the sake of that, for the furtherance and victory of that, and you cannot ask amiss. You must get your answer surely some time. There is deliverance from all petty regard. “Thy kingdom come: Thy will be done.” Such prayer must, in the end, be successful because it is in a line with the great purpose which runs through the ages. There can be no ultimate disappointment here. The whole universe is pledged to it. Christ’s name represents all that really is, and endures: Life, Truth, Love, the Supreme Good. When we learn to pray thus in Christ’s name rather than in our own, a new period dawns in our life. We pass from infancy to nascent manhood. "How is it," said Cromwell once to noble John Howe, "how is it that you ask everything for others and nothing for yourself?" It was because Howe had put away childish things, and had become a man. His prayers were not petty breathings for personal profit, because his life's ends were his country's and his God's. In the presence of the larger the less could not live.

But prayer passes to its highest pitch and measure when there is no formal asking at all. It "proffers no request," but in still communion rests in the ever-present sense of "blessedness and love." It may seem odd to say, and yet it is a paradox profoundly true, that prayer reaches its richest, noblest form when it sublimates into something else, into the happy sense of perpetual possession—potential or actual—into a glad resignation. "In that day"—the day of direct spiritual seeing, of face-to-face communion, of inmost abiding—"ye shall ask nothing"—because ye have already all things. That is the higher Christian consciousness, and the Gospel of John, especially these later chapters, is full of it. We have heard of the art which conceals art: so there is a prayer which supersedes prayer. Set asking is but the scaffolding of the spiritual temple in the soul of man. When the building within is finished—strong, and firm, and good—the outer planks and props may disappear. So Corn Law Leagues and Wordsworth Societies disappear when the ends they were framed for have been answered. Some of us think the time has fully come for reforming the House of Lords by ending, not mending, it; absorbing it in one chamber, because its function in the national development has already been fulfilled, and all the good of it taken up into the organism of our national life. In a beautiful essay, Prentice Mulford suggests the building of a Church of Silent Demand or Prayer to the Supreme Power. "When prayer," he writes, "to the highest, and to an ever ascending highest, prayer for the most enduring good—and good ever becoming greater—when such prayer becomes habitual involuntary 'second-nature,' it is then that a life may become a never-ending prayer, a joyous prayer, a poem without end of gratitude for joys and good received. . . . Our best prayer will always be qualified with the sentiment, 'Thy Will be Done.' The more the mind is led into the habit of so dwelling in the highest and purest thought, the less mechanical, in a sense, does the effort for prayer become. It merges at last into a delight and a never-ending poem whose sentiment is the reflection of all that is best, brightest, purest in creation."

No, it is not that there is no asking, but that there is more of the highest and most unselfish sort. The whole life is an asking.

"Thrice blest whose lives are faithful prayers,
Whose loves in higher love endure;
What souls possess themselves so pure?
Or is there blessedness like theirs?"

Do you know this sweet little story? There was a nervous clergyman who could only compose to advantage when absolutely alone and undisturbed; but he had thoughtlessly left his study, door unlocked, and his little three-year-old child softly opened the door and came in. He was annoyed and, a little impatiently, asked: "My child, what do you want?" "Nothing, papa," she said. "Then what did you come in here for?" "Just because I wanted to be with you," was the reply. There is a world of both philosophy and feeling in that answer. The best prayer is just an unuttered and unutterable communion. Kant, in his last hours, would not pray. He simply folded his hands, it is said, to express the attitude of his spirit.

Or, have you read Browning's "Pippa Passes"? She spent her one holiday of the year—New Year's Day—in being just herself. Singing spontaneously and simply to please herself; yet with her sweet, innocent freshness touching more lives than she knew of. The guilty lovers are shamed; the artist resolves to be true to his wife; the hesitating youth goes forth to act the part of the patriot; the bishop refuses the tempting bribe offered him. When she comes to lie down at night she breathes, "God bless me; I can pray no more to-night." No, naturally, for her day had been one of fragrant and fruitful prayer, unwittingly to herself, all through. To lives like hers the sometimes intermission of set forms and hours of devotion may well be forgiven.

Where, then, are we in relation to these several stages of the purification of prayer? Are we yet in the infancy of asking, praying zealously, but mistakenly, in our own name—which means all that is narrow and poor—or have we reached the point marked by the word "hitherto"—the parting of the ways—the passage to the higher form—"in Thy name"? I dare not ask how many of us are in the highest grade of all. The man who confidently says he is in it, mostly isn't. He who is, hardly knows that he is. Do not let us wind ourselves too high; aspiring to fly before we have learnt to walk. But let us take courage—"the holy to the holiest leads." The way of the unselfish is ever skyward. On certain main lines of railway there are long stretches of water lying between the lines so that the express engines can replenish their supply without undue waste of time at stations on the route. So our souls in the very hurry of duty may drink up the waters that renew their flagging strength.

"Work shall be prayer, if all be wrought,
As Thou would'st have it done;
And prayer, by Thee inspired and taught,
Itself with work be one."

But we shall need still the quiet hour of retired and separated thought—in the which, whether by direct asking or by an unanxious and resigned communing, we may come into touch with the Infinite, and know that healing force has passed into our jaded life.

The Methodist Minister's Wheel of Fate.

IV.—DRAWBACKS AND COMPENSATIONS.

BUT changing time means pain in another sense. We cannot always take with us all our belongings. Others, with each returning spring, will water with their tears the daisy—Death's Forget-me-not—as it smiles like Hope on the graves of their dead, but we must leave ours to the care of the sexton, for we have no family burial-place, and we cannot come from all points of the compass to weep over the graves of our loved and lost, and pluck the ragged moss away, and weeds that have no business there. Hence, when the hour of our departure comes, our last visit is not always to the homes of the living, but sometimes to the long homes of the dead, in the silent city. It may be to the grave of the little lamb who went home early to the fold of the Good Shepherd, reminding us of the fair wee face that met us at the door with all its little news, and of the sad night when we ran for the doctor, telling him to be quick, or the angels would be there before him, returning, to find from cheek and lip the hue of the ruby faded, and the eyes, (which taught us more of the blueness of heaven than any star-gazing whatever) had closed like flowers at set of sun. Some have had to leave their hearts behind them in more than one little grave. It may be, no white stone tells the name or age of those little spirits to glory gone. What need of such? the angels have their record of these little ones.

"They grew in beauty side by side
They fill'd one home with glee,
But now they're scatter'd, far and wide,
By mount, and stream, and tree."

Or, it may be the wife of our youth, the good angel of our pilgrimage, whose mortal remains we leave behind to melt into their kindred clay. True, nature weeps, but then our tears, like rain-drops in springtime, are shot through with sunbeams, for we know they are Homed with the angels far beyond the clouds of time and care, and when our travelling days are done, we shall meet them again in a land of peace and beauty, where all who were pilgrims once will be pilgrims no more.

But there are two sides to the shield. The itinerancy has its advantages as well as its disadvantages to both ministers and people. To the former it sometimes means a better manse, and a better salary. One such lucky brother, when preaching his farewell sermon, took for his text, "And now I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there." One of the officials of the church said to the other, "Figs, he knows very well he is going to get £20 a year more salary than he has had here." And why not? Oxen that tread out the corn must have more than straw allowed them. As coke to the locomotive, so is mutton to preaching. The greatest things depend upon the least. Milton's "Paradise Lost" could not have been written without bread. Keep the minister as poor as a skim-milk cheese, and the poverty of the parsonage will be reflected in the pulpit. Another advantage is our frequent change of air, which is, of all things, that which most conduces to health and long life. A good many of our ministers have been distinguished for their longevity. Some are living now, who seem to have some talisman or other that keeps grim death at bay, and are as wonderful specimens of winter-green as can be found in any church. The suns of ninety-six summers had marched over the head of one old veteran, who only the other day exchanged his silver crown of hoary hairs for the unfading crown of glory. It is eighty-five years since another one came into this world of sin, sorrow, and post-due bills; true his reasoning faculties are rusty, his joints creak, and he carries a weather-glass in his bones, but a merry heart still nestles in his tottering frame, like a swallow that builds in the tumble-down chimney. Another young old man eloquent, whose white locks are but the thatch of an intellectual tenement in good repair, is still preaching all the country over, although he set out upon his journey from the cradle to the grave seventy-six years ago. Evidently he intends the wheel to go round to the last. Like Hoary Father Christmas, he never seems to get any older, and looks as if going to sit up till the morning of the resurrection. There is a slow-growing beauty that only comes to perfection in old age, and we like to see the sun hang golden in the West when his hours of hot shining are over.

Again, ministers are not only like fish, in that none are so welcome as the new-come, but, like potatoes, which sooner or later are apt to get into hot water. And when leading officials sit under their pastor on the Sunday, and sit on him the rest of the week, it is a very agreeable change to move off to a station where there is neither cold water nor hot between minister and people.

Even the "farewell meeting" like an April day, has its sunshine as well as its showers. As presents endear absents, often tokens of friendship are given to the parting minister. It may be a set of books, which bring sunshine to the heart and drive moonshine out of the brain. Perhaps it is simply a travelling bag, which is all his poor flock can give. But a flower shows the heart as much as a diamond. The high heaven may be seen through a little cellar window, and so may a large heart in a little gift. Or it may be a bicycle, for every minister now is an Ezekiel, and has his vision of the wheel. Sometimes it is a purse well lined with yellow boys, or their shirts, in shape of bank notes. The golden age of the Church is when it thinks least of gold, and so presents some of it to the minister, who will think so much about it that neither time nor space will ever dim the memory of such kindness.

As for the young minister who has not yet lost his heart, like a cabbage run to seed, he actually receives so many slippers, that if he had as many feet as a caterpillar he could not wear them all, and so many handkerchiefs hemmed and given him, that, like the Psalmist, he is hemmed in on every side, that he will have no need, like the Gibeonites, to wear "old shoes and clouted," or, have handkerchiefs resembling what Holy Writ says our righteousness is, and all of which are presents from the pretty young spinsters of the church, who are all spinsters now, not that each maiden stays at home with her spinning-wheel as in the brave days of old, but rather that they all go spinning abroad on two wheels.

Once upon a time, as the story books say, we used to receive such gifts, but that was in the green goslinghood of our ministry, and when we belonged to the "Odd Fellows' Society," but Cupid with his bow and arrow suddenly stopped supplies. Let us explain by a reminiscence. In taking a mental journey through the mellow romances of the past, we remember well, one lovely, dewy night, when every leaf lay sleeping, and only the nightingale kept watch, how we popped the question by starlight, and got an answer in a twinkling, which was what the cabbage said to the cook, "My heart is thine," and from that hour our gifts and our popularity with the fair ones became like the moon in the wane, when there is no longer a man in it.

And why should not our pious maidens sew that they may reap, and spin webs to catch a minister? for the hope of a cosy nest of her own, a fond husband, and the touch of a baby hand, stirs early in every maiden's heart.

Nor is it always with dry eyes we leave our friends behind us. Byron says: "In leaving even the most unpleasant people and places, one keeps looking at the steeple." How much more so when the place and people are pleasant. Nor do we forget them when in fresh fields and pastures new. The heart retains its old memories like some worn sea-shell filled with the music of the deep. And sometimes we have seen the diamonds of the eye glittering on the cheeks of those who have said, "Good-bye."

A young probationer, whose trumpeter was dead, said to the steward of his new station, "I assure you, sir, I never left a lodging but my landlady shed tears." The answer was, "I hope it was not, sir, that you went away without paying." Of course there are tears and tears, some of them are genuine drops of grief, others are not worth a farthing a gallon. Occasionally we have bid adieu to those whose dewy eyes reminded us of an epitaph a French husband inscribed upon his wife's tombstone—"Tears cannot recall her, therefore we weep."

Connexional Biography.

REV. WILLIAM LEA HARRIS.

WILLIAM LEA HARRIS was born at Swansea, May 7th, 1844. Being the child of pious parents, he was surrounded from his infancy with godly influences and Christly example, and was early taught to fear the Lord as well as to respect and reverence His people.

His education was conducted with great care, whilst every precaution was taken by his parents in the selection both of school and teachers. Finally, he was sent to Dr. Aldom's Academy, Selway House, near London, a place that his father and mother thought would be conducive to his well-being. There he distinguished himself by becoming a member of the Royal College of Preceptors, which title he sometimes used, but in the later years of his life discontinued.

His conversion took place when he was young, and he became a member of our Church.

Some years after his conversion he was put on the plan as a local preacher, and finally called into the ministry. He travelled in the following circuits:—St. Ives, Torquay, Pontypridd Branch, Redruth, Hereford, Barrow-in-Furness, Birkenhead, Bottesford, Pickering, Hay, and Portland.

In most of these circuits he laboured as hard as his strength would permit, and was successful in leaving them better than he found them.

As a preacher he was evangelical, earnest, and intelligent. His sermons were well prepared and well delivered.

In 1869 he entered the marriage state with Miss Sarah Emily Candy, of Charlton, Somerset, who became a great help to him in his work, and who now mourns his loss. Two sons and three daughters were born of this marriage, all of whom are living.

For some years Mr. Harris's health was feeble, and his sufferings great. In 1889 he was given a year's rest, and it was hoped by his family that he would be completely restored, but it was not so, and hence, at the Conference of 1890, he was finally placed on the superannuated list, and came to reside in Hereford.

During the first part of his retirement from active work he preached occasionally, and rendered good service to the Church in various ways. But his health continuing to fail, he was compelled to keep to his room, and had even to be fed. In this state he continued for nearly two years, during which time he suffered severely, and was a great anxiety to his family, who rendered him all the help that love and money could provide. His sufferings were patiently borne, and he felt that he was gradually losing his hold upon life and all things therein.

I frequently visited him, and always found him calm and peaceful in mind. There was no rapture but solid peace and confidence in a Living Christ.

On Sunday, October 2, he was suddenly taken worse, and for a while it was thought that the end had come, but he rallied somewhat, and his family hoped that the danger was passed, but on the following day he ceased to live, and went to be with Jesus, which is far better.

On Friday, October 7, his remains were laid to rest in Hereford Cemetery. The funeral was largely attended by members, officials, and ministers. The Revs. E. Ball, W. H. Nicholas, and J. W. Normandale were the officiating ministers.

On Sunday evening, Oct. 16, the writer improved his death to a large and respectable audience in St. Owen's Street Chapel, from Romans viii. 18; while the choir rendered Pope's Ode at the close.

Many letters of sympathy have been received by his wife since his death, and we give a few selections.

The Rev. T. M. Lakin writes: "We were much surprised and grieved on opening your letter this morning to learn that dear Mr. Harris was dead. I do assure you that we all feel for you most sincerely. Though we have, in a sense, been expecting this event to come almost at any moment, yet I am sure the blow is a very heavy one for you and all yours. May God graciously sustain and comfort you all in this great trial."

Rev. B. Walton says: "It is more than twenty-four years since we had the pleasure of labouring together in the Master's service. I still remember with gratitude his great kindness to me. But for the Rev. C. T. Harris and your dear husband I might never have been in the ministry."

The Rev. J. H. Best says: "I have been closely associated with him in the years gone by, and feel that another link with the past is broken."

Rev. J. W. Coad writes: "Many years ago I made the acquaintance of your husband, and to know him was to love him, he was so frank and good-natured."

The Rev. A. Johnson writes: "I first knew your now sainted husband when you were stationed at Pickering. His kindness and courtesy to me very favourably impressed me, and convinced me that there was a noble future before him, and that he would worthily tread in the steps of his father. But man sees not as God sees. It was appointed unto him to suffer for his Lord and Master, and to serve Him in the furnace of affliction."

Rev. D. S. Lees says: "I trust that the great Father, who has helped you to bear the other troubles, will comfort you now. Your poor husband suffered much, and the burden he was called to bear was a heavy one, yet he showed Christian fortitude beyond the strength many of us possess, and after weary waiting has been called home."

The venerable William Harvey writes: "Words cannot express the deep sympathy we feel for you in your irreparable loss. We fervently pray for you, and wish for you strong consolation in Christ Jesus."

E. BALL.

MR. JOSEPH DOBINSON.

JOSEPH, the son of William and Mary Dobinson, was born at Earsdon Square, in the County of Northumberland, in August, 1825. His early home training was of a religious character. By precept and example his parents endeavoured to train up their family for God. Oh! what an inestimable blessing is a Christian home!—a home where God is acknowledged, worshipped, and honoured. Such a home was his.

From a very early period he was the subject of good desires, was steady, thoughtful, and sedate. When in his teens, he was converted to God in a cottage meeting at Earsdon Square, and joined the Society at Earsdon. About that time a blessed tide of spiritual benediction swept over the district. Many found themselves in the current, and declared themselves for God. The fruits of that spiritual upheaval were apparent; the societies were quickened in their spiritual life, and the young converts were attentive to their Christian duties; not only in connection with the regular services of the sanctuary, but at their daily employment they witnessed for God, and sought to bring others to Jesus.

As we had no Sabbath School at Earsdon, our late brother, with other members, joined the Church School, became teachers, and in the course of time Brother Dobinson was appointed superintendent. During the enlargement and cleaning of the school-room the school was held in the parish church, where he had to perform the duties of the office at the request of the vicar of the parish. He continued in association with Miss Taylor and others in that school, and only resigned his position when it was thought the time had arrived that a P. M. Sunday School should be commenced in the village. When the school had been formed he was appointed superintendent, which office he held for some time.

In 1847 he was married to Elizabeth Clough, who was also a member of the choir and society, and held in great esteem by all who knew her.

After his conversion he gave attention to reading and mental improvement. He was not long a member before he was made a leader. In addition to attending to his work as a miner, he had a night school where he did his best to help the young men who were not so highly favoured with educational facilities as we now are, and was fairly successful in that capacity.

During the Rev. Thos. Southron's term in this circuit, our late brother was recommended to the Quarterly Meeting held at North Shields, June 18, 1859, for the preachers' plan, and after the usual course of probation, he was moved for full plan, June 3, 1860, and took a fair share of work in the circuit.

On June 28, 1872, he sustained a severe loss in the death of his dear wife after twenty-five years' happy union.

When co-operation was in its infancy, he left the pit and became manager of the West Holywell Co-operative Society, which necessitated his removal to W. Holywell. He identified himself with our interests there, and eventually was appointed leader of a society class. In 1877 he was married to Mrs. Margaret Heslope, of Howdon, a person of amiable Christian character, and greatly beloved by our Howdon Society.

Shortly after his second marriage he removed to Boldon Colliery to take the management of the Co-operative Store. Being credentialled, he became a member of our society there, and was duly placed on the preachers' plan, and assigned work in the circuit.

After a brief stay at Boldon he left and came to Shiremoor and commenced business on his own account. He then became associated with Shiremoor Society, and took his figure and place on circuit plan according to rule.

In 1881 another cloud came over his dwelling and the partner of his bosom sweetly fell asleep in Jesus on Oct. 18, leaving him again in loneliness and sorrow. Subsequently he transferred his membership to Earsdon Society, and continued the same up to the time of his decease.

During the latter years of his life, he suffered much from bronchial affection, and was thus in some measure incapacitated for preaching. As long as he was able he found his way to the sanctuary, and when detained at home, had the consciousness of the Divine Presence and smile.

In consequence of some internal complaint it was deemed advisable to call in the assistance of a specialist; at that time his sufferings were intense, and the only hope of relief was in undergoing an operation, which was duly performed, and left him in a very feeble condition. It was hoped that he would rally, but dangerous symptoms appeared and it became evident that he could not long survive. Gradually he grew weaker, and the end of the journey seemed to be reached by a sudden turn in the road; but he was found ready, consequently the summons brought him no dismay. He was not afraid to die.

"In conscious virtue brave,
He only wished for worlds beyond the grave."

He was sweetly resting in Jesus, and on Dec. 14, 1896, God called him to join the white-robed multitude and take part in the chorus of the skies.

Our dear departed brother was well-known to most of us. He was an earnest Christian and sought in all the relationships of life to glorify God. The "House of God" had its attractions for him, and especially the Earsdon sanctuary. He took a deep interest in the erection of the chapel, and contributed financially to its support, as well as the various agencies in operation therein.

The Sabbath to him was a welcome and blessed day with its privileges and blessings. The Word of God was precious, being his lamp and light to cheer and guide him through all the perplexing scenes of earth. He prized it much and read it often that he might embody its teachings in daily life. The means of grace, public and private, were helpful to him in the discharge of the duties he was called to perform. The "Communion of Saints" was refreshing and inspiring, as he was wont to say in the language of Scripture, "As iron sharpeneth iron, so doth the countenance of a man his friend." He was much benefited by the fellowship and experience of others.

In his early life he took special delight in the welfare of the young, and as a Sunday School teacher sought to be equipped for his work, and in the best possible way by love, sympathy, preparation and prayer endeavoured to influence them to taste the sweets of religion and consecrate themselves fully to the service of the Saviour.

As a leader he endeavoured faithfully to discharge the duties of the office. The responsibility of feeding the flock of God was realised. Maintaining a steady, close walk with God, he had a clear, definite, steady, and even experience to relate, and gave wise, comforting, encouraging words of help to the members of his class.

As a local preacher he was at first reluctant to take public work. A sense of unfitness, the high character of the work, and the responsibility of the position, deterred him from an earlier compliance with the wishes of his brethren to become a local preacher. His discourses were well-prepared, being thoughtful, orderly, scriptural and practical; in them he strove to instruct, impress, and lead men to Christ. He was greatly respected throughout the circuit by his brethren for the sterling worth of his character, and his interest in the welfare of our beloved Zion. The honour of representing the Circuit at District Meeting was conferred upon him by Quarterly Meeting, and the duties of the post were faithfully and efficiently executed. As to his general deportment he sought to walk uprightly before God and his fellow-men, "to love mercy, deal justly, and walk humbly with God." He carried his religion with him into the world, and the duties of life were thus sanctified by it. He was generous, had a tender heart, could feel for those in distress, and render practical assistance. He strove to live a consistent Christian life, hence he was held in high esteem and respected by all who knew him. He was punctual, cautious, painstaking, and methodical in all he had to do in connection with the Church and the world. In his home relationships he was dearly beloved. He loved his family, was dutiful, thoughtful, and affectionate. He was not only anxious for their temporal welfare, but by a loving, consistent walk, and conversation, sought to secure their highest good by leading them to God.

Thus our dear departed friend tried in home, Church, business, and other relationships to please God. Like others, he was not faultless, he had his imperfections and failings, but he sought help and grace to glorify God and find his way to heaven.

J. H. JOPLIN.

MRS. HUFF.

THE late Mrs. Huff was born 1811, at Knighton, where she resided until her marriage with the Rev. James Huff. The date of her conversion is not known, but it must have been away in the days of her youth, for the Rev. Wm. Evans writes: "She was the friend of my youth. Years before there was a chapel at Knighton, and before I became a Christian, I remember her as an earnest and godly woman. She was very kind to me when a boy, and seemed to take a great interest in my spiritual welfare, and on the day of my father's funeral she obtained from me the promise that I would endeavour to live for Christ."

This was the spirit shown by our deceased sister all her life, not only endeavouring to live for Christ herself, but ever seeking to obtain other disciples, urging those who were wavering, to leave sin and give themselves to God.

As a woman, her character may be summed up in the words of Dr. Ferguson, written to Mr. Huff: "Your late wife was a good woman, quiet, unobtrusive, but transparently sincere. Her conscience knew no compromise, and her religion no damning doubt."

As a follower of Jesus, she was earnest and faithful. Always alive to the interests of God's cause, she took a part in every good work, though usually it was a quiet part. Leaving the more public duties to others, she loved to do her work unseen, and usually unknown. Every success in connection with any enterprise that was for the Kingdom of Righteousness, imparted great joy to her. She ever prayed for the prosperity of Zion.

The Church of her choice was the Primitive Methodist. When she was only a girl she was interested in the work of this department of God's Church, as its ministers found a home with her parents at an early date, and she was constantly coming into contact with them. For upwards of sixty years she remained a firm and true member, rejoicing in its prosperity, and aiding every enterprise which was for its advancement. It was a delight to her to attend the services, and she ever remained the humble worshipper, uncritical, sincere, friendly.

After her marriage she travelled with Mr. Huff in Congleton, Darlaston, Wrockwardine Wood, Dudley, Lichfield, Bilston, Tipton, and Old Hill, where she gathered around her a circle of friends who were delighted with her companionship, and remained true when she had to leave them for some new sphere of labour. The letters of sympathy prove how highly her friendship was regarded, and how fondly remembered. She fulfilled the duties of a minister's wife with wisdom and cheerfulness, contributing to her husband's success by sharing his difficulties, and inspiring him with great resolves. Her name will long be remembered with respect.

To her husband and family she combined the grace of the wife with the love of the mother, and made the concerns of the home her chief happiness. She was cheerful and kind, and won that love and respect which is a woman's chief joy, and a mother's greatest glory, the love and respect of the children and grandchildren. She was a wise counsellor, a true and trusted friend, an example of Christian patience and virtue, a real helpmeet to her now bereaved husband.

It is about ten years since she came with her husband and family to reside in Bishop's Castle. During these years she has shown her loyalty to her Church and her Saviour by her devout life. Much of this time she passed as an invalid, but her faith never declined, neither did her religion become gloomy. She showed a great amount of Christian fortitude and was able to give consolation to others, when, in truth, she often needed it herself.

She always welcomed the friends of the circuit, and took an active and practical interest in all that was passing, and many people, within and without our own Church, have experienced her kindness in sympathy and generosity.

Her last wishes, as I remember them, before taken with her final illness were for a revival in this Church and circuit. I trust those wishes may be realized.*

Her last days were clouded by unconscionableness. But we believe in the wisdom of God, and if it is true that "He doeth all things well," some wise purpose was served when her affliction took this turn. Apparently without pain she passed away on Feb. 20, 1897, at the advanced age of eighty-six. She has left behind her those who loved her dearly to mourn her loss. But to her, we doubt not the wondrous words have been spoken by Jesus, "Well done." She has entered into the joy of her Lord. The funeral sermon was preached on Sunday evening, March 28th, by the circuit minister, to a large congregation.

D. S. LEES.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES.

THOMAS HUGHES was born at Wellington, in the County of Hereford, January 21, 1818. Previous to his conversion he lived as others, according to the course of this world, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and the mind, and was by nature the child of wrath, even as others.

In his carnal state he was fond of company, wrestling, and singing, and to get it he had to resort to the public-house or ale-bench, not that he ever drank to excess, but he frequented these places for the sake of the company and amusement he found there. In this state he lived till he was eighteen years of age, when it pleased God, through the conversion of his own brother, to awaken him to a sense of his danger, and his need of a personal and saving interest in the Lord Jesus Christ. His brother invited him to go with him to a preaching service at Wellington, and while the congregation were singing—the 237th hymn in our Hymnal, but especially the verse, "O, let me kiss Thy bleeding feet," etc.—he broke down and was compelled to cry for mercy and salvation through a crucified, risen, and exalted Saviour.

After his conversion, Brother Hughes was as zealous for Christ as he had been for Satan, and the Quarterly Meeting of the Leominster and Weobley Circuit, seeing in him elements of usefulness, put his name on the plan, and sent him to tell to sinners all around what a Saviour he had found.

While in Leominster and Weobley Circuit he walked on one occasion twenty-eight miles, and preached twice. His work-mates, knowing that he had this journey on the Sunday, said that they would give him a doing up in the hayfield on Monday. Brother Hughes, however, was in the field first, and did as much work as any of them. He let them see that his work for God on the Sunday could be done without interfering with his work in the hay on the Monday.

After leaving Weobley, he came to reside in Hereford, and engaged in the corn and meal business, in which he remained till his death, and in which he suffered great losses through unprincipled and dishonest people who had his goods and never paid him for them.

As a local preacher and worker Mr. Hughes was earnest, able, and zealous. He looked upon his work as sacred and important, and to it he gave his best powers. His sermons were not only carefully prepared, but thoroughly Scriptural, and forcefully and energetically delivered. The Bible to Mr. Hughes was the Word of God from cover to cover, nor had he any patience with those people who liked to tamper with its truths, and misqu岸 its words to suit their own pre-conceived notions of its teaching. Whatever other books Mr. Hughes did not know, he knew his Bible, and could quote it correctly, both in his prayers and in his sermons. Indeed, his knowledge of Scripture truth was marvellous and extensive, and he was able to wield it to purpose in his work.

Mr. Hughes was twice married, his second wife still surviving him. His last illness was short, sharp, and severe, but his sky was unclouded, and his feet firmly fixed on the Rock of Ages. Among his last utterances were the following: "Salvation ready to be revealed in the last time;"—"And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life ; ”

“ O Love, thou bottomless abyss,
My sins are swallowed up in thee ”

He died January 26, 1897, and his remains were interred in Hereford Cemetery on January 30, a large number of friends being present.

E. BALL.

MR. RICHARD WADSWORTH.

RICHARD WADSWORTH was born at Bamborough, Yorkshire, on the 6th of February, 1808. When still a boy the family removed to Doncaster, and he was apprenticed as a blacksmith at Balby. In 1828 he became associated with our Church, worshipping with the small society in Hallgate. In 1831 his name appeared on the plan as an exhorter, and for sixty-five years he continued to exercise his gifts with much acceptance. The journeys were long, helps few, and discouragements many, but he toiled on undeterred by difficulties, and it is said that he walked 12,000 miles to fulfil his preaching appointments. In 1832 he was made a class leader, and he discharged the duties of his office for over sixty-three years; and it was a source of great regret to him that increasing deafness necessitated his resigning the work to other hands. Some of the members of his class have risen to useful and honourable positions both in the Church and the world. Among others we may name the Rev. Dr. Trippett, Wesleyan minister, the Rev. James Shaw, and Mr. Sanderson, ex-mayor of Cardiff. But his pulpit and class meeting work only represented a part of the varied and valuable service he rendered. He was trustee for eight chapels, and gave and begged considerable sums for their erection and support. He was frequently sent for to visit and pray with the sick and the dying, as well as to baptise children, and to inter the dead. His kindly, sympathetic, Christian services were in constant request, and, as his diary shows, he paid thousands of visits to people in trouble and sickness. He was also an active worker in the cause of temperance. He joined the Rechabites when the first “tent” was formed in Doncaster fifty-four years ago, and at the time of his death stood number one on the books of the district, being the oldest member in that part of the country. He bought and distributed thousands of tracts on the occasion of the races, and in various other ways sought to advance the well-being of the people.

“As a preacher he was calm, thoughtful, earnest, and withal, very impressive,” writes a minister who knew him well, “he was readily received and much respected. In his public efforts the preacher was not the most prominent, rather the theme. Christ, his Master, was clearly exhibited, while his aim always appeared transparent to save those that heard him, and in all to give glory to God.” His manner was courteous, his dress neat, his spirit kind, and his appearance and bearing impressive. He frequently occupied the pulpits of other Churches, making annual visits for that purpose to Sheffield, Lincoln, Bradford, and Barnsley. On attaining his eightieth year the members and friends of Spring Gardens Chapel, Doncaster, presented him with a beautifully framed illuminated address as an expression of their high appreciation of his Christian character and unremitting toil and devotion through so many years. He represented his circuit at the District Meeting on no fewer than eight occasions, and he was appointed by his district five times as delegate to Conference. He had the great joy of seeing the circuit with which he was originally connected grow into ten stations, with sixteen ministers and 4,600 members.

His illness was only of a few days' duration, and he passed away on the 6th of April, 1897, in the ninetyeth year of his age. He leaves behind him a widow and two daughters. His eldest daughter was the wife of the late Rev. W. Saul, and his granddaughter is the wife of the Rev. M. Johnson. He was interred at Doncaster Cemetery, a service being held in Hyde Park Chapel, in which the Revs. F. E. Heape, J. Wilson, H. Fox, and Dr. Trippett took part. The Rev. F. E. Heape improved his death audience being present. Mr. Heape stated that, “He had known him for years, and esteemed him much for his Christly spirit and character. It was a blessing to be with him. His communion with God was so real and sweet. He said to me, ‘I am on the Rock! It is all right.’” And the Rev. James Shaw writes: “I first saw him leading a procession in my native village—I was ungodly then—but I was much impressed by his conduct, bearing, and words. I followed the company to the chapel, and his burning words pierced me with conviction of sin, and in a short time I found salvation. He was a man of God, mighty in prayer, of deep-toned piety, and the word he preached was to many Christ the power of God unto salvation. I thank God for Richard Wadsworth, and gratefully acknowledge the influence, help, and saving power that came to me through him.” The Rev. John Slater, writing on behalf of the Sheffield District Committee, says: “He was held in the highest esteem by those members of the committee who knew him, for the long, faithful, and useful service he rendered to our cause in Doncaster, in the Hull and Sheffield Districts, and the Connexion generally. He was a man of a beautiful spirit and an honourable character, and his departure from us is a loss to the cause of Christ in the world.”

M. J.

MRS. BRAY.

OUR Bethel Church, Parkgate, has lost one of its most devoted workers by the decease of our sister. On March 24, 1897, she passed away from a loving family to her final rest. Mrs. Bray was born at Great Snoring, Norfolk, on March 20, 1832, and was brought under deep religious influence, her father being a successful class leader, and her mother a devoted member of the Wesleyan body until their cause was given up in the village. In 1853 she was united in marriage with Charles W. Bray, with whom she lived most happily until he was called home twenty-seven years ago. Soon after her marriage, she, along with her husband, joined our people, and together they did their utmost to promote the varied interests of our cause. Their home became at once, and ever continued to be, the home of ministerial and lay preachers, many of whom have testified to the happy hours spent under her hospitable roof, and in the sanctuary they ever found in her a sympathetic and a receptive hearer. Being compelled to leave their native village, they came to Parkgate in 1869, and at once became active workers in our Church here. When the arrangements were made for building our present beautiful chapel, she entered heartily into the bazaar undertaking, and year after year rendered splendid service in the efforts for reduction of debt. Often she laboured under very difficult circumstances, and was in very great pain, as she suffered terribly for a number of years from rheumatism, by which the last twelve months of her life she was completely prostrated. But whilst she could she toiled unflaggingly. She did her humble work for her Master without a murmur, without a boast, and gained the esteem of all who knew her for her goodness, sympathy, and Christ-like service. Her last illness, long and wearisome, was borne with true resignation and Christian patience. She was lovingly waited upon by a devoted sister and family, and often cheered by the visits of ministers and friends. To visit her was ever a pleasure; one received much more than one gave, and the season spent in prayer was always rich in Divine blessing. Our sister waited trustfully for the end, and spoke joyfully of meeting those who had already entered into rest. On Tuesday morning, March 23, she asked for her sons, her sister, and every member of their families, and gave to them a parting blessing. Soon after she became unconscious, and the next day she passed peacefully away, realising that "the eternal God was her refuge, and underneath were the everlasting arms." To her has been said by the Saviour, "Thou hast been faithful. . . enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." ♦

She was interred in Rawmarsh Cemetery, March 26. An impressive service was conducted in our Parkgate Church by the Rev. J. Maland, assisted by the Rev. A. E. Proctor, when an excellent address was given by the Rev. S. B. Reynolds, who made further reference to her life and death on Sunday evening, April 25. She leaves three sons, the eldest of whom entered our Australian ministry twenty years ago; her second son is an honoured class leader and acceptable local preacher on the Rotherham First Station. Her friends are the poorer for her departure, but heaven is the richer. May they all meet with her again in the morning in the eternal city of God.

Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity. By the REV. JAMES ORR, D.D. (3s. 6d.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE other month it fell to our lot to notice Prof. Ramsay's "Was Christ Born at Bethlehem?" To-day it is our pleasing duty to call attention to another book of a distinguished British scholar which still further betokens that a new spirit is actively at work in the field of Ecclesiastical History, once regarded as so dry and unproductive. Professor Orr disclaims any pretensions, in what he puts forth in this volume, to figure as a discoverer. But progress is carried on by a fresh synthesis of the old material, or by facts, hitherto neglected or deemed of slight importance, being turned to account so as to become factors in a new result. In this way, no less than by the discovery strictly so-called of new facts or truths, are we able to chronicle advance in the study of Ecclesiastical History as in other branches of inquiry. Of late, students of the origins of the early Church seem to have confined themselves mainly to the endeavour to show how that Church was influenced and interpenetrated by its environment. Into this endeavour they have put their strength, and have apparently succeeded in showing that both as to its outward form and its ruling ideas, the Church received its mould and impress from the old religions, Pagan and Judaistic, from the features of the civil government under which they found themselves, and from the prevailing philosophy of the time. We are all now busy reading Dr. Fairbairn's new book, "Catholicism, Roman and Anglican," and hence can easily recall how, in the third chapter of his book—that entitled "Catholicism and Historical Criticism," Dr. Fairbairn shows us how, historically, Christianity was influenced and shaped by its environment. Now Prof. Orr thinks,—and in this we certainly agree with him,—that it is time to look at, and give due weight to, the other side of this truth—How the Church influenced its environment. Was not the influence exerted a reciprocal one? Did not the Church affect its environment in the measure that it was affected by it? These are the questions Prof. Orr asks, and he is disposed to answer them in the affirmative, and in this volume adduces evidence to show:

"(1.) That Christianity had a larger extension laterally, i.e., in point of mere numbers, in the Roman Empire, than the ordinary representations allow. (2.) That it had a much larger extension vertically, i.e., as respects the different strata of society, than is commonly believed; and (3.) That it had a much greater influence intensively or penetratively, i.e., in its effects on the thought and life of the age, than is generally acknowledged."

In seeking to establish his first position, Prof. Orr makes good use of the evidence disclosed by the Christian remains found in the Catacombs of Rome. And here it may be observed in passing that our historians of the first ages of the Church have not availed themselves, to the extent they might have done, of these Catacomb discoveries. Now it was Gibbon who set the fashion of underestimating the numbers and influence of Christians in Rome and throughout the Roman empire; and his example has been largely followed by those who have since written on the subject. But it is clear that his estimate was far too low, and must be revised. In the famous fifteenth chapter of "The Decline and Fall," Gibbon estimates the population of Rome at about 1,000,000, and the number of Christians at the beginning of the fourth century at about 50,000, or one-twentieth part of the whole. "In reality, unless the testimony of the Catacombs has been totally misread, they might have been anything between one-third and one-half."

There are many other points raised by this very interesting work we should have liked to refer to; but we must forbear. One only we will touch upon in concluding. Dr. Fairbairn, in that same third chapter of his recent book already referred to, says: "The Catholic Church is the Platonic Kingdom of philosophers transformed into a Kingdom of priests." Now Dr. Orr sees in the rise of Neoplatonism in the third century "perhaps the most striking proof of the influence of the Fathers of the Early Church on contemporary religious thought." If the Church was Platonised, Platonism may have been first largely Christianised. This is Prof. Orr's position—"If," says he, "the school of Harnack sees in the theological movement of this period an amalgamation of Greek intellectualism with Christianity, it must in consistency recognise that the prevailing Greek spirit had been seized and was being led captive by the new faith." It seems to us that the Professor's views are needful to complete and explain those of the Principal. Let all who can get hold of "Neglected Factors."

Morality as a Religion. An Exposition of some

First Principles. By W. R. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN. (6s.) Swan Sonnenschein and Co., Ltd.

ON the title page of the present well-printed volume are two mottoes which very fairly represent Mr. Sullivan's position and that of the "Ethical Religion Society," meeting on Sabbath mornings at Steinway Hall, Portman Square, whose views he claims to present. The first dictum on the title-page is borrowed from Kant—"Religion is Morality recognised as a Divine command." The second is a saying of Emerson:—"The mind of this age has fallen away from theology to morals. I conceive it an advance." Mr. Sullivan is a theist and a believer in the survival of personality, but as to the other doctrines which are taught in churches and chapels, he is an unbeliever. That negative term, however, is hardly strong enough to describe his attitude to theology. Sometimes he indulges in invective and vituperation, and sometimes he inveighs against what he supposes Christians believe. He spends time and rhetoric in exposing the "deplorable absurdity" of the belief in the resurrection of the identical body laid in the grave—a belief that is "insisted upon by all the Christian Churches." Foolish priests invented the dogma of hell in order to terrorise men into morality. They preached "their Divinity, the magnified copy of a fiend." We ask pardon of our readers for putting such words into print, but we wish them to understand something of the teaching of the new prophets of the Ethical Religion Society. After this it sounds tame to affirm that "the prayer of petition ought instantly to cease as infantine, irrational, and irreverent" . . . "and therefore no petitionary prayers find a place in the service of the Ethical Church." The Psalmist said: "Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though Thou tookest vengeance on their doings;" but Mr. Sullivan maintains that belief in the forgiveness of sins and in a retribution that follows inevitably on misdoing are incompatible beliefs. He believes in a God as we have seen; but in what sort of a God? He himself shall tell us:—"Will it never dawn upon our priests and ministers, our masters and mistresses in schools, that God bears none of the burden of humanity; His heart never breaks because a life is withering in despair." If this be the gospel at the heart of the Ethical Religion Society it will prove, we fear, not to have much lifting power about it.

We are glad to say, when Mr. Sullivan gets away from Churches, and the theology that is dealt out in them, and concerns himself with such questions as the ethics of marriage and of war, he is well worth reading. So is he, too, in the chapter on "Conscience, the voice of God, and the voice of Man."

The Unheeding God. By THOMAS G. SELBY. (6s.) Hodder and Stoughton, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

It is confessedly a difficult matter reviewing volumes of sermons however excellent they may be. In the present case, however, the task is easier because from Mr. Selby we know what to expect. By his "Imperfect Angel, and other Sermons," he at once took high rank as a preacher, and his subsequent works have but served to maintain the reputation he so suddenly acquired. Mr. Selby's sermons are sui generis. They are packed with thought, and move along with a stateliness, a distinction and richness of style all their own. It is, perhaps, in respect to the character of the illustrations usually employed that the originality of these sermons is most strikingly shown. The illustrations are no mere ornaments, but have an analogical value, and illumine the thought and help on the argument. They are worth regard in and for themselves, but they are useful too, as is the gold or jewelled clasp. They are the illustrations that naturally occur to a far-travelled man who has dwelt amongst peoples who have other ways of thinking than ours, of one who has observed the wonders of nature, and is acquainted with the most recent discoveries of science. The illustrations are those of an age of telegraphy-without-wires. We note that the tone of these sermons is serious, not to say sombre, and this befits the themes discussed. We will not go the length of saying that the pessimistic note is struck, but certainly the note is a long way removed from that of jaunty optimism, and this is perhaps nowhere more observable than in the sermon on "Christ's Antidote to Pessimism." These are pre-eminently sermons to read and re-read.

The Progressive Life. By H. JOHNSTON. (2s.)

Partridge and Co., 8 and 9, Paternoster Row; and W. Nightingale, Lesbury, Northumberland. It could hardly be possible, we think, to find a greater contrast between two volumes of sermons than those of Mr. Selby and Mr. Johnston. But "every man in his own order." Mr. Johnston is a devoted layman, and the leader of the Consecration Movement, and as such wields much influence. Mr. Johnston thinks for himself, and evidently wants others to do the same. His utterances are marked by much good sense, and calculated to nourish a vigorous piety, and one that will be strong on the ethical side. There is some good wholesome teaching in the address on "Quickening the Dead." We have heard Mr. Johnston, and can testify that these sermons suffer less than most from the absence of the living voice.

In Christ Jesus; or, The Sphere of the Believer's Life. By ARTHUR T. PIERSON. Funk and Wagnall's Company, New York and London.

As is well known, the canonical order of the Epistles is not their chronological or historical order. They do not stand in the New Testament in the order in which they were originally written. Dr.

Pierson is disposed to see the hand of God in the arrangement of the Epistles no less than in their substance. He finds in the seven Epistles beginning with Romans and ending with Thessalonians, ever-advancing and enlarging teaching as to the privileges which the believer is called to enjoy in Christ Jesus. These last words—"In Christ Jesus" are the text of the whole of these Epistles. On this it will be well for Dr. Pierson to be allowed to speak for himself:—"As we review our studies of this seven-fold group of letters to the early Christian disciples, we find, first, a very remarkable completeness of presentation of this great privilege of the believer. He is IN CHRIST JESUS. In Him he finds a new sphere of life with seven-fold blessing. First, justification with its new standing and acceptance before God, (Romans). Second, sanctification with its new power for holy living in the Spirit of God, (1 and 2 Corinthians). Third, fellowship with God in the actual, practical walk in newness of life, (Galatians). Fourth, exaltation to the heavenlies in an earnest or foretaste of a heavenly life, (Ephesians). Fifth, compensation for all present self-denials and sufferings and renunciations for Christ's sake, (Philippians). Sixth, identification with Christ in His present hidden life at the right hand of the Father, (Colossians). Seventh, glorification when He comes to be admired and adored of all His waiting body, the members, whose manifestation awaits His final epiphany as their head, (Thessalonians). To this scarce anything could be added. All that subsequent epistles can do is to amplify what is here suggested." It should be stated, further, that, in these stages of Christian privilege and experience, Dr. Pierson finds a correspondence with the seven marked stages in our Lord's human and mediatorial life. Dr. Pierson possesses quite remarkable powers of analysis and clear presentation. How far his analysis may have been conditioned by his thoroughgoing views with regard to inspiration is a question. Some will find it difficult to quadrate such scientific and almost mechanically precise division of labour amongst these seven epistles with the fact that they were, with the exception of Romans, letters called forth naturally by the occasion. Others may not be able to go as far as Dr. Pierson in his view of the graduated and relative character of the teaching sought to be conveyed by these epistles. They may still be constrained to believe that they interlap and hold more truth in common. All the same, Dr. Pierson has given us an excellent book, and no one can read it carefully without profit, especially to his spiritual life.

A Subtle Enchantress. By BERTRAND ALAINE. (2s.) A. H. Stockwell and Co., 17, Paternoster Row.

It is an open secret that this able novel is from the pen of one of our own ministers; this fact will, in the eyes of many, lend additional interest to the book, though all could by its aid while away a pleasant hour. The book follows the downward career of a young man, who, as far as this world was concerned, seemed to have everything in his favour, talent, a dignified and noble bearing, the idolising love of his parents, a wealthy and refined home, and all that seems to make life worth living. The book opens with a farewell supper, given by Percy Forsyth, the hero of the book, to a few of his favourite companions, at the close of his university career. At this supper, Percy with the rest, took an oath of perpetual allegiance to the devil. As a symbol and token of the oath they swore, the host presented each member with a golden ring—a twining serpent with emerald eyes—on the inside of which was engraven the words, "Le Cercle du Diable."

Whatever the others may have done, Percy Forsyth kept his oath to the letter. He renounced his career in the Church, for which he had been educated, and took up that of literature. But his downward career was sure and steady, not even the love of a good woman could save him. The habits of years were too strong for him, and the book ends tragically. The other characters in the book are well portrayed—the loving, indulgent, but rather weak mother; the strong, manly, but religiously bigoted vicar, his father; the clinging, trustful, and loving woman who became his wife, and whom he afterwards deserted. We confess that Miss Aberdare, the lady to whom he first paid his addresses, interests us more than any of the other characters, though she is not sketched so much in detail, and we have, in imagination, followed what might have been his career had he had the good fortune to win her.

We congratulate the Rev. J. W. Chappell on having thus early made his way by virtue of the intrinsic merit of his book before the literary public.

Death's Microbe. By HAMILTON ORTON. Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE utter and bitter hopelessness of death is here set forth when viewed apart from God, and as the end of all things, instead of the beginning of everlasting life. A philosopher's child had died, and with her life went out all that made earth beautiful and grand for him. A fellow philosopher and he discuss Death, the King of Terrors, the grasper of human souls. Said the younger, "You speak of Death as if he were a spirit. Methinks if we believe in one we should believe in all. A spirit of Death? Then must there be a spirit of Life as well. If Death reigned all alone, then life could not exist, for he would trample her beneath his feet and crush her from existence, that he might be the lonely monarch on his throne. All right for idle dreamers to imagine thus. Philosophy has taught us other things. Nature, in spite of all her richest gifts to man, has placed within his system microbes of disease and death. The microbes do away with life, as disease for the time being does away with health. Could we but root those microbes from the constitution we could blot death for ever from the world." So together they laboured both day and night to discover the microbe of death. Many times they thought they had the clue, but after months of toil they seemed no nearer the secret than before. One night the old philosopher saw in a dream a radiant vision of his little child standing before him. The vision said, "My father, why is it that you seek to banish death for ever from the world? I never knew the microbe you are searching to expel, for none who trust and love can die. I do not want to be called from my home, I would not care to come back here again, I want you up above with me. The microbe of death is sin itself, and without that there is no death, the soul shall pass from life unto eternal life. The great minds seek to find it out, the people long for dreary earth—when, oh! how grand is that bright world they never dream of;—how easy, if they only knew, to grasp the truth, and enter into life."

Service of Song: "Sermons and Songs of the Fields." For Flower and Harvest Festival Services. Connective Readings by Rev. J. G. Bowran. Musical Compilations by Mr. Robert Bowran. (6d.; for 50 and upwards, 4d. each). R. Bowran, 42, Grey Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

THOSE of our readers who will ere long be arranging for Harvest Thanksgiving services will like to have their attention directed to a Service of Song designed for such an occasion. The names on the title-page are a sufficient guarantee of excellence. The Rev. J. G. Bowran has furnished the connective readings, and his literary ability is well known; and Mr. R. Bowran, who is responsible for the musical part of the service, is Musical Director of the Sunderland and Newcastle District Psalmody Association. The pieces are well selected; are fresh and unhackneyed, and agreeably varied in character.

The Connexional Outlook.

BY THE REV. J. ATKINSON.

—The Connexional auditors have completed their investigation of the condition of the various funds, and the result, though not all that could have been desired, yet may be regarded as fairly satisfactory. None of the Funds are at all embarrassed, though the demands made upon them by the increasing expenditure due to Connexional expansion and need prevents the accumulation of any great reserve. The Book Room shows increasing profits notwithstanding the decreased circulation of some of the monthlies, and the keen competition experienced from the trade. This speaks well for the management of this Institution. The other Funds and Institutions show advanced revenue, so that Conference will not have to deplore any retrogression or deficit.

* * *

—The balance sheet of the Insurance Company which has just been issued, is of a satisfactory character. The revenue for the year is £3,318 1s. 10d., an advance upon the previous year of £51 1s. 9d. As most of the Connexional properties that can be insured by the Company are placed with it, and as no general business is taken, any great increase in revenue cannot, in the nature of things, be expected. What is realised in this direction is mainly secured in consequence of improvement in Trust Estates, and every year policies more or less in number lapse from various causes. The claims made upon the Company have been very light this last year, only amounting to £127 15s. 10d. This speaks well for the care with which the various bodies of trustees manage their estates. The directors have been able to give £1,616 for the relief of embarrassed Trust Estates, and so have assisted materially in reducing the debt upon our Connexional property. This contribution makes a total of £12,141 which the directors have contributed for this purpose. They have several claims of this kind still pending which will be met in due course when the trustees have raised the sums to which they stand pledged. After covering all expenditure the directors were able to carry over £1,015 to the Reserve Fund, which now stands at £27,673 18s. 10d.

* * *

—The Aged Local Preachers' Fund has evidently come to stay. Whatever may be the result of the agitation concerning Old Age Pensions, the Connexion seems to be gradually solving the problem in relation to one class of workers, and probably the aid afforded as the Fund takes on may be extended to others. The permanent allowances are as yet limited to applicants over seventy-five years of age, and the Fund has received such support that these allowances have advanced about four and sixpence per month. The assistance afforded is as yet not great, but as the fund increases it can be easily improved, and the age limit can be reduced. Grants are made to applicants under the age named, and the usefulness of the Fund becomes more apparent each year. The Connexion is feeling its way in dealing with the problem of Old Age Pensions, and as the value and necessity of such a Fund become apparent to the Churches, as well as the obligation to provide it, a greatly enlarged income may be expected.

—The Sunday School Committee of the London First District supplies an excellent report of the work of the past year. Though circumstances have compelled the closing of three schools, eight others have been commenced. The number of teachers has increased by forty-two, and 533 additional scholars have been placed on the roll. A very satisfactory addition has been made to the number of scholars over fourteen years of age, showing that some progress is being made in solving the problem, "How to keep our elder scholars." Five additional Catechumen Classes, and twenty-five additional Christian Endeavour Societies have been formed. Temperance work has not been neglected, and several Adult Societies have been commenced, while a considerable addition has been made to the number of juvenile abstainers. Eighteen branches of the Bible Reading and Prayer Union have been established, and two new libraries have been opened. This is a splendid record of progress. There is no declension in any department of Sunday School work, but a pleasing forward movement that promises well for the Churches in this District.

* * *

—The New South Wales District reports an increase of twenty-seven members, and some progress in other departments as well. Liabilities on Church property have been slightly reduced during the year. The statistics of the District show a membership of 2,021. The regular ministers number twenty-seven, with four home missionaries. Local preachers number 129; class leaders 68; Sunday School teachers 707; scholars 6,902; and adherents 14,617. Two new churches have been built during the year and opened free of debt. There are eighty-three churches in the Colony, with accommodation for 13,700 persons. Services are conducted at a number of places at which as yet no Connexional property has been secured. Ten out of the twenty-seven stations are provided with parsonages.

—The question of union, as a matter of course, engaged the serious attention of the District Meeting. The Federal Council which had had the question under consideration, furnished a report containing conclusions which had been adopted unanimously, and these conclusions the meeting proceeded to discuss with the result that they were accepted without dissent. The report showed that in the local amalgamations comprehended in the formation of a United Methodist Church, trust affairs would not be injuriously affected, and that in dealing with surplus properties, not only would no financial difficulties be created, but liabilities would be reduced, as in all cases where properties would have to be sold there was every reason to hope that after all mortgages and other debts had been discharged a surplus would remain by which continuing liabilities might be reduced. It was shown that in several districts where overlapping existed, union would result in considerable financial and ministerial advantage. The date at which it was considered union ought to be consummated was fixed for 1902, subject to necessary modification, for it was apprehended that in some localities amalgamation might take place earlier if circumstances favoured, while at the same time it was recognised that in other localities it might not be possible till later, and hence it was resolved that amalgamation should be completed in the year named, so far as possible, or earlier, but that where local interests required it, an extension of time might be allowed so that all ministers might be provided for. So far, then, the question is settled for this Colony, and steps will, of course, be taken to give the resolutions adopted effect. The other Districts will also, it appears, seek to consummate the union practically in the same year. So that three years hence the present relations between the British Conference and the Australian Districts may be expected to cease.

—The report of the Surrey Central Mission is an interesting record of effort, and we may add progress in social and spiritual work, as the following show. The membership has risen to 300, the congregation on a Sunday night fairly fills the church. The children's service every Sunday is well attended. The Sunday School has 120 scholars connected with the mission. The people are members of the mission classes; 120 women are members of the women's Meeting, and 120 men are members of the men's Meeting; fifty boys are enrolled in the boys' school; seventy girls are members of the girls' school. A Slate Club numbers 100 members, and 550 monthly tickets were sold last year for the Men's Institute, in addition to the tickets presented to those not able to pay for them. This mission is located in a very needy neighbourhood, and is evidently doing excellent work. Mr. Parr and his helpers are deserving of all sympathy and support, as they contend resolutely with the poverty, degradation, and spiritual destitution of the congested population in the midst of which they are working.

* * *

—Very satisfactory news reaches us from the West African Mainland Mission. Recently the Rev. N. Boocock, on visiting Jamestown, a part of the mission under the care of Rev. C. F. Gill, had the joy of receiving into Church membership by public baptism, three men and seven women. The Church at this place is steadily increasing in numbers and spiritual power, and is exercising a good influence upon the life of the town. The health of the resident missionary has unfortunately broken down, and his return to England has become a necessity. It was thought that a short stay at Old Calabar, combined with the medical attention he might secure there, would enable him to remain longer at his post, but this, it appears, was not practicable, hence, when these lines are read he may be in England, and a successor selected to go and take up the work on this promising station.

* * *

—The Rev. T. Jackson continues the good work at Clapton which he has carried on there now for many years. Some 1,100 children are breakfasted every week. They are gathered from the seven Board Schools in the locality, and this breakfast to most of them is the meal of the day. Many other hungry children gather round the rooms where the breakfasts are given, but not having the requisite pass, have to be turned away, a task of the most trying character. It would be a joy to admit them, it is a pain to turn them away. A thousand cases during the past month have been attended to through the mission medical dispensaries, and many destitute families have been assisted in various ways. The spiritual work of the mission at the four centres is vigorously carried on, and week by week some are brought out of darkness into marvellous light. Valuable as the social work of this mission is, it is subsidiary to the work of saving men and women from the power and dominion of evil, and leading them into the light, liberty, and joy of God's children.

* * *

—The Rev. J. Flanagan continues his efforts in South London and is working steadily and with much success in raising funds for the new church and schools in course of erection in the Old Kent Road. He is hopeful that ere long the cost of the buildings, some £10,000, will be raised, and the mission transferred from Trinity Street to the more commodious premises now approaching completion. A further effort will be needed to secure the freehold of the site, which means that £3,500 more will be required, but the success of the effort so far affords hope that the additional sum will be raised in due time, and that ultimately these beautiful and commodious premises will belong absolutely to the Connexion. The social and spiritual work has been carried on as vigorously as other labour has permitted, and gratifying success has been realised. This mission has a promising future, and we trust will prove a still greater blessing to South London.

* * *

—The news from the Central African Mission is not all that could be desired. The work moves on steadily, and the missionaries are becoming more and more influential among the natives, but as yet we hear of no Church being formed. We must, however, be patient; there is the promise of success, and we think in the near future. Mr. Chapman has been ill, and was brought from his station by the natives, in a somewhat feeble condition, to Mr. Pickering's residence at Kukala. By this time there is hope that by careful nursing and such medical attention as could be given, he may have been able to resume his work. Mr. Baldwin and party have been delayed on their journey. On the 17th of January they were 135 miles from Kazangula, where they ought to have arrived at the end of last year. It would take some three weeks more by ox-waggon travel to reach the Zambesi, so that the journey is likely to take up six weeks longer than was anticipated. The party, however, was in excellent health, and looking hopefully forward to settlement in work which by now will have been realised. We may expect soon to hear of extended operations on this mission, and we trust of a gratifying measure of success. Pioneer work among heathen and savage tribes, such as we have undertaken in Mashukulumbweland, is of necessity difficult and of slow development.

* * *

—The Melbourne District, Australia, reports an increase of twenty-three members for the year, so that it appears likely that now increase will be reported from all the Colonial Districts. Here, as in the other Districts, union has been the question of the hour, but financial considerations appear to be a barrier in the way. Certain offers have been made by the committee appointed by last Conference to deal with this question of finance, but this District does not consider them sufficient, and is sending a delegate specially to attend the Conference at Grimsby to see if better terms cannot be obtained. We fear our Colonial friends will not fare any better for taking this course. The terms in the judgment of many in this country were too generous, and only likely to be accepted by the British Conference for the sake of parting in friendly way with the Antipodean Churches. It is possible by demanding too much to get less than might otherwise have been obtained.

* * *

—Those who are interested in the New Marriage Act, and any of our churches that think of taking advantage of it, had better secure the Guide prepared by the Connexional Solicitors, Messrs. Rawlings and Butt. It has been prepared at the request of the General Committee, and contains a complete and valuable exposition of the Act, with all necessary instruction as to procedure, etc. In fact, we have met with nothing equal to it as a guide in relation to this unsatisfactory Act. However, those who adopt the Act and follow the guidance furnished in this little book will be in no danger of falling into error on any essential matter to which the Act relates. It will be an indispensable companion to any one accepting the position of an "authorised person." Messrs. Rawlings and Butt, with thoughtful consideration, have sent a copy to every minister in the Home Districts.

* * *

—The trustees of the chapel at Harrogate, instead of enlarging the present building, as they at one time intended, have decided to sell it and erect a new set of premises close to the New Art Schools in one of the best positions in the town. They have a good offer for the present building, and purpose spending some £7,000 on the new undertaking, which will afford ample facilities for developing our Connexional interest in this popular health resort, and supply our people from various parts of the country who may visit the town, with every accommodation for religious communion and fellowship.

* * *

—The Connexional increase for the year is not, we think, likely to be less than 1,500, a result calling for thankfulness, though not furnishing reason for much congratulation.

* * *

A deputation from the Missionary Committee recently visited Shoeburyness to inspect a proposed site for a chapel there. The report is favourable, and steps are to be taken to erect a schoolroom once, leaving sufficient land for the chapel. The circumstances favour the completion of the undertaking. An excellent site has been secured at Leigh in connection with the same. A new iron building will be placed upon the site, as there is every prospect of a rising value. These projects are connected with the Southend property in this south-east corner, which contains its own agencies, and is in the locality.

—At various places in the Shotley Bridge Station, in the County of Durham, there has been a remarkable work of grace. Fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, have yielded themselves to the Lord, and bands of young people have been organised for evangelistic work under the leadership and guidance of experienced persons. The Christian Endeavour Societies have taken a very active part in this work, and are still doing so. The station reports an increase of fifty for the year, but retains a good reserve on trial. The members and officials are anticipating still greater things than they have yet seen.

* * *

—“The United Committee for Promoting Concerted Action” among the Methodist Churches of Great Britain, have sent to the superintendents of all Methodist Circuits in this country a circular recommending certain resolutions which, if carried into effect, will, in the judgment of the Committee, promote a co-operation that may greatly strengthen the Churches, and develop the fraternal spirit. They deem co-operation in some way necessary among Methodists in order to arrest the Sacerdotal Aggression which, through the Established Church, is making itself felt in the national life. Evangelical religion is imperilled by this revival of down-right Popery in its most attractive and insidious forms, and hence they plead for a closer union and co-operation among all Methodists as an effective antidote for this national peril. We append the resolutions they have adopted and sent out, and we are sure that our ministers all over the Connexion will be prepared, not only to adopt these means for promoting fraternity, but also to join in any other measures by which, through mutual co-operation, the influence of Methodism may be brought to bear on our national life and on all questions that touch the moral and religious welfare of the people.

“That it is desirable, wherever practicable, that a United Meeting of the ministers and an equal number of representative members of the various Methodist Churches be held early in the year for devotion, fellowship, and counsel.”

“That, wherever practicable, a United Methodist Lovefeast be held annually, on a Sunday afternoon; and that Whit-Sunday, where other arrangements will allow, be chosen for the purpose, as commemorative of the Pentecostal descent of the Holy Ghost.”

The Wider Outlook.

—The Education Department is becoming acquainted with some not very pleasant results of the dole of six hundred thousand pounds which the Government flung the other year to the clerical party for the maintenance of the so-called Voluntary Schools. It was affirmed at the time that an annual gift of public money would certainly make the schools less voluntary than ever, as nothing would be taken of it to discontinue, more or less, the paltry sum which was subscribed voluntarily or otherwise to keep up the fiction of voluntarism in connection with these sectarian institutions. That the subscriptions have fallen off is apparent in the accounts that have been published. But this is not the worst result of the dole with which the Government rewarded their clerical supporters. My “Lords” of the Council have discovered some other consequences which they mention with regret, and go so far as to threaten, in a mild way, that unless the practices to which they refer cease there will be a danger of the managers of the schools which resort to them being deprived of the grant. It was, of course, in aid of education, as was stated at the time, that these thousands annually were made over to Sectarian Schools by Act of Parliament, but my “Lords” have found out that the money can be appropriated in other ways; and hence they have issued a circular to the New Voluntary School Associations, having the administration of the special aid grant, in which, while saying some smooth things, they express regret at the decline of subscriptions, and instruct the Associations to give special attention to the matter, intimating that where subscriptions are not forthcoming, or where they are less than might be reasonably expected, the amount of the grant will be reduced or withheld altogether. But another ingenious method of diverting the money from its legitimate purpose rather alarms my “Lords.” They find that in connection with some of these sectarian schools the rent of the buildings has been considerably increased, and this increase paid out of the grant, thereby enabling certain clerical managers to secure part of the money for other purposes than that for which it was granted. The Department has taken alarm at this practice of appropriating the money, and in several such cases that have been inquired into has felt compelled to withhold the grants till satisfied this practice is abandoned. And the Associations are advised in drawing up their schemes to give special attention to this question of rental as the Department cannot approve of any portion of the aid grant being taken for rent. It seems, furthermore, that application has been made in some instances for grants to increase the teachers’ salaries, and the teachers have never seen any increase, the money being used when obtained in some other way, and my “Lords” express their dissatisfaction with information they have received on this matter, and inform the Associations that the purpose of the grant is to improve the efficiency of the schools, and not to meet necessary annual expenditure that ought to be met by other means. It almost appears as if the Education Department would have to employ a detective staff to prevent the misappropriation of this big annual dole. It was anticipated that its effect would reduce subscriptions, but such sharp practice as my "Lords" somewhat mildly rebuke in their recent circular was hardly expected.

—The true character of Romanism, and its effect upon social and civic life, is only too apparent in the case of Madagascar. There, under French control, Romanism is established. Freedom of thought and worship really exist no longer. Priestly domination with all its attendant evils is the order of the day. Before the advent of France, and the acquiescence of Lord Salisbury's former Government in the establishment of a protectorate, which speedily passed over into annexation, the Hovas, the ruling race on that Island, were a growing and progressive people, among whom Protestant Christian teaching had wrought a marvellous change, and opened up promise of an advancing civilisation. Now all this is changed. The Queen, a Christian woman, was dethroned and sent into exile, and it is now said she is Romanist. If this is so, it is the result of a persecution she has not been able, like many of her subjects, to resist. Oppression and persecution have been resorted to to alienate the people from the Protestant faith in which they had been trained, and since France has given full power to priestly intrigue and authority in the island, the people have gone degrees backward in civilisation. The hope for this island lies in the condition of things that may ensue when the prohibitory tariff upon English goods is revoked, and English trade and influence is once more felt among the Malagasy. Then, possibly, some measure of religious toleration may follow, but in the present state of affairs the priests have it all their own way, as the country is barred against British commerce and influence. The greatest foe to civilisation is Romanism, where it has unlimited power, as it has had since the advent of the French in Madagascar.

—The Liquor Traffic is gradually gaining a stronger position in the country, and unless something is done to check its progress the most disastrous consequences to morality and religion must necessarily follow. The brewing and distilling businesses have largely passed into the hands of limited companies. The shareholders in these companies are found among all classes of society. Large dividends tempt men, and many who are connected with Christian Churches are found connected with these companies. It is well known that this development of the trade has given it greater power and influence than it ever had. These big companies have bought up the licensed houses right and left, till in some localities free houses—that is houses not belonging to a brewery company—are the exception. And now the trade is gathering to itself further strength and influence. The firm of Lipton, Limited, is a big grocery and provision trust, with hundreds of establishments scattered over the country, and this firm is proceeding to take out licences to vend strong drink under the Grocers' Licensing Act. The firm recently applied to the Newington Licensing Bench for licences for twelve of their establishments in that part of South London, and got them, as the magistrates have no power to refuse licences of this kind. And the firm did this though they were requested by some thousands of householders in the neighbourhood, who know well what the consequence will be, to keep their hand clear of this business. This request was treated with summary discourtesy, for what is the moral and religious welfare of a neighbourhood in the estimation of this company, compared with an addition of considerable per centage to their dividends. The likelihood is that in all the establishments of this firm similar liberty to vend strong drink will be obtained, and a large addition made to the facilities for degrading the people. It is well known that these grocers' licences are a fruitful cause of drunkenness, especially among women. The remedy is for all who have any concern for the future of this nation to agitate for the abolition of this form of licence, and, further, to seek to secure for the people the control over this traffic under all its forms. Members of Christian Churches who are pocketing the unhallowed gain secured from their interest in this trade as shareholders in any company connected with producing or vending strong drink, are false to their profession, and incurring a tremendous responsibility. Men are being invited to ask for guidance in life, "What would Jesus do?" and no one can for a moment think that He would hold shares in a brewery company, or have anything to do with the vending of strong drink. Men cannot serve God and mammon, but professed Christians who hold shares in the drink traffic are trying it on, but they will in the issue of life find it to be a sad and miserable failure.

—The Churches of this country are now to experience another sharp and crucial test of their allegiance to Jesus Christ, and the genuineness of their interest in the religious life of this nation. It is proposed on the part of the managers of two of the big daily newspapers to issue a Sunday edition. Now, it is easy to comprehend what this means, and the proprietors of the Daily Mail and the Daily Telegraph are, by their action, proposing to further destroy the distinction between the Sabbath and the other days of the week. They propose to drag it down to the level of ordinary working days, for the prevalence of Sunday newspapers, if realised, will do more to destroy the character of the Sabbath than any other device that the cupidity of man stimulated by Satanic influence can promote. There will be no stopping at the mere issue of a Sunday edition if the thing goes on. We shall have in a very little time, special and extra special editions. News-vendors will have to keep their establishments open, and the streets of our towns and cities will be invaded by a host of boys and men distributing and selling these Sunday papers. It is hardly likely that other proprietors will see this go on without following suit, especially if the venture succeeds, as we sincerely hope it won't. Let this venture become a success, and the rest and repose and religious observance of the Sabbath, impaired more than enough already, will be likely to disappear. News-vendors at present have pretty long hours during six days, for they have to be astir in the early morning, and keep their places of business open late at night to meet the public demand. So that for them the Sunday edition, multiplied as it will be if the public countenances it, will be a thing of the past. The Churches can do much to prevent this further invasion of the Sabbath rest. Let all the members of Christian Churches unite, not only in abstaining from purchasing the Sunday edition of the Daily Mail and Daily Telegraph, but also from purchasing these papers on any other day. Many Free Church councils are advising this course, and we have no hesitation in recommending it. There is more than plenty of Sunday labour already without any further addition to it. It is greatly to be regretted that the proprietors of the Daily Mail have turned a deaf ear to the appeals that have been made to them from various quarters, and as nothing that money can do to make the venture a success will be left undone, the Churches need to bestir themselves, and use all possible means to defeat this attempt to further secularise the Sabbath.

—The natives of South Africa have lost one of their best friends, and the London Missionary Society one of its ablest agents, by the death of the Rev. John Mackenzie. He was the colleague of Moffat and Livingstone away back in the fifties, and like them, he was a Scotsman. In 1859 he succeeded Moffat in his work north of the Orange River, and took up his abode at Kuruman, then the capital of Khama, chief of the Bechuanas, and has exercised all these years no small influence over him. When, after the affair at Majuba Hill, the Boers began to "trek" into the territories bordering on their State, Mr. Mackenzie did splendid service in prevailing upon the Imperial Government to declare the Bechuana Protectorate, thus putting an end to Boer aggression. He was appointed the first British Resident, and though he did not long occupy the position, as his heart was in other work, he always remained the firm and steadfast friend of the natives, championing their cause, and exposing all attempts to oppress them. He was a determined opponent of the policy of Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Rhodes for developing the country by chartered companies rather than by direct Imperial administration. He saw in company government the oppression of the natives, and waged war against it to the last, and though not as successful as he desired, he, nevertheless, prevented his beloved Bechuanas from falling under the iron hand of a Chartered Company. The South African natives have had no truer friend, and few men have done so much in protecting them from the oppressors' hand. He leaves behind him a splendid record of work in the fear of God for the benefit of man, and like his early co-labourers, Moffat and Livingstone, his name will be held in everlasting remembrance. Men like Mackenzie cannot be forgotten.

—The crisis in the Established Church has at last arrested the attention of Parliament. The subject was introduced by a resolution submitted by Mr. Gedge, the member for Walsall, an Evangelical Churchman and a supporter of the Government, and it speedily became apparent that there was as much interest in the question on the right of the Speaker as on the left. Mr. Gedge's resolution condemned the lawlessness of the English Church Union, shown in its recent manifesto, and sought to bar the way to preferment of all the clergy who were not prepared to obey the bishops, and defer to the Courts which have jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical. Mr. B. Hoare, another supporter of the Government, introduced an amendment, which was substantially in agreement with Mr. Gedge's, save that reference to the E. C. U. was left out, and the clause relating to the ecclesiastical Courts was omitted. It was Mr. Gedge's resolution emasculated. The debate was interesting, but most of all on account of the position taken up by the leader of the House, which was in striking contrast to that he took up when Mr. S. Smith introduced the same question in the debate on the address. He then treated the matter in a supercilious way, and indulged in some cheap sneering. He saw little then to complain of in the Church—on the whole things were fairly satisfactory—and he dismissed the whole question as being almost, if not quite, beneath notice. He spoke in a very different tone in the recent debate. The extreme High Church party is seeking to alter the traditional character of the Church so that its loyal sons will be unable to recognise it. Members of the English Church Union are exhibiting great disloyalty to the Church, and inflicting upon it serious injury. People like Lord Halifax make no secret of the fact that they regard the history of the Church of England during the past three centuries as carrying with it no Protestant tradition. This class of men want to introduce as much or as little as they please of the ritual practices which prevailed before the Reformation. Persons holding these views might be honest in holding them, but they were not loyal members of the Church of England. He was of opinion there needed more autonomy in the Church of England, but these extreme ritualists were hindering its attainment. This, and much more in the same vein, was said by the First Lord to the surprise and consternation of the sacerdotal set who listened with so much satisfaction to his speech on the same subject at the beginning of the Session. Mr. Balfour has found out that votes are in danger, and that many on his own side of the House are not prepared to tolerate episcopal weakness and wink at Romish practices, and so he faces right about and condemns, in no measured terms, the lawlessness of many of the clergy. He, however, prevailed upon Mr. Gedge to withdraw his resolution and accept Mr. Hoare's amendment, which had less force and point. But he had not rightly gauged the feeling of his party on the question, for no sooner did it become the substantive resolution than Mr. Bartley, another supporter of the Government, moved to add the last clause of Mr. Gedge's resolution, which recommended that, as a condition of ecclesiastical promotion, not only the bishops should be obeyed, but also the courts which had jurisdiction over ecclesiastical affairs. Mr. Balfour protested against this, but in vain, and he was at last compelled by the pressure of his own party to accept it, and so by a majority of 200 to 14 it was decided that henceforth ministers of the Crown had not to recommend any clergyman for preferment unless they were satisfied he would submit to episcopal direction and obey the Courts. Evidently we are moving, and if the extreme section of the Established Church, which is represented by Lord Halifax, are as sincere as they profess to be, the work of the Liberation Society may ere long be completed. We have our doubts, however, whether they will have the courage of their convictions, but this vote in Parliament will, at any rate, have shown them what the lay governors of the Church mean. There is no mistaking the mind of Parliament and the nation in relation to this Romish masquerade, and the result will be looked for with some interest.

* * *

—It is well known that the present Government came to power largely by the help of the liquor trade, but so scandalous are the evils of this traffic that even a Government helped to power by it could not ignore them, and hence a Commission was appointed, a favourite method with Governments when they want to shelve some awkward question. In forming this Commission care was taken to have the trade well represented, and connections of Gilbey's, Reid's, Truman, Hanbury and Buxton, Seager, Evans and Co., Younger and Co., with the Chairman of the Licensed Victuallers' Central Protection Society, were appointed members of the Commission. Temperance was represented by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. T. P. Whittaker, Mr. W. S. Caine, and other opponents of the Liquor Traffic, and several neutrals were thrown in to balance parties, but most of the neutrals leaned to the Trade. In forming this Commission the Government did a good thing in appointing Lord Peel chairman. He entered upon the work without any bias, leaving his conclusions to be formed by the evidence he might hear, and he has been forced to the conclusion that the Trade is so gigantic an evil that it can only be dealt with by drastic legislation, and he has prepared his report accordingly. The Trade, of course, soon as Lord Peel's views were known, was up in arms, the weak-kneed neutrals were canvassed with a vengeance, and enlisted in the interest of the Trade, and a dead set was made against the proposals of Lord Peel. The main difference appears to have been on the question of Compensation. The representatives of the Trade were compelled to admit that drink-shops were too numerous, and needed to be reduced in number. They were willing, too, that clubs should be subject to supervision like any other place where drinking is carried on, but they set up a claim for a kind of freehold in the licences, and insisted upon their being regarded as so much real property upon which a claim for compensation could be based, as is the case when a person is required to give up landed estate for the public good. This was more than Lord Peel could agree to. He was not averse to compensation in the form of a time limit, say of five years, before eviction should take effect, but he was not prepared to agree to the payment of some millions of public money for the licences that would have to lapse. As the position taken up by the liquor representatives on the last section of his report practically nullified previous decisions, and was entirely antagonistic to his own conception of the facts and the position of the question as set forth in evidence, and as the Liquor patrons and the neutrals they had won over constituted a majority, Lord Peel withdrew from the chair, and will present his report as a minority report signed by the members of the Commission who agree with him. When he retired, Sir Algernon West was placed temporarily in the Chair, and so we shall have two reports, but Lord Peel's high character and great influence will in relation to this question count for much, as will the views of those who agree with him, while it is evident little value can be attached to the views of those members of the Commission who have a financial interest in the Trade.

REV. JOSEPH HARPER.

Rev. Joseph Harper.

THE Rev. Joseph Harper, whose portrait we give on the opposite page, was born at the small hamlet of Morton, in the parish of Bromsteadheath, Staffordshire, in the month of April, 1838. His parents were of that class who earn the wealth, but who are not entrusted with large sums to distribute. They were, however, strictly honest, sober, industrious, and Christians of the staunch Protestant type, which accounts for the very salutary influence that was exerted over him and his two brothers, who, with the parents, made up the household.

Early in life he heard the truth preached by the ministers of the Primitive Methodist Church, and was led to give himself unreservedly to God. At the age of sixteen he joined the Church in his native village, and in a very short time afterwards was placed on the staff of local preachers of the Stafford Branch of the Wrockwardine Circuit. God very graciously blessed his labours in this department of Christian work, and he was made the means of bringing several young persons to the knowledge of the truth. At the expiration of his apprenticeship, he removed to Empingham, in Rutlandshire, and as there was no Primitive Methodist Society nearer than thirteen miles, he united himself with the Wesleyans. His credentials were accepted, and he was received as a local preacher. For about twelve months he laboured with great acceptability among the people, until he was invited to preach for the Reformers. He had no wish to give offence, nor yet did he claim to have adjudged upon the disputes which at that time had so seriously rent the Wesleyan body; still he thought he might be of service to both Churches, so took the appointment. For this act he was charged at the next Quarterly Meeting, and because he would not pledge himself not to preach for the Reformers again, he was expelled. For a little time he worshipped with the Reformers, but upon his removal to Oakham, he sought out the Primitives, and though four miles away, he re-united with his own people, and was re-instated as a local preacher in the Melton Circuit. He devoted himself to the work with increased earnestness, and gave himself to the study of the Scriptures and Methodist theology.

Circumstances led to his removal to Stepney, in the East End of London, when he joined the James Street Church, and was placed on the plan of the London Third Circuit. The officials of the circuit were quick to perceive his suitability for the ministry, and he was accordingly recommended for the "Reserve List." He was appointed to the Salisbury Circuit in the year 1863, and served the first year of his probation here, under the genial superintendency of the late Rev. E. Rawlings. During this year a gracious revival was realised at Broadchalk, Bishopstone, and several other places in the circuit.

The following are the other circuits on which he has laboured:—Newbury, Chinnor, Sturminster Newton, Salisbury, (a second time), Motcombe, Banbury, Andover, Chipping Norton, Blandford, Chinnor, (a second time), Salisbury, (a third time), Donnington, Oakham, Bottesford, Andover, (a second time), where he is finishing his third year. Looking over this list of circuits, it is very evident Mr. Harper's has been the life of a travelling preacher. Not one of these stations would be considered an easy one, yet he has cheerfully and faithfully worked therein; good has been done, and he has formed many strong friendships. He has had a fair share of trials and sorrows, yet has cheerfully endured. The happy disposition with which nature has blessed him, and the care he has always exercised over his health and life, with the Divine blessing, have enabled him to overcome many hardships with small loss.

Mr. Harper is tall and physically well-proportioned, so that his personal appearance is a good recommendation. We confidently expect he will be of great service to the Connexion for many years to come.

He has three sons and three daughters, all attached to the Church of their parents; the eldest son being in the ministry, and at the present time superintendent of the Bradfield Circuit.

CHAPTER XVI.

RUTLAND'S CONFESSION.

"EVERYTHING can be told in three words," said the young man, after hesitating a few seconds. "I love you."

"What!"

There was consternation, disappointment, anger, expressed in the word.

"Just that, Miss Neville. Oh, I knew you would be angry!" he continued, as he looked into her face. "I know I am mad; I know that what I say must seem to you preposterous. But I cannot help it. For a month I have been fighting against it. I have told myself that I am a fool, a madman. But I cannot destroy the feeling. I know that you resent my making this confession. I am nothing to you but a heretic, to whom in the goodness of your heart, you have been kind, but I cannot help it. I did not mean to tell you, but in this, too, I have been weaker than a child. Forgive me, Miss Neville!"

The girl answered never a word. The blood had mantled to her face, and her lips were tremulous. She had never thought of the young man in this way, nevertheless she could not listen to his words without being moved. She instinctively felt that they were honest. He meant what he had said, and there was something overmastering in his presence. She admired him, cared for him far more than for Arthur Stanley, who was anxious for her to be his wife. He was more of a man in every way. Personally, he was more than the equal of the young squire, while intellectually the poles were between them. Had they belonged to the same—, but there, as he had said, his confession was absurd, and yet it was not unpleasant to hear. He might be a commoner, but he was a gentleman, and no girl is insensible to an honest man's love.

"You are angry," said Duncan.

"No," said the girl, "that is——"

"I am so glad," he cried, "so glad." He looked into her eyes. He saw that they were humid, and that her lips trembled. A great hope came into his heart. Perhaps—perhaps she might care for him. His love made him bold.

"Thank you," he interrupted. "It is kind of you to hear me, at least, with patience. I am afraid my love is hopeless."

"It is," said the girl, scarcely realising what she said, "at the same time—that is——"

"What?" cried Duncan. "Believe me, this is no passing fancy! I never loved a woman before. I never pretended to. I have never been thrown among young girls at all. During the years I was a student I lived for study; but—but you have changed everything, everything. Oh, I know I am foolish, but I cannot help it. I love you with my whole heart, my whole life. I know I am asking you what seems impossible; but you know that old Latin saying, Omnia vincit amor. Is there any possibility that it can be true? Can my love overcome all things? Can I by years of devotion win your love for me?"

Alizon did not speak. The young man's words had moved her, more than she thought possible. After all, his words were—but no——

"It is impossible, impossible, Mr. Rutland; think no more of it. You bring pain on both of us by persisting. Had I dreamed that you would have ever have cared for me in this way, I would not have——"

But she did not finish the sentence. She had meant to say that she would not have invited him to the Priory, had she thought he would have fallen in love with her, but she was not sure about it. For she was very anxious for his conversion, and while she would not have participated in the plot of Ritzoom had it been revealed to her in its entirety, she was still prepared to sacrifice much in order to save his soul, and win a victory for the Church.

"Are you sure it is impossible?" said Duncan pleadingly. "Think again. No one could love you more truly, more devotedly than I shall love you throughout my life. I would give my life to make you happy. Don't discard me hastily. Think—may you not at some time learn to care for me?"

He was excited beyond measure, and did not see the thousand difficulties which stood in the way of the love he asked for.

Alizon hesitated a second. She longed too earnestly for his conversion to wound him; besides, during the last few weeks she felt more kindly towards him.

"It is no use my thinking, Mr. Rutland," she said at length, "even if I—I loved you, I should have to—to destroy my love. The very thought of such a thing would be madness."

"Why?" asked the young man. Now that the ice was broken he felt bolder. Difficulties did not seem so formidable, and his love did not seem foolish.

"Surely you can see yourself?" she said.

"No, I cannot. That is—if you cared for me nothing would be impossible. I could brave anything, overcome everything."

"But, but——"

"You mean the social gulf that lies between us. I am a Nonconformist minister, while you possess an old name. You are, I suppose, rich, and I am poor. No, I had not thought of that. Love would overcome all that. Do you mean that?"

"No," said the girl, "I do not mean that. Such a thing would not have weight with me. I am enough of a Radical to know that neither poverty nor riches can make a gentleman, while I have known men bearing old names who,—but I did not mean that. There is something of more importance than that. Surely you can think."

"No, no—not if you could love me," said Duncan. "You are not one who are carried away with mere surface things. If you cared for me—yes, you would brave the anger of all you hold dear."

"But I could not brave my conscience."

"Your conscience!"

"Yes, my conscience. You forget that. Even if I loved you, I should feel it my duty to crush it, because it would be a sin."

"A sin!"

"Yes. How could it be otherwise? You are an enemy to my faith. Even in Lynford you have made perverts; while in many hearts you have sown the seeds of doubt."

"I see," said Duncan sadly. "You would feel it your duty to repulse me, because from your standpoint I am a heretic."

She did not reply, but walked by his side along the pathway through the fields. Strange to say, he had given no serious attention to this. If it had entered his mind he had dispelled it quickly. To him religious belief was a sacred thing, and while he hated anything which savoured of Sacerdotalism, he had never regarded it in this light.

"But, but, Protestants and Catholics have loved each other, and have—have married," he stammered presently.

"I know it," she said blushing; "neither does the Church absolutely forbid such unions. But to me it would be impossible. From my standpoint you are an unbeliever. Believe me—I do not mean—that is you see how utterly foolish it is for you to——"

"But," and Duncan interrupted her suddenly, and he hardly knew why he uttered the words which sprang to his lips, "suppose this barrier did not exist, suppose I were a Catholic, suppose I could accept your faith in its entirety, what then? Could you ever learn to love me then?"

His eyes burned with a new light, and his voice was husky as he spoke. Alizon looked up into his face, and in spite of herself, her heart grew warm. After all, this man approached her ideal more nearly than any one she had ever met. There was no mistaking his sincerity; she could not gainsay the fact that she admired him greatly. She did not love him. She had never dreamed of him in that light; but why should she not? If he ceased to be a Protestant he might become a barrister, a journalist—a hundred things.

"Tell me!" persisted the young man eagerly, "tell me! This is more to me than you can think."

"Do you doubt your heresy?" cried the girl, "do you feel that you could give it up for me?"

"I could give up anything, everything, for you—except the truth, and my own self-respect," he said. "But tell me, supposing I held your faith—what then?"

"I do not know," said the girl, "I cannot tell. Pardon me, but I wish to be perfectly honest with you. I do not love you. I never dreamed of such a thing. But I believe you to be sincere, and—and if you were true to the faith I hold,—I—I—that is I do not know."

She had confessed more than he had dared to hope. She had not repulsed him entirely. She, the child of one of the oldest families in Lancashire, she who had been surrounded by all the refinements which wealth, culture, and an old name could give, she who, to him, was as far above the people with whom he had associated in all that makes womanliness beautiful, as the sun was above the earth, had listened to his mad declaration, and was still kind.

"God bless you for saying even that," he cried fervently.

"But I can say nothing," replied the girl, "it would be wrong. Oh, please do not mistake me. I am afraid I am ignorant, foolish. But I believe you mean what you say, and no woman can think lightly of such words as those you have spoken!"

She spoke excitedly, almost incoherently, and her words conveyed more to the young man than she really meant.

"God knows," he cried, "that you hold my happiness in the hollow of your hands. Humanly speaking, I live only for you. I never loved a woman before, and I shall never love another. I suppose hundreds of men have said all this, and then have broken their words; but they have never felt what I feel."

"But I can promise nothing," said Alizon, "and—and—if you like, I will say nothing to anyone—that is about what you have said."

The young man did not reply; his eyes rested on the Priory, which was embowered among the trees away in the distance. The sight seemed to cause all sorts of strange thoughts to come into his mind.

"Do you think," said the girl eagerly, "that you ever could change,—that is, your opinions?"

"No, I don't think so," said Duncan quietly.

"No?"

"I think not. I think not. I would do anything in my power even for the vague possibility of winning your love; but I do not think even if you promised to marry me that I could do that."

She looked at him almost angrily, she had hoped from what he had said, that there might be some hope. She had not given him a vestige of hope, and yet her pride was touched.

"Then you will do nothing?" she asked.

"Oh yes! I shall go over every inch of the ground. I shall study all that your best writers and teachers have to say, I shall leave no stone unturned in order to find the truth. Yes, I will confess it; I shall do this because you have not crushed all hope in my heart. I do not see even the vaguest possibility of my becoming a Catholic, but I will learn all that there is to be said in its favour."

"Will you?" cried the girl eagerly. "Will you go and hear our preachers, and attend our retreats? If you will you will see, you will learn, I am sure you will."

"To do what I have promised seems tampering with the truth," said Duncan quietly, "but I will go over the ground again."

"Then you will be converted," cried the girl eagerly. "Oh, if you knew the joy of faith; the utter contentment that it brings. If you could realise what I have felt when I have partaken of the blessed Sacrament, if you could know the joy of being sure that the saints were pleading for you, you would not hesitate a second."

Duncan smiled sadly. From the earnest girl's standpoint, faith was easy; from his, however, all was different. Still her presence made it possible. If such as she were the product of Catholicism, the thing could not be evil.

They walked on together while the birds sang blithely. Even in that smoky part of Lancashire, Nature had clothed herself in her beautiful garments of green, and the air was laden with the perfume of new life. Away in the distance they could see grimy Lynford, but the wind blew away the black volumes of sulphur and smoke, and so they could rejoice in the beauty of God's day.

"Will you not come into the Priory a few minutes?" said Alizon presently. "Father Rit-zoom is still there, and Father Sheen is coming down this evening."

Duncan looked at her questioningly. He felt very sensitive about meeting Lady Neville after the confession he had made.

"Do you know," she went on, "that I should like to regard what you have said to me as unsaid."

"It can never be unsaid," replied Duncan, "and I am glad now that I have dared to tell you what is in my heart."

"What I meant was that nothing more need be said about it. I think I mentioned this some time ago."

"Yes," replied Duncan; "but you have forgotten Lady Neville."

"No, I have not," said Alizon blushing. "I tell my mother everything, but I do not think I need say anything about what you have told me. Let us both agree to—to forget. That is, no one need know."

He looked at her gratefully. He did not understand the purport of the girl's words. He could not realise the forces at work which suggested to her the idea of saying nothing to her mother about his confession. He was glad she had spoken in this way however, because he felt sure that did Lady Neville know she would forbid his entering the Priory again. And yet he would never for a moment have expressed a wish that she might not know everything. The truth was his whole nature was unhinged, and he scarcely realised what was right and what was wrong. As for Alizon, she was more influenced by what had taken place than she realised.

"Yes, I will go with you," he said presently.

"I should like to meet Father Ritzoom again."

During their walk to Alizon's old home, Duncan did not once refer to what had been said; indeed, he spoke but little until they came to Boggart's Clough.

"You saved me from a great deal of rough handling here, Miss Neville," he said, as they stood near the spot where the men had attacked him.

"Please do not refer to it," said the girl, "I am angry with myself every time I think of it."

"Angry with yourself for keeping those men from making——"

"No, for uttering words which led them to do such a thing. But I was terribly angry with you, Mr. Rutland. When I think of what you have done I am still. But you know us better now, don't you?"

"When I think of that night, I remember only your heroism," replied Duncan, "whatever may be the future of my life, I shall always be glad that you were sufficiently interested in my welfare to take a weary journey to save me from harm."

"Oh, but that was nothing. I could not help it," replied the girl.

When they reached the Priory, Lady Neville greeted the young minister kindly. She seemed pleased to see him, and asked him to stay the evening. At first Duncan refused; but when both Alizon and Father Ritzoom seemed anxious for him to stay, he consented. Perhaps Ritzoom had even more to do with his decision than Alizon, for the Jesuit possessed a strange influence. The man always seemed to know more than he professed, his very silence was suggestive of knowledge.

A little later a conversation took place which influenced Duncan more than at that time he realised.

CHAPTER XVII.

IDEAL CATHOLICISM.

FATHER RITZOOM did most of the talking, and on this particular evening he seemed desirous of being agreeable. He showed a side of his nature, too, that he had not hitherto revealed.

During the winter Rutland had worked very hard on behalf of the poor and outcast in the town, and Ritzoom was led to speak about the poverty and want which existed in all the great capitals of Europe. He spoke feelingly too, and revealed a tenderness of which the young minister had not believed him capable.

"The Church has always tried to be a friend to the poor," he said, after many opinions were expressed, "always the friend of every great movement which means the amelioration of the want of the people. Of course, in England we can do but little."

"Why?" asked Rutland.

"First, because we are weak and few, that is comparatively. We have been robbed of our heritage, and our riches have been turned into wrong channels. But still we have hope."

"Hope; for what do you hope?" asked the young minister curiously. He was anxious to see into the mind of this man.

"I suppose you can scarcely understand," said Ritzoom. "You cannot appreciate our attitude. But we of the Catholic Church do not know the meaning of failure."

Rutland could not help smiling.

"You smile because you look at life through a microscope," said the priest. "Life must be seen differently. Truth cannot be learnt by magnifying what lies close to you. You must take a wide outlook. For four thousand years God was preparing the world for the Catholic Church; and before Christ left the world He founded that visible Church on earth. He gave His chosen apostles power, and that power has descended through channels which God Himself appointed. Since then the Church has never changed, never feared, never faltered. Of course, we have been abused, misrepresented, maltreated, but we have gone right on. We have never legislated for a day, a year, a century."

"For what have you legislated then?"

"For Eternity. That is why we have been misunderstood. Had we adapted ourselves to every passing mood we should perchance have prevented discontent; but the final outcome of such a policy would have been calamitous. We are like the God we serve, we live for all time; we think for all ages; we live in the past, the present, and the future. At times it might seem as though we have been defeated, but we have gone straight on, we have worked and planned as though these apparent defeats had never been. Again I say we are like God. God's providence seems at times to be set at naught. The wicked seem to prevail, and the right appear to fail; but God altereth not. That is exactly our attitude. God has told us of what is right, He has given us wisdom, and so we march steadily on. By-and-by, all we hope for will be accomplished."

"And what do you hope for?"

"Hope for?" The Jesuit rose from his chair and began to pace to and fro in the room. "Hope for! Our hope is to see the world one vast Theocracy. Even as the Jewish nation had at one time no king but God, so the world of which the Jewish nation was a type will have God as its supreme King. This is His will. He founded His Church. He appointed St. Peter as its head, and that headship has continued ever since in the successors of Peter. Sometimes those successors have been bad men, but their virtue has been not in themselves, but in their office. The man is but little, the office is everything. In a sense the Pope is not a man, he is the vicegerent of God. We do not think of Leo XIII, as Cardinal Pecchi, as the successor of St. Peter. He is God's chosen instrument; thus when he speaks of faith or morals, he speaks as God, not as man. Well now, think. Ever since the first Pope the Church has been one. There have been heresies and schisms without number, but the Church itself has remained united. At some periods of its history it has seemed to be on the point of gaining all its desires. Notably when Gregory VII., the great Hildebrand, lived; but after his time came great reverses, and power seemed to be slipping from us. But it was only seeming. The power has always remained. By-and-by all the world will be the Church. There will be no heresy, for the Church will be one; there will be no discord, for all the members will be united in its Great Head; there will be no poverty, for the Church, having all power, will make such a thing impossible. Kings will exist; but they will be appointed by God. Governors will still be, but they will be governed by God. All will be God's, for all will be united in His Great Church, the Church which is God's will be manifested in the world."

"SHE WAS LOOKING TOWARD A FIGURE OF THE

"But has this existed where the Church has had supreme power?" queried Duncan.

Ritzoom did not notice Rutland's interrogation. Instead, he paced the room excitedly.

"That is why the Church has never known race or country," he went on; "that is why she has regarded herself greater than governments, kings, or emperors. They are but for a day, the Church is for ever. Don't you see this? What is your idea of a Church here in this country? You have the Church of England. What a miserable limitation! The Church of England—the Church of a race of a few millions of men and women. We know nothing of such limitations. The Catholic Church is not the Church of Italy, or Spain, or Austria, or France. It is the Church of the world. Our priests are not English priests, or Italian priests; they are Catholic priests. All of them belong to one great army under one great Head. No matter what nation a man may visit, the Catholic Church is still the same, the services never change. We have our regiments, our battalions, our companies; we have our Orders whereby we can utilise various classes of minds and dispositions. For example, I am a Jesuit, then we have Franciscans, Dominicans, Capuchins, Trappists, Passionists, just as you have different regiments in one great army; but our marching orders are all the same, our faith is the same, we are all part of the great body of the Church. We always have been from the day Christ rose from the dead, we always shall be till the last trump shall sound."

"You have painted a fine picture," said Rutland, "but let us examine it a little closer. Let us analyse what you have said."

"Oh, of course you will do that; but nothing comes of it. You cannot analyse Providence, you cannot analyse sunlight. If you try to do this, you are no wiser at the end of your analysis than at the beginning. To tell you the truth, I am sick of all these analyses. They only end in confusion and discord. Just see what all the discussions of the Church have resulted in. Disunion, petty sects, squabbling. Think of the religious life of England. Here you have hosts of sects. Suppose you have a man who wants to find faith. What authority have you? What have you to tell him? The Episcopal Church says one thing, the Methodists another, the Baptists another. None of the sects can say, 'We know.' Thus the man may spend his life in asking questions, and be no wiser in the end than at the beginning. But suppose a man comes to us. We have the authority of God, we speak with certainty, and all our priests speak as one. We have no Acts of Parliament formulating our creeds, because we are above Acts of Parliament. We have our times of seeming failure; but we go on all the same, and by and by all the sects will come to us, and yield allegiance to God; all the nations will become part of the great Church, and then at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow."

Ritzoom spoke with great earnestness. His face became as pale as death, and his great, square features seemed to grow in ruggedness and power. His eyes flashed brightly, his voice quivered with passion. In spite of himself, Rutland was moved by what the priest had said. Somehow he felt that the man was greater than the words he had uttered. He made them mean more than most men would be able to make them mean. He inspired Duncan's imagination, he made the young minister see what he wanted him to see, he led him to forget what he wanted him to forget. At that moment the Catholic Church appeared to Duncan as Ritzoom intended it should, a mighty army, all united, and led by God Himself; while the Protestant Churches seemed few, and weak, and discordant, quarrelling with each other instead of doing the work of God.

"Forgive me," said Ritzoom when he had finished, "I have been very rude, very thoughtless. I ought not to have forgotten myself in such a way; but somehow I could not help myself. I spoke before I knew what I was doing. And now to atone for my misdoing I will not say another word on the subject."

So the conversation came to an end. It ceased just as Ritzoom intended it should cease, and then they chatted on general subjects.

"It has been a strange day," thought Duncan, as he sat in his study that night. "I feel as though I had been dreaming. I have told Alizon Neville that I love her, and she has not been angry, and I have promised her that I will study all those doctrines which, as a Protestant, I do not believe. Ah, but that was a wonderful picture that Ritzoom drew. I wonder now, I wonder if I have misjudged Catholicism. Oh, but it would be grand if the world was a great Theocracy. Fancy all the nations of the world uniting in one great Church, the Church which has existed from the time of Christ. Ah! if it only could be!"

He sat far into the night thinking of what Ritzoom had said, and he pondered long over what his words suggested. After all, it was a beautiful picture, a grand ideal to strive after. It seemed so easy to believe just then; all the more easy, although, perhaps, he did not think of it, because the only condition on which Alizon Neville could ever accept his love was that he should accept her faith.

"I'll do as I said," he concluded at length, "I'll go over the whole ground again—and then——," but he could not conclude his thought.

And yet even the very possibility of Alizon Neville loving him was to him joy beyond words. He thought of her as she bade him good-night; her eyes shining, her lips wreathed with smiles, a perfect type of a pure, cultured, English girl. And if he could become a Catholic, he might win her for his wife. True, she had made no promises; but she had given him a ray of hope. She had been kind to him; she had invited him to the Priory even after he had made his declaration; she had even suggested that what he had said should be regarded as a secret between them.

For a moment he almost hated the thought of what he had said in the Industrial Hall; he felt almost sorry that he had unsettled the minds of some of the faithful Catholics.

Then his strong common-sense asserted itself, and his critical faculties demanded attention. He remembered the arguments he had used, and he saw the fallacies of Father Ritzoom's words. No, no, he could not accept this superstition, he could not consent to become a mere machine accepting the findings of other men. After all, this talk about the unity of the Church was a baseless dream,—that is as Ritzoom understood it. Neither was he sure that uniformity of opinion was a good thing. Men must, if they would be true to the gifts of God, fight out their beliefs for themselves.

Still Ritzoom influenced him. His presence and his words that night left their impress upon him, and Rutland was not quite the same afterwards.

"I have promised to go down again in three days," he thought. "I wonder whether I ought to go? I am like a moth around a candle. It is madness for me to love her, still I must go. Let me see—what have I on Thursday? I remember now. It is the Congress of our Churches in this district. Yes, I can manage it. The meetings will be over about seven o'clock and afterwards I can go down for a quiet evening."

When Thursday came Duncan made his way to one of the large rooms in connection with Tudor Church, for a meeting of the ministers and workers of the various churches belonging to his denomination in the district had arranged to meet there. The young fellow had looked forward to the day with considerable pleasure. He hoped to meet with several of his old College friends, and anticipated their conversation concerning the spiritual condition of the churches with eagerness. Somehow, too, his conversation with Alison Neville had made him able to work. Things did not appear so meaningless, so hopeless. The sun shone brightly, for Lynford, and as the wind drove the smoke away from the part of the town in which he lived, the air was clear and healthy. On the Tuesday and Wednesday, therefore, he had laboured long and steadily. From half-past eight in the morning until half-past one he had sat at his study desk, and from half-past two to six he had visited his flock, from half-past seven until ten at night he had attended meetings, and then each night until midnight he had remained in his study reading.

By Thursday morning, therefore, he had thought out his Sunday's sermons, and although he had not as yet written them, he had gathered his material; he had also made something like twenty calls, so that he felt quite free to devote the day to the meeting which was to be held at Tudor.

When he entered the room he found that a number of men had gathered. They were the ministers and officers of some sixty churches situated within a radius of thirty or forty miles of Lynford. At this spring gathering, the custom of this Congress was to consider the condition of the churches, and to suggest means for extending Christianity in the district.

After a few minutes of general handshaking and friendly greeting, the meeting commenced. After singing and prayer the minutes of a previous meeting were held, and then the statistics of the district were read. A great deal of attention was paid to this, and most of the members present took careful notes of what was read. Finally, the secretary of the meeting gave the exact totals. As the result of the year's labours of sixty ministers, scores of officials, and hundreds of Sunday School teachers, visitors, and general workers, there was a nett increase of one hundred and forty-five members in the churches. This was regarded to be on the whole a fairly satisfactory result, and a resolution was framed expressing thankfulness for the prosperity which had attended the efforts which had been put forth.

It was the first meeting of the sort which Duncan had ever attended, and as a consequence he was much interested. He listened to the speeches of the ministers, who spoke with great earnestness on the report, and weighed what had been said.

Presently someone asked the secretary to give them the position of the churches ten years before, so that they might consider their progress in that time. The result of this was by no means inspiring. There had been an increase of one church in the district, but the membership was practically the same as it had been then. And yet during that period the population of the district had increased by leaps and bounds. The churches of that particular denomination were practically at a standstill, instead of growing with the growth of the people.

Then someone asked for reasons for this apparent stagnation; and many unpleasant disclosures took place. In some of the churches there had been internal discord. One minister declared that his church had not prospered because a faction of the people had been against him, and had tried to undo all the good he was doing. Others, again, said that a worldly spirit was creeping over the people; and that while prayer meetings were badly attended, concerts and popular entertainments attracted the multitude. The discussion lasted for about two hours, at the end of which time Duncan was feeling very uncomfortable. He could not help seeing that discussions of this nature had been taking place every year, and that there was very little practical outcome of all that was said. Some of the churches, he gathered, had succeeded, but the failure of others had caused the general increase to be but very small. He asked himself why this was so? Money was not wanting, for the trade of the district was prosperous, workers seemed plentiful, the streets were swarming with people, and yet the Gospel of Christ seemed to make no headway.

He listened to the suggestions of the members of the meeting, and they seemed to him poor and small. The outlook of these men was limited, they did not appear to have large ideals. The thought of Christianising the whole people, of saving the whole community, did not seem to possess them. And more than all this, the note of denominationalism was constantly struck. The great desire was evidently not so much the extension of Christianity, as the extension of denominationalism. To Duncan denominationalism was but a secondary matter. A denomination was but a medium through which Christianity might be extended. Doubtless there was no one in the meeting but who would say the same, and yet the main anxiety of many appeared to be concerning the medium through which the work was done, rather than the work itself. They dwelt on petty trifles, too, and little personalities were discussed rather than vital principles. Now and then some man, possessing a great soul, lifted the discussion to a higher platform, and dealt with large issues; but immediately after some little man got up and aired his grievances, thus dragging spiritual realities into the dust of petty strife.

In spite of himself, Duncan could not help comparing these speeches with the words of Father Ritzoom. How poor all this was compared with the great scheme of the Catholics! They did not discuss numbers in this way; their idea was the uplifting of the whole world; they desired to make all nations into a vast Theocracy. After all, weren't all these churches a mere rope of sand? Where was the unitedness, the joining together for a mighty work?

He saw that laymen spoke with the same authority as ministers, he saw that the opinions of some of the ministers were regarded as of but little value. Was not the sacerdotal idea a fine one after all? According to Father Ritzoom, the ministers were a special body of men, given especial power and especial authority by God Himself. Was there not something in the idea? If it were so, then they could speak with authority and power. They were not so many infants crying in the night, but members of the body of Christ to whom He gave especial guidance, special wisdom.

Besides, the denomination to which he belonged was, compared with the Catholic Church, only of yesterday. A few centuries ago they were unknown, while far back, before England was a nation, the Catholic Church, knowing nothing of countries or governments, went on doing its grand work.

Among his brother ministers, moreover, he found doubt, unrest, uncertainty; one man disagreed with another on points of doctrine, and both spoke falteringly; with the ancient Church, on the other hand, there was no doubt, no unrest. Their doctrines had been defined by the Council of Trent hundreds of years back, and no change took place from year to year. It was true there was what was called "the development of doctrine," and consequently the dogmas of "Papal Infallibility," and the "Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary" had become established. But then, these dogmas had been decided upon by those who claimed to be God's appointed ministers, those to whom the Holy Spirit had promised wisdom.

Would it not be grand to be freed from all this weary searching after truth, to rest on the bosom of an infallible Church, and do her work without questioning? Besides, if the Catholics were right, if God had through Christ established one Church, and one Church only, which was to be the Church of the world, and if this Church existed as an organic body, demanding certain conditions, then they were outside its pale, they were heretics.

He must think about it, the whole matter must be investigated to the very foundation. In the past he had read Catholic History from the rationalists' standpoint; in the future he would see what the Catholics themselves had to say on their claims and their history. If there was a true Church apart from all the wrangling sects of the world, and if only that Church had Divine authority, he would like to join it. He would read Newman's "Apoloogia Pro Vita Sua" again.

At one o'clock the District Congress rose for dinner, and Duncan was struck with the hilarity which existed. They had evidently forgotten their comparative failure, and now settled down to enjoyment. After dinner a few returned to the meeting, while a number went for a walk among the hills, and did not return until the afternoon was far spent. Duncan spent his time with those who attended to the business of the day, and afterwards asked himself what good he had done by so doing. The discussion was mostly about the issue of certain schedules, some arguing that they should be sent out on April 30th, while others declared that May 15th would be quite soon enough. The matter of these schedules took about an hour, after which the meeting spent its time in appointing committees, and hearing reports concerning certain institutions. At six o'clock the meeting was declared closed, and the members joined in the schoolroom for tea. Thus ended the day's work.

On reviewing matters afterwards, he reflected that after all he did not see how things could be altered much, and he knew that many of these ministers were doing good work in their churches, while forces were at work which could not be tabulated, and which were doing untold good. What troubled him was that no great effort was set on foot to save the community as a whole—that the sympathies of the meeting were rather denominational than universal.

After the members of the meeting had departed to their various homes, he wended his way towards the Priory. On his way he passed a chapel at which an entertainment was being held. He looked in, and saw about two hundred people present. They were listening to songs and recitations which were supposed to be of a very entertaining nature. The audience was laughing and clapping loudly, evidently the entertainment was popular. The singers and reciters used the rostrum for a platform.

"Is there not reason in the idea that a church should be a sacred place?" thought the young man. "Is it right that the house of God should be used for penny entertainments? I am told that the officers allow minstrels in some of the chapels."

A little later he reached the Priory. On asking for Lady Neville, he was told that all the family was in the chapel, where a Retreat was being held. Lady Neville had left word that she would be glad if he would wait in the library, or if he would prefer she should be pleased if he would come to the chapel.

"I will go to the chapel," said Duncan, taking a sudden resolution. "I suppose Father Ritzoom is conducting it."

"Yes, sir."

A minute later he entered the chapel.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE MAN AND THE WOMAN.

How quiet and still everything was. How different from the noisy entertainment he had just witnessed. An air of sanctity pervaded the place. All the members of the household, and a few invited friends were on their knees, and in silence, and in deep thoughtfulness, they were offering their devotions. He looked towards Alizon. Her eyes were wide open, and she was looking towards a figure of the Virgin Mary. But in reality he was sure she looked beyond it. Her face was as pure as that of a vestal virgin, her eyes were luminous, and filled with a holy light. There was no apparent excitement, no noise,—all was reverent, everything was filled with the spirit of worship. For a second he felt like kneeling down with them, he felt sure it would be helpful after the experiences of the day. After the discussions to which he had listened, discussion on petty trifles, there was something beautiful in the thought of kneeling before the figure of the Virgin and meditating on the great work of her Son. And yet something kept him from doing so. After all it did not appeal to his deepest nature. All these crucifixes and figures were only attempts to materialise spiritual truths, and the very materialisation struck a false note. Besides, he remembered what all these things led to.

He saw Ritzoom at the altar, clothed in gorgeous vestments. This man professed miraculous power. He claimed that he could change bread and wine into the very body and blood of Jesus Christ. Again a false note was struck; there was nothing suggestive of this in reading the Gospels, or the Epistles. And yet the atmosphere was laden with the spirit of worship, and he almost envied the worshippers, who, without a doubt, could enter into the ecstasy of the moment. The air was filled with the odour of incense, the light which shone through the coloured glass lit up the little chapel in such a way that everything seemed glorified. That the worshippers were sincere he did not doubt; but, then, so were Mohammedans, Buddhists, Shakers, ay, every religionist of the world. Besides the atmosphere was spiritually exotic. There was no fresh, exhilarating, open-air feeling about it. There was nothing that nerved him to go out and fight with the devil, but something which might lead one to say, "Let us take refuge in a cloister, let us shut out the hard, unsympathetic world."

Presently Father Ritzoom rose to speak. His tones were soft and impressive. He appeared to be awed by his surroundings, and deeply impressed by the truths he wished to enforce. He explained certain points in the spiritual exercises they had been undertaking, and then gave certain advice as to their future conduct.

Rutland gathered that this was the closing hour of the Retreat, which had lasted for three days, and so everything tended to make the hour impressive. The priest urged upon the worshippers certain functions, and recommended certain aids by which their spiritual life would be benefited. He spoke of fasting, of contemplating the agony of Christ, of daily mass, and voluntary penance. Spoken to the few women who had spent long hours in vigil, his words undoubtedly seemed as the very words of God, but again Duncan felt that an artificial note was struck. All these suggestions appeared to the young man as mere palliatives, mere mechanical appliances which could have no abiding value. They made life poor and small. They wanted that grand ring which those great words of Christ contained. How different was this talk about penance, from that sublime saying of Jesus, "I came that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly." After all, these ceremonials of the priest as he brought the Retreat to a close was only playing with religion. It did not touch root principles.

Still, he was impressed, and thought within himself that possibly these exercises must be helpful to women, or how could they produce such a lovely character as that of Alizon Neville. Besides, did not Newman, (and Newman, according to Gladstone, and even Froude, possessed one of the finest minds which the century had produced), accept all dogmas and exercises of the Papacy en bloc? Yes, he must certainly read Newman again.

He left the little chapel before the others, and waited outside while the others came out. When Alizon Neville appeared she was like one who had just been awakened out of sleep. Her eyes had lost the far-off look which he had seen in the chapel, she was like one dazed. He had seen people coming to consciousness after being in a mesmeric trance, and the young girl suggested this to him. She barely spoke to him as she passed. Lady Neville, on the other hand, was perfectly calm and collected, and welcomed him heartily.

The evening was spent very quietly. There was no joking, no merriment. They were apparently still under the influence of their devotions. When ten o'clock came Duncan announced his intention of leaving, and Ritzoom asked for the pleasure of walking part of the way home with him. To Duncan's surprise the Jesuit spoke no direct word about religion. Instead he related some of his experiences in various countries. After they had separated, the young minister could recollect but very little that the priest had said, and yet he felt conscious that an impression was made upon him. The feeling that impressed him was concerning the immensity of the Catholic Church. In every way it was great. Its history was the history of nearly nineteen centuries. It was represented everywhere. Its influence had been felt ever since Christ left the earth. He remembered, too, the calm assurance with which Ritzoom spoke. He seemed to regard Catholicism as an irresistible power. Men might protest against it, they might disregard it, but it mattered not. It was marching on to victory.

Duncan did not go to the Priory for another week. During that time he worked constantly. From early morning till late at night he toiled. He marked out the duties of each day carefully, and executed them all without fail. On the following Sunday, too, he preached with great power, and yet the congregation felt that there was something unreal in his words. There was a note of asceticism and austerity in his sermons, different from the ordinary positive ring of his messages. Still, no particular attention was paid to it, for no one knew of the thoughts which were passing through his mind.

On arriving at the Priory, he was met with the news that Father Ritzoom was leaving the next day; he had already spent more time than he had intended in the district, and while he had been able to do a great deal of necessary work while there, he was obliged to return to Ireland at once. He hoped, however, to visit them again through the summer. He was exceedingly pleasant in his conversation, and Rutland could not help but admire the ease and fluency with which he spoke. As far as the young minister could judge, Alizon Neville was sad and ill-at-ease, still she was kind, while Lady Neville continued to be very gracious.

While at the Priory he was under the influence which always impressed him while there. There was a stately grandeur about the place. Everything was free from the utilitarianism which pervaded Lynford, there was something in the atmosphere which made him think that these people lived in a world different from his own. He felt that he certainly must modify his views concerning the outcome of the Catholic religion. No one could go to such a house constantly without realising the beautiful spirit that pervaded it. And yet he was no nearer being a Catholic than the first day on which he had met her, at least he thought so, and when he left the house, he felt that a great gulf was fixed between him and Alizon Neville which could never be bridged across.

"Well, and what do you think of Mr. Duncan now?" asked Lady Neville of Ritzoom, when the door had been closed behind the young minister.

"Oh, he is a fine young fellow!" replied Ritzoom blandly, "I have not altered my opinion in the slightest."

"But do you still regard him as a possible convert?"

"Certainly," replied the Jesuit. "I am not in the habit of doubting after I have once made up my mind."

"But still he does not seem to draw nearer to us," said her ladyship sadly.

"You think not?"

"Do you?"

"His heresy had taken deeper root than I had thought, that is all," replied Ritzoom. "You need have no fear. In less than a year he will have bent his neck to the Church."

"I wish I could see some evidence of it," responded her ladyship.

Ritzoom turned his eyes towards Alizon, and saw that she was listening intently. He fully believed that Duncan had declared his love for her, and once or twice had almost made up his mind to question the young girl whether it was not so. Something in her eyes however had forbidden him, for he remembered that he was not her confessor, and that she was not one to brook interference.

"We have at least this evidence, Lady Neville," replied the Jesuit. "Never since he has been in the habit of coming here has he uttered one word against our Church. Surely that is something. Besides, all that pronounced Protestantism has gone. The influence of this home has been greater than you imagine. The seeds we have sown have begun to germinate, and soon they will spring up and bear fruit. Already he is dissatisfied with the dry bones of Protestantism."

"Are you sure?"

"Perfectly sure. He is not the kind of fellow who tells everything he feels. But he is wading through deep waters. We have made him feel the majesty, the unity, the great oneness of our Church. He has begun to think of the Divine authority of her priests, and soon he will follow in Newman's steps."

"You think he will cease to be a Protestant then?"

"He will first of all resign his position as minister of Tudor Chapel."

"And then——?"

"Ah, that is in God's hands, Lady Neville. But you need not fear. I have lent him many books, and I have told him some necessary truths: but these will not be the greatest factors in his conversion."

"No; what then?"

"You, Lady Neville, you and Alizon," and he looked at the latter keenly.

The girl blushed deeply, and Ritzoom was sure that all his surmises were correct.

"Explain, Father Ritzoom," said her ladyship.

"Such a home as this, such influences as yours, these by God's grace will melt his heart. It is not his brain to which we must appeal so much as to his heart, his emotions. Let him feel the tenderness of a Catholic home, let him realise how you yearn for his conversion."

Lady Neville was silent.

"I do not suggest that you should do anything but pray for him, and make him feel the beauty of a Catholic home," said the Jesuit. "That is all. God's grace will do the rest. When I come again there will be a greater change manifested. His conversion has taken longer than I anticipated; but you need not fear, it will take place. Let him think of this place as a home, and all will be well."

"You think you will be able to visit us again in September?"

"Yes, I hope so. Meanwhile, be very kind to him, both of you. And have no fear of results. On the day when he shall stand up in the Industrial Hall and make his confession, you will feel repaid a thousand-fold for your kindness. For his conversion will be the forerunner of hundreds more."

"Yes," said Ritzoom, as he left Lynford the next day, and looked out upon its numberless chimneys, "yes, I need not fear. I have failed sometimes. I failed with Lancaster, sadly failed; and Jack Gray is but a poor Jesuit; he ought rather to have been a Passionist; but I shall not fail this time. When Rutland is converted, I shall have an interview with the Holy Father, and when he hears of numbers flocking to the Church in this centre of Nonconforming Protestantism, he will look on me with more favour than ever. It will take some months yet, but all is well. The girl will be the great factor, I can see it plainly, but I have done my part, although he is not conscious that I have done anything. I must try to visit the Priory in September. After all, Sheen's folly will turn out well."

At the very hour that the Jesuit was thinking out his plans for Rutland's conversion, the young man sat in his study fighting with his own heart. His love for Alison Neville grew stronger day by day, while in spite of his Protestant training, he could not help being bewildered by what he had seen and heard. Father Ritzoom had made him realise the lack of unity that existed in Protestantism, had led him to feel that no Protestant minister could speak with the authority of a Catholic priest. But, then, was there any reality in these Sacerdotal claims? Of what good were pretensions unless they could be substantiated? He thought over these questions for many days.

"No," he said at length, "I must kill my love for Alison Neville. I cannot be a Catholic, I simply cannot. Even if she would marry me, such a union would be madness. No, no, I must give her up."

This resolution, which he had failed to keep before, appeared to him again as his only hope. And yet the thought of its fulfilment seemed like death. His love held him entirely.

"One thing I can and will do," he determined at length, "I will abstain from going near the Priory. Even if I am invited there I will refuse. I will do all in my power to shut her out of my heart. But I will continue reading on the subject. I have promised that. I will get at the bottom of all those books which Ritzoom lent me. I will study the forces which led such a man as Newman to change his mind."

Poor Rutland! he found it very hard to carry out his resolution. His heart simply ached to go down to the Priory and see the face of the girl for whom he would gladly lay down his life. And after all, why could he not be a Catholic? Catholics held all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and they had kept the lamp of faith burning in the darkest ages of the world's history. Was it not more likely that Newman and Manning should be right than he? Oh, to be able to take the step, to give up all anxious thought and be at rest!

A month passed away, and he never once saw the face of Alison Neville. Then a letter reached him, asking him to a small garden party of personal friends. June had now come, and the woods around the Priory were covered with their mantle of green. The flowers were blooming, and the air was warm and balmy. Why should he not go? It would be heaven to meet her. He read Lady Neville's letter again, and noted that only a few friends would be there. Perhaps Alison would walk alone with him among the woods, perhaps—perhaps—

"No, it is madness, madness," he cried aloud; then he seized a pen, and thanked Lady Neville for her kindness, but told her that it was impossible for him to come. Another month passed away, and then his resolution was put to a still stronger test. He met Alison and her ladyship one day as they were driving across the moors whither he had gone for a walk.

"You are a great stranger," said her ladyship. "Why have you forsaken your friends?"

Duncan said he had been working night and day, and this was true, but as he knew, it was not the reason he had not visited the Priory.

"But surely you could spare us an hour," she said, "we have been expecting you. Haven't we, Alison?"

"Yes," replied the girl, and the young man's heart felt like bursting as he saw the colour mount her fresh young face.

"We shall begin to think we have offended you. Have we?"

"Offended me!" cried Duncan. "No! no! Anything but that! But really, I have been very busy, and very much worried."

"Worried?" queried her ladyship, with a touch of real kindness in her voice. "I am so sorry. But perhaps a day's freedom from your work and thoughts will help you. Everything is quiet at the Priory now. Come down for a day soon, will you?"

"Thank you," cried Duncan, and his voice was husky. "You are very kind. I should like it above all things, but——"

"No, I shall have no buts; let me see, to-day is Saturday. Well, we shall expect you on Monday. That is settled now."

And before he was able to answer the carriage was a dozen yards away.

"Oh I should like to go, but I cannot, I dare not," he cried, "I should only have to fight all this over again!"

When he reached his lodgings he wrote a letter to her ladyship expressing his sincerest thanks for her great kindness, but told her that his mind was so torn with conflicting doubts, that he was altogether unfit for society.

And so he tried to drive Alizon Neville from his mind. Ever since Ritzoom had left Lynford, he threw himself with more ardour than ever into his work. Indeed, so constantly did he labour that his health began to suffer. Although it was now summer, the season of the year when much of the especial work of the winter was abandoned, he inaugurated new schemes, and threw himself into them with such ardour that even those who had been opposed to him confessed, "that Rutland was a rare lad after all." But those who cared for him most grew anxious. They saw his cheeks grow paler and thinner, while his eyes appeared to grow larger, and to shine with an unnatural light.

"Thou'lt kill thyself," said they kindly, "shut off steam a bit, lad, an' tak' it easy."

But this Rutland was unable to do, for he felt that not only his duty, but his real salvation lay in the direction of work.

During August he heard that Lady Neville and Alizon had left the Priory, and he yielded to the desire of the church officers to take a rest. Accordingly he went to Blackpool, the popular resort of the Lancashire operatives; but he only stayed a few days. He could not bear the crush of people, he had no sympathy with the noisy amusements. Accordingly he returned to his work at the end of August, and continued his labours.

When September came matters reached a crisis. He was out walking one Monday afternoon, feeling very weary after his Sunday's services, when he saw Alizon Neville coming towards him. It was now a year since he had settled at Lynford, and he was trying to think of the progress the Church had made since his advent. After all, his work had been abundantly blessed. The regular congregation had been practically doubled, and every department of church work had been strengthened and invigorated. He then tried to think of how the work could be further extended during the winter, and sketched some plans which he intended to bring before the congregation on the following Sunday. His ideas were all dispelled, however, when he saw Alizon. His hands began to tremble, and his cheeks were flushed with an unhealthy colour.

"Mr. Rutland," said the girl, "you look ill."

"Do I?" he replied, "I think I am all right."

"The people in the town say you are working yourself to death," she said anxiously. "I hear, too, that you have practically refused to take a holiday."

"I could not bear to be idle," he replied.

"But you should compel yourself. Lynford cannot afford to lose you."

"I am not sure," he replied somewhat cynically. "People have short memories. If I were to die they would give me a decent burial, and then forget me in six months."

"That is not fair to the people," she replied.

"No?" he said, looking into her face. He thought he saw her lips tremble, and then all his resolutions went to the wind. While he was absent from her he was strong, but in her presence he was powerless.

"Will you let me walk home with you?" he said almost humbly.

"Yes, come down to the Priory," said the girl, "my mother will be delighted to see you."

They were standing on a foot-path a mile from the Priory, but were still close to the woods which surrounded the house.

"Let us go by the private path through the woods," she continued, and she led the way. A few minutes later they were walking together beneath the tall elms.

"Why do you work so hard?" she said presently.

"I have been trying to drive you out of my mind."

Alizon blushed a rosy red.

"When we were last together some months ago," he continued, "I told you that I loved you. You gave me but little hope, and you said that even if you cared for me you should regard your—your interest in me as a sin while I remained a Protestant."

"Yes," said Alizon quietly.

"Well, I love you more than ever. I cannot kill it. I have tried to. That is the reason I have not accepted Lady Neville's kind invitations."

"Then you are still a Protestant?"

"Yes, yes. I—I cannot be untrue to myself, even for you."

For a moment the girl forgot the part she was playing in his life. She thought only of his conversion to her faith.

"But have you read the books Father Ritzoom lent you?"

"Oh, yes," he replied with a bitter laugh.

"And they have not convinced you?"

"Convinced me! No, they have not convinced me."

"But would you—that is, do you desire to——"

"God forgive me, Miss Alizon, I would give anything to accept your faith. Oh, I wish it were reasonable—for then I should hope that I could win you. I would do anything, everything for even the hope of winning you; but I cannot be a liar to God!"

"Have you read Newman?"

"Yes."

"His 'Apologia'?"

"Oh, yes."

"Then surely, if he, the greatest thinker of the century, could yield to Rome, you could——"

"Forgive me for interrupting you," said Duncan. "I am tired of this talk about Newman being the greatest thinker of the century. I commenced to read his 'Apologia Pro Vita Sua' with that idea. I suppose my opinion is heresy; but I cannot help it. A more unconvincing, a weaker book, I never read. It could never convince any thinking man. I wanted to be convinced—for your sake. I tried to see as he saw. I read his celebrated tracts; I hungered to enter into his frame of mind. But it was impossible. People call him a philosopher. I have understood that a philosopher always sees to it that he has first of all a sure basis for his conclusions. Newman conceived a certain idea of the Church, and then drew certain conclusions from it. But Newman's conception of a Church is poor, artificial, childish. He was simply playing with religion all along the line. To him it is a poor, shrivelled little caste, governed by arbitrary rules. I will admit that there is a great deal of clever sophistry; but there is no broadness of outlook, no greatness of conception. Why, think of his protest at the time the Bishop of Jerusalem was appointed. He protested against a Bishop giving the sacrament to Lutherans and Calvinists without an examination of their beliefs, when the strength of religious life in Europe has largely sprung from the work of Luther. He deals with paltry issues. His idea of faith seems to be the acceptance of certain views on little details which have no more to do with real religion than the ribbons on your dress. Excuse me, Miss Neville, but Newman would drive me to Agnosticism rather than to faith. I could not believe in an Omnipotent God and Newman's teaching at the same time."

"Ah! but," said the girl sadly, "you have never yet seen our Church as it really is. You look from the outside."

"Where shall I go to see it?" asked Rutland.

"Oh, I am sure," she went on, "that if you could see it where it was all powerful you would be convinced. Here in Lynford we are but an alien church. Our people are mostly poor and uncouth. But if you could see the Church in Rome—then all would be different."

Rutland went on a few minutes without speaking, then he burst out eagerly,

"But can you not care for me as I am? For I do love you, I do love you!"

"It would be sin for me to think of you in the way you wish, Mr. Rutland, while you are engaged in the work of spreading heresy."

"But if I could be a Catholic—then? Could you love me then?"

"I—I don't know. I regard you very highly—now; but I don't know. Perhaps I might."

"And—and——"

"No, Mr. Rutland, I cannot say more. Perhaps

I have said too much now. But surely if you love me as you say you do—you could— Oh, Mr. Rutland, you make everything impossible. You—you do not try!"

There were tears in her eyes, and Rutland saw them. Both of them were excited beyond measure, and scarcely knew what they were saying. They were both young, and the girl could not help being influenced by the passion in the young man's words.

"Try, try!" cried Rutland. "God knows I am trying. But give me some word of hope!" He grasped her hand and held it tightly.

"I do not know," she cried, "I do not know. I—I wish I could—that is—even if I were able, even if I loved you, I would destroy it though it killed me, rather than commit the sin of being untrue to my faith."

"Then there can be no hope for me while I am a Protestant!"

"No, no, I dare not. It would be sin, deadly sin."

"Sin to love a man who was trying to do his duty, to do right!" he cried. He dropped her hand. "I am a fool," he continued bitterly. "You never can care for me, you could not under any circumstances, you could not if I were of your faith."

"Oh, do not say that!" she cried. All her caution was gone. She forgot the difference in their positions. She was a woman, and he was a man, and that was all. "I—I could, I believe I—I could not help myself if it were not a sin!"

"But otherwise?"

"Oh, I could not, I dare not. Don't be cruel!"

He caught her hand again, and held it tightly.

"God help me!" he cried, and then he left her without a word.

A fortnight later he was lying on his bed with brain fever, brought on, the doctor said, by overwork and worry. For days his life hung in a balance, and even when the danger was over his recovery was slow, so slow that it was not until after Christmas that he was able to walk about.

"You must leave Lynford for the rest of the winter," said the doctor, when he had reached this stage.

"Where must I go?" he asked.

"Oh, southward. To Nice, Algiers, Cairo."

"Would Rome do?"

"Yes, splendidly."

"Then I will go there."

He gave no reasons for this decision; but a fortnight later he was on his way to the Eternal City, little dreaming of what lay before him.

REV. W. SANDERSON'S COTTAGE, KIRTON LINDSEY.

Men Worth Remembering.

V.—REV. WILLIAM SANDERSON. (Continued.)

BY THE REV. JESSE ASHWORTH.

E now pass on to the period of Mr. Sanderson's retirement from active circuit work. At the Sheffield Conference of 1852 he was very reluctantly compelled to seek superannuation; this was on the ground of an affliction in his legs and feet which rendered walking both difficult and painful. "No quired ministers, as it was humorously said, with "good understandings,"—good walking powers, to be equal to the long journeys they had to take, often on very rugged roads.

While thus unable to perform journeys on foot, his voice retained all its compass, sweetness and music; hence, Mr. Sanderson, for the first thirteen years of his superannuation, was made a great blessing to many parts of the Connexion, by preaching anniversary sermons and taking special services. He invariably attracted large congregations, and it must have been a great source of joy and delight to himself that he was thus enabled to promote spiritual and financial objects.

In this happy and successful way Mr. Sanderson continued to exercise his gifts until the summer of 1865, when he left home to pay his annual visit to the North of England. These visits were highly appreciated by himself as seasons of continued usefulness, and were eagerly anticipated by a very large circle of admiring friends. He reached Gurney Villa, in the Darlington Circuit, on the Saturday afternoon, and in the evening addressed a meeting in a large tent. The following morning he preached again, with his usual ability and power, from Ps. xxxvii. 37, "Mark the perfect man," etc. Mr. Robson, of Darlington, who was present, doubt," says his biographer, "this affliction was greatly accelerated, if not wholly caused by the long and exhaustive journeys, slender means for providing riding accommodation, and great self-denial. He evidently brought to the Connexion a vigorous and healthy constitution, yet the affliction overtook him when in the fulness of his ministerial efficiency. In his own quaint way he would say, that 'his going part was defective, but his striking part was as good as ever.'" Had such an affliction occurred to Mr. Sanderson at the present day, numbers of suitable circuits could have been found for him; but the state of things was vastly different fifty years ago. Then most circuits regraphically described to the writer what followed. "Several of us," he said, "proceeded to a friend's house to dinner after the morning service. Mr. Sanderson was requested to ask a blessing; he rose and spread his hands as usual. We waited; we looked; but not a word could he utter. We soon perceived that he had had a stroke of paralysis which had temporarily taken away his power of speech. We were all very deeply affected at seeing the great and sudden change from what we had so recently listened to. What could we say as we stood round and looked upon him, but 'Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace.'" What can we now say in recalling such an unexpected event, but, How uncertain are all things here below!

It is highly gratifying to know that while the shock took away for a season Mr. Sanderson's power of recollection and intelligible utterance, his Christian cheerfulness was undimmed, and his reasoning faculties untouched to the end of life. After a time he sufficiently recovered to take charge of a class, lead a prayer meeting, visit the afflicted and preach a little. When attempting to speak at a public meeting he would stick quite fast for a word, even in the middle of an old familiar anecdote. He would pleasantly turn round on the platform, and without any apparent embarrassment, would ask, "What was I saying, Brother Bywater?" and being reminded, would go on again, saying, "I have it in me, friends, and if I could get it out I would throw it among you by handfuls."

Our limited space forbids us to enlarge on the details of Mr. Sanderson's few remaining years; but suffice it to say, that he was calm, dignified and resigned through all his latest afflictions. "At eventide there was light"—the light of the glorious Gospel, the light of a rich experience, the light of a living hope, yea, "the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." His was a long and bright day, with a magnificent sunset.

On Good Friday, 1874, it was as if the light from heaven poured fully on his brow. Just as his pulse was ceasing to beat, he sweetly cried out, "Come, come, coming." Was it that he saw the Saviour, and wanted to say, "Come, Lord Jesus"? or was it that he heard a voice from heaven saying, "Come up hither"? Thus the happy and triumphant spirit of William Sanderson—one of our most gifted, eloquent, and useful early ministers—passed from "this earthly house of his tabernacle to the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

We may, with the briefest mention, pass over the great demonstrations of sorrow at his large funeral on Easter Monday, and also the great lamentations made for him throughout the Connexion.

The following is from an article which appeared in The Primitive Methodist immediately after Mr. Sanderson's death: "He was a natural orator of a very high order; if he had been connected with some of the older denominations, the very highest places would have been open to him, his fame would have filled the country and reached to other lands. His voice was remarkably sweet, full of music and tenderness. We have heard him on the platform thrill large audiences till they have been wild with excitement. He would rise to a majesty and grandeur all his own—holding his hearers spell-bound while he detailed the triumphs of the truth, or poured boiling scorn on the follies, or foibles, or fancies of the enemies of the Gospel."

Many testimonies in corroboration of these statements might easily be furnished, both from ministers and laymen, did our space permit. Memory still lovingly lingers on his character and deeds. There are doubtless numerous homes and pulpits throughout the country where the memory of him is still kept sacred. He was as an angel of light to many a home of gloom and sorrow. A few hopeful words in his wonted cheerful style have lifted the load of grief from many a heavy heart. His uninterrupted brightness rendered him a great favourite with the children and young people in the homes which had the honour of entertaining him. But it was in his own home where he shone the brightest, and shed the richest influence. Two of his beloved daughters who are still with us—the widow of the Rev. Joseph Toulson, and the widow of the Rev. Ephraim Talbot—can fully testify how cheerful, how contented he was; what tender consideration he had for all around him, as a father, a husband, and a friend.

To those who never had the privilege of meeting our esteemed friend, the following description of his personal appearance at the time he suffered his paralytic stroke may prove interesting. Picture to yourself a man nearly five feet six inches in height, weighing about thirteen stones, with a real English face; hair grey, but not bald, the head evenly balanced, the forehead not unusually high, but well-developed, eyes full of language, mouth half smiling, nose of average size, countenance mild, voice sonorous, chest broad, speaking with easy and fluent but somewhat rapid utterance. The portrait of Mr. Sanderson which appeared in the first part of this article* is a reproduction of the steel engraving that appeared in the Magazine during his life. The portrait here given represents Mr. Sanderson at a much later period of life.

When we remember what large audiences were instructed by his rich expositions of the Scriptures, delighted by his noble imagery, cheered by his lofty fancy, melted by his pathos, convinced by his arguments, and roused by his earnest appeals, may we not naturally make the inquiry, What were the principal elements which contributed to his popularity and success?

PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHAPEL, KIRTTON LINDSEY.

* See "The Aldersgate" for May.

That he was greatly aided by natural endowments will be readily admitted, and that he gave unremitting attention to the acquisition of suitable knowledge cannot for a moment be doubted; but he evidently did not confine his attention to books alone, but also made man the object of his study. His study of nature and art and poetry also formed no inconsiderable a factor in his success. He had an eye for beauty everywhere. He would often remark in the home, "What a beautiful carpet you have!" "What a fine wall-paper you have selected!" But the beauty of a landscape, or even of a garden, literally enchanted him. The beauty of spring, the glories of summer, the varied tints of autumn, or the hoar-frost of winter led him often with rapture to praise the power, wisdom and goodness of the Divine Father. We have frequently seen him returning from his Norfolk visits literally laden with roots and cuttings of choice plants and flowers, given by friends for his own garden at home. In that garden round the homely country cottage, blazing with roses, and blooming with flowers, he often conversed with nature, with angels, and with God; gathering illustrations for pulpit and platform ministrations, ripening and maturing daily for the Eden above.

We fully agree with his biographer, "that much as nature and study with keen observation had done for him, masculine piety and a spirit of devotion had done more. His impressive and impassioned utterances were pervaded with divine influence; they were the emanations of a heart touched with holy fire. It was the spiritual element which gave distinctiveness and forcefulness to his message. He lived in the spirit of prayer; private prayer was his great delight; it was this which gave such freshness and fulness to his family and pulpit devotions, and brought so rich an unction on his pulpit ministrations; many thousands feeling that he preached with demonstration of the Spirit and with power."

Such a combination of natural gifts, spiritual power, with the genial warmth of a true and loving heart, deserve to be held in undying remembrance. We do not claim for him absolute perfection, for then he would have ceased to be human; but undoubtedly that which formed the master-key of his character was his living piety. Piety did not merely adhere to him like varnish or veneer, it pervaded and penetrated as well as surrounded him; it was not a thing of times and places, it was the element in which he lived and moved and had his being, and few persons could be long in his company without feeling they were breathing a divine atmosphere. In this he was an excellent example for all young ministers to copy.

Again we inquire, May not his wise selection of the great central truths of the Gospel for his chief pulpit themes, have largely contributed to Mr. Sanderson's ministerial power and success? These great truths—while others may have relative importance—are what the world most needed in the days of the Apostles, and what the world most needs even at the present day.

In reviewing the life of Mr. Sanderson, there stands before us a man, born in an obscure village at the beginning of the century, before the present-day advantages of education, in early life rendered motherless, thrown in his apprenticeship into association with a man who speedily took to keeping a public-house, with no religious opportunities but those afforded by the Methodist services held in the humble cottage of a poor widow; yet while in his teens, plucked as a brand from the burning, becoming in his apprenticeship a useful local preacher, and released from his indentures by monetary payment, in order that he might at once enter the glorious work of the Christian ministry.

There stands before us a man whose labours were abundant, whose hardships were frequent, whose trials were numerous, and of whose self-denial it is difficult in these days to form any adequate conception; yet, his biographer adds, amid all his labours, self-sacrifice, and wide popularity, his salary, in addition to house-rent, scarcely ever rose to the golden height of one guinea per week! Yet he was never heard to complain, but with reverence and calmness, bowed to compulsory superannuation through affliction in the meridian of life. While paralysis shook the very foundation of his earthly tabernacle, yet it could not for a single moment touch the powers of his reason, the calmness of his mind, the cheerfulness of his disposition, the brightness of his hope, and his confidence in his God.

There stands before us a truly great man—great in the pulpit, on the platform, and in the home—great in the country cottage or the city sanctuary, great in his love of nature and poetry and art, great in his taste for beauty, but especially the beauty of holiness, great in popularity, but greater still in humility, in brotherly kindness and charity; whose Christian character shone more brightly than even his splendid gifts—whose gifts were beautified and exalted by the depth of his piety, the intensity of his zeal, his spiritual culture, his compassion for souls, his power in prayer, and his ardent love for the Lord Jesus Christ.

Finally, there stands before us a man, who from his dying pillow could look back on more than half a century of successful labours in his Master's service. What an encouragement to early piety! We can only add, God be praised for raising up such a distinguished minister as William Sanderson in the early days of Primitive Methodism, and let us earnestly pray that his mantle, like that of Elijah, may fall on many in the present generation.

American Sunday Papers.

BY JOSEPH HENRY ODELL.

WHEN the Editor requested a few notes on the American Sunday papers, I decided to violate conscience and do evil that good might come. Accordingly I sent in an order for "all the New York Sunday papers next week." The agent took the order with Satanic literalness, and Monday morning a young man staggered up to the Manse under a journalistic burden that completely exhausted him. There were French, German, Italian, Scandinavian, Hebrew and American editions, enough to furnish a polyglot intellect for a month. We will leave out of consideration the papers printed in foreign languages, and simply look over a few of the others.

Undoubtedly the most popular are "The Herald," "Journal" and "World," giving respectively, eighty-four, ninety-six, and seventy-two pages. They are printed in colours, and cater to every conceivable taste. They include coloured comic sections, whose vulgarity eclipses "Ally Sloper," pages devoted to science, art, literature, cooking, fashion, housekeeping, short stories, with respectable religious items in about the same proportion as salt to potatoes. They are profusely illustrated. Each has the ordinary news-sheet, and the current market and stock quotations. Supposing a slow-witted labouring man purchases one of these papers on Sabbath morning, at his rate of reading it will keep him occupied and amused for the rest of the day. And when we remember that Sunday is practically the only time he can find time to improve his mind we are not surprised to learn that he devotes it exclusively to his voluminous newspaper. City ministers are unanimous in their declaration that Sabbath papers are worse in their influence upon the readers than upon either the producers or vendors. Of course, it would be ridiculous to state that there is nothing in these journals worthy of Sunday meditation; we must confine ourselves always to the principle violated in their production and circulation, and the evil tendencies generated in the purchasers and readers.

But not willing to trust my own judgment in the matter, I wrote to my friend, Daniel F. Kellogg, Esq., Editor of the "New York Sun," one of the most authoritative, respectable, and conservative papers published in America, and which, under its late Editor, Mr. Dana, achieved an international reputation, and largely moulded the course of American affairs for over thirty years. There is a current saying—"If you see it in 'The Sun,' it's so." Mr. Kellogg has written me a most valuable letter, which I gladly submit to the readers of "The Aldersgate." I will give the numbered questions, followed by his corresponding frank and full replies.

I. When did Sunday editions of the daily papers first appear in New York?

II. Which are the "Dailies" publishing only six days per week?

III. What is the average circulation of the leading Sunday papers?

IV. Is the Sunday edition under a separate editor?

V. Do the Sunday editions pay as a business investment apart from the week-day editions?

VI. Would the "staff" and employees welcome or dread the suspension of the Sunday editions?

VII. Do any or many merchants and business firms refuse to advertise in the Sunday papers from religious scruples?

VIII. Supposing that all the Church people of all Denominations were to rigorously boycott, not only the Sunday edition, but also the week-day editions of the papers which publish seven days per week, would it seriously affect the position of the paper?

IX. Do you find the paper vendors in any way opposed to the Sunday work involved in distributing the Sunday papers?

"New York,

"April 20, 1899.

"MY DEAR MR. ODELL,

"I have your pleasant letter of yesterday, and I am most happy to hear from you, and to be of any assistance to you that I can. I ought to state that I am not connected with the business office of our paper, and hence have not as exact a knowledge upon the points you mention referring to business affairs, as distinguished from editorial matters, as I might have. However, I think I can answer your questions in a general way. I enclose you the questions which you ask, and for the sake of convenience, will answer them by their numbers.

"I. 'The New York Herald' has always printed a Sunday paper. The first number of the 'Sunday Tribune' appeared in 1861, of 'The Times' in 1866, and of 'The Sun' in 1875, and so on. For many years there have been certain papers which have only appeared upon Sundays. In times past some of these papers had a large local circulation here, larger, in fact, than that of the week-day papers. Notable among them was the 'New York Despatch.' Those papers now are almost never seen.

"II. All the daily papers here now are published every day in the week. I do not know of any daily paper in this country, that is, in any town or city of any size, that is not published every day in the week. Certain commercial papers here are not printed on Sundays.

"III. It is very difficult to answer this question except approximately. Some of the papers here claim a circulation on Sunday that seems fabulous, and there is really no way of finding out the truth about it. I should say that the average circulation of each of the six leading Sunday papers is not in excess of 175,000 copies.

"IV. Most of the large papers (not 'The Sun,' however), has a separate editor for that part of the Sunday paper which comprises stories, special matter as distinguished from news, and printed in the supplement, or on extra sheets. The news part of the Sunday paper is, however, prepared by the same editors as on ordinary days. On almost all of the large papers, however, everybody on the staff has one day off in the week. More men are off duty on Sundays than on other days because the news on that day is not great. The Monday papers are apt to be small, and there is less work to do.

"V. Sunday editions certainly do pay as a business investment, apart from the week-day editions. The circulation of the Sunday paper is much greater than that of the paper during week-days, and many times on some papers the advertising in the Sunday issue is as much as half of that on all the other days of the week.

"VI. This depends on the system of compensation on each paper. On most of the New York papers the reporters, or the people who do the writing, are paid a certain sum per hour for the time employed in their occupation, or according to the amount of matter actually written by them and printed in the paper. They are at liberty to choose whichever of these forms of compensation is the most profitable for them. Such men, of course, would care to work every day, taking their days off when they desire. Naturally, however, people on salary desire to get as many days off as they can. Such employees would all welcome the suspension of the Sunday edition as regards their personal convenience, although they all recognise that it would injure the paper as a business property.

"VII. Almost nobody refuses to advertise in the Sunday editions from religious scruples. On the contrary, as I have stated, it is the favourite day of all for advertising, merchants realising that the circulation on that day is larger, and that the papers are read more thoroughly than on week-days.

"VIII. Such a boycott as you mention would undoubtedly seriously affect the position of a paper, providing it could be maintained and should become widespread. Such a thing is, however, in this country, at least, quite unsupposable. If there were only a few papers printing Sunday editions they could be singled out as isolated instances of wrong-doing, and so would occupy a vulnerable position. But with all the papers printing Sunday editions, a person deciding not to read them would have to bar himself out from the whole of daily journalism. Moreover, the boycott business rarely works anyway. However much people, or certain classes of people, may be opposed to Sunday newspapers, the papers have attained so large a circulation, and occupy so great a share of the time of the reading public as a whole, that any such thing as a boycott would be impossible. As a matter of fact, I find very little prejudice against Sunday newspapers. They seem to fill a want, and to have taken the place very largely of the higher-priced magazines, except among people who might be described as ultra-religious, or, at least, who hold to the observance of Sunday in a way which would now be considered quite old-fashioned.

"IX. Paper vendors are in no way opposed to the Sunday work involved in distributing the papers. Indeed, Sunday is the one day of the week when they make the most money.

"I should say, summing up, that the chief objection to Sunday papers among intelligent and conservative people now, is the publication of such papers as 'The World' and 'The Journal,' or even, possibly, of the 'New York Herald.' These are vulgar, criminal, sensational and depraved in every way, and do a vast amount of harm. Of course, as you know, a scheme for objection to Sunday papers on the ground that they involve extra work on the Sabbath would properly lie against the paper of Monday morning, rather than against that of Sunday, the work for the Monday morning paper being entirely done during the day and evening of Sunday.

"Yours very faithfully,

"DANIEL F. KELLOGG.

The reply to Question VIII. is obviously the most important. In America, individuals may, and do, refuse to purchase the Sunday edition, but the Sabbatic violation is so widespread and chronic that, as Mr. Kellogg points out, were we to boycott the week-day editions of the violator we should "bar ourselves out from the whole of daily journalism." He gives, however, one significant sentence apropos of the problem now vexing the British Christian, viz.:—"If there were only a few papers printing Sunday editions they could be singled out as isolated instances of wrong-doing, and so would occupy a vulnerable position."

American Christianity lost its opportunity in the sixties. If then it had rigorously boycotted the "Tribune" and "Herald," the other papers would not have risked the experiment. English Churchmen may to-day take "The Telegraph" and "Daily Mail" by the throat and choke the life out of them—by boycotting, not only the Sunday, but the week-day editions also; not only by not purchasing the papers, but by positively refusing to advertise at any time in their pages. If America furnishes any prophecy concerning the English problem, it may be summed up simply as, Now or Never! If the "Telegraph" and "Daily Mail" succeed, the rest of the newspaper world will fall into line for self-preservation.

Mr. Moody, whose judgment carries authority for large numbers on both sides of the Atlantic, has pronounced most emphatically on the subject. He says: "With regard to the Sunday newspaper, I know all the arguments that are brought in its favour—that the work on it is done during the week, that it is the Monday paper that causes Sunday work, and so on. But there are two hundred thousand newsboys selling the paper on Sunday. Would you like to have your boy one of them? Men are kept running trains in order to distribute the papers. Would you like your Sabbath taken away from you? If not, then practise the Golden Rule, and don't touch the papers.

"Their contents make them unfit for reading any day, not to say Sunday. Some New York dailies advertise Sunday editions of sixty pages. Many dirty pieces of scandal in this and other countries are raked up and put into them. 'Eight pages of fun!' That is splendid reading for Sunday, isn't it? Even when a so-called sermon is printed, it is completely buried by the fiction and news-matter. It is time that ministers went into their pulpits and preached against Sunday papers. Put the man in the scales that buys and reads the Sunday papers. After reading them for two or three hours he might go and hear the best sermon in the world, but you couldn't preach anything into him. His mind is filled up with what he has read, and there is no room for thoughts of God. I believe that the archangel Gabriel himself could not make an impression on an audience that has its head full of such trash.

"A merchant who advertises in Sunday papers is not keeping the Sabbath. It is a master-stroke of the devil to induce Christian men to do this in order to make trade for Monday.

"Ladies buy the Sunday papers and read the advertisements of Monday bargains to see what they can buy cheap. They do more harm to religion than any one agency I know. Their whole influence is against keeping the Sabbath holy. They are an unnecessary evil.

"If Christian men and women refused to buy them, if Christian tradesmen refused to advertise in them, they would soon die out, but that is where they get most of their support."

Personally, I confess that the case here seems hopeless. We have a generous Catholicity of spirit among the local churches, but as there exists no Federation of any kind, concerted action is impossible. Not having any defensive reasons for union (I mean from the ecclesiastical standpoint), we have drifted into a terrible individualism which robs the Church of much social, political, and moral force. In England, with the present organisation, a very swift and telling blow could be dealt at any attempt to invade the sacred rights of the Lord's Day. A few practical suggestions occur to my mind which I offer with diffidence.

In the first place, our weekly religious papers should be published nearer the end of the week—too often they are stale by Sunday.

Then they need to be more distinctly educational and spiritual rather than ecclesiastical and polemical.

And, finally, an effort should be made to place the weekly half-holiday in the middle of the week, where, for economical and physical reasons, it properly belongs. This would destroy the "sporting interest" which plays so large a part in making the demand for Sunday papers.

Bible Emblems.

I.—VOICELESS MINISTRY, OR, TEACHING BY EMBLEMS.

THE language of the Bible is largely pictorial. There are few definitions, but many pictures; few arguments, but many emblems; its teaching is concrete, not abstract. We may forget an argument; we do not forget a picture.

The life of Joseph the Dreamer is an unfading drama because that life is represented in a series of graphic pictures. A life described in terms of the intellect fades; an illustrated life presented in terms of the imagination is undying. What comes to us through the ear may be forgotten; what is gained through the eye abides. "Scripture has specially consecrated the faculty of sight. The saint is a beholder; he gazes, he looks . . . he does not merely ruminate within, but his whole mind is carried out towards, and upon, a great representation."

The human eye is the flower of the senses. By it we are brought into immediate union with the visible world. The perfection of our life on this earth is in seeing. And how much there is to see! All Nature is but God's illustrated Bible. Its revelations are to be understood through the eye. It speaks to us in symbols. There is not a tree but has its message. A spider's web is literature. The sparrow is a preacher. There is not a butterfly that is not full of suggestion. The glow-worm is an illuminated manuscript. The swallow tells me summer is nigh. Every object suggests something to the mind through the eye. "A flag is not simply a piece of bunting with white, red, and blue colours; it means our fatherland, its history, its honours, and its destiny. A sword is not simply a blade of steel; it means power. A throne, in poetry, in history, means government. The crown is not simply a circlet of gold and gems; it means authority and kingship. The cross is not a piece of wood; it is an emblem of the guilt of sin, of matchless love, of wondrous influence." When we look into the grave we do not think of the coffin, but of the mother, and of all she was to us through the stormy years. The heavens are not so much blue sky and vagrant cloud; they are God's handiwork. All Nature sings everlastingly to us.

There are days which are like an oratorio, when earth, air, trees, sunshine, grass, are all in the same joyous mood. In such days the earth becomes a Bible—the rocky strata its Book of Genesis; the singing of the birds its Book of Psalms; the air full of sunlight and fragrance its Gospels; and the changing lights, the advancing hours, its Book of Revelation.

The old earth is a wonderful book. Everything in it has a message. Nature is never dumb. We have found even a language in the flowers. We make their lips carry our messages. "The timid youth whose love almost chokes him when he is going to speak it, does not know what to do till the florist tells him to pluck an acacia leaf, and he says to him, 'She will understand that parable. The acacia leaf stands for love. You slip in the acacia leaf, and she will understand all about it.' That leaf becomes his evangelist. I cannot speak to my friend yonder, bowed down with a thousand distresses, burdened with affliction. He has lost again and again the lives he loved most, and his life is now a process of grave-digging, and any words of mine would but augment the grief which I would seek to alleviate. But I am cunning in the use of floral eloquence; I know what I will do,

I will pluck a sprig of amaranth and send it to him. When he sees it he will see in that sprig of amaranth a symbol of the everlastingness of God, the immortality of the true life, and in that amaranth he will see revelation, and parable, and sacred vision.* Away across the seas the friend of my childhood days is finding life a hard, stern struggle. He is weighted with a load of cares. I know not how to comfort him with words. But from the field where he and I roamed in the far-away days, I pluck a simple buttercup, (ever an emblem of cheerfulness), and send it to him. It is enough. Black despair is driven from his heart as he looks in the cheerful face of the simple flower.

"Wildlings of Nature, I dote upon you;
For ye waft me to summers of old,
When the earth teemed around me with fairy delight,
And when daisies and buttercups gladdened my sight,
Like treasures of silver and gold."

Better than any message of mine is God's message from the fields to weary and sorrowing hearts.

We cannot go too often into the garden if we go to turn every flower into a speaking angel. It will be a dark day for us all when beauty ceases to talk to our hearts and preach the sweet gospel of hope. The Greatest Teacher the world has ever seen uttered comparatively little which was not illustrated by objects in the Natural World. His Gospel is steeped in Nature. He made Nature the Bible for the multitude. He looked upon the whole universe as a parable of God. His teaching had for text budding trees, reddening sky, quivering bulrush, burning reed; from grapes and thorns, from figs and thistles, from ravens and sparrows, from corn and wine and oil, from flower and tree—He preached His marvellous sermons.

God's true saints have ever regarded Nature as a revelation of God to men, a revelation of God's awfulness and goodness, of His care and love.

"They saw Him in the shining of the stars,
They saw Him in the flowering of the fields."

It was only in His ways with men that they failed to find Him. These saints of old found God's voice in the fields. They were His illuminated manuscript, His open Book, a rich commentary on the Bible. St. Bernard said the oaks and beeches of Clairvaux had been his best masters in theology.

Take the outburst of our own great Puritan poet:—

"These are Thy glorious works, Parent of good,
Almighty! Thine this universal frame,
Thus wondrous fair: Thyself how wondrous then!"

Take the sweet hymn of the poet-statesman—

"The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim!

* Dr. Parker.

For ever singing, as they shine,
'The hand that made us is Divine.'

To Wordsworth, the great Christian poet, and thereby, also, the great Nature poet, it was given to make others feel with him that,

"Thanks to the human heart by which we live—
Thanks to its tenderness, its hopes, its fears,
To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

To Turner, the great painter,—insulted, soured, misunderstood as he was—it was given to perpetuate on the glowing canvas, the most transient glories of Nature, and so to open our eyes to its glory and its power.

To Handel, and to Bach, and to Haydn, was it given each to make us hear

"The tides of music's golden sea Setting towards eternity."

These are the true interpreters of God's great Book of Nature. And what, after all, is God's universe but a sublime poem, a beautiful and sublime utterance of the Divine mind and heart! As music is the poetry of sound, so poetry is the musical utterance of thought and feeling—the happy union of soul and language. As some one has truly said: "The body of speech is prose, but the soul is poetry."

God is the perfect poet, and all human poets only imperfect imitators.

"The Bible is a poem; not a line
But lives and talks in music to mankind;
And Nature is all poetry Divine;
And song the natural language of the mind."

We cannot forget our own Ruskin, who more than any other man has made the imaginative study of Nature a source of religious insight and an inspiration to holy life. How emphatically he has taught that Nature is God writ large. How he would have us drink in delight, through the hearing ear, and the seeing eye. How earnestly he has told us in his matchless language, of "The sky as in scene after scene, picture after picture, glory after glory, sometimes gentle, sometimes capricious, sometimes awful, almost human in its passions, almost spiritual in its tendernesses, almost divine in its infinitude—it appeals to that which is most immortal within us; of the lichens and the mosses—the earth's first mercy and its last gift, of which the wild bird makes its nest, and the weary child its pillow; of the hills of which it is the least service to feed the rivers and purify the winds, and of which it is the higher mission to fill the thirsty human heart with the beauty of God's works; of the scarlet clouds of sunset, interwoven in a canopy of waving flame, and tossing vault beyond vault as with the drifting wings of many companies of angels; of the grass, with its soft, unnumbered, peaceful spears; and, lastly, of the tabernacling of the unendurable sun with men as in the shadow of the firmament; so that instead of being in a scorching circle amid the blackness of vacuity, a temple is built for his presence, and a pavement is spread for his chariot, and a veil is drawn round the sanctuary of his rest; and all those passings to and fro of fruitful shower—those voices of moaning winds and threatening thunders, and glories of coloured bow and refreshing rain, are but to deepen in our hearts the acceptance and the dearness of the simple words, 'Our Father, which art in heaven.'"

They are but to prove to us, as no logic could prove—as no science could prove—as nothing could prove except a deep and sincere emotion—that "the invisible things of Him from the foundation of the world are manifest, being clearly understood by the things that are seen, even His Eternal power and Godhead."

"Truth, so far, in my book;—the truth which draws Through all things upwards,—that a twofold world Must go to a perfect cosmos. Natural things
And Spiritual,—who separates those two
In art, in morals, or the social drift,
Tears up the bond of Nature and brings death,
Paints futile pictures, writes unreal verse,
Leads vulgar days, deals ignorantly with men,
Is wrong, in short, at all points."

While we plead with the "silver trumpet" for a perfect blending of the Natural and the Spiritual, still we cannot close without a blast from the "ram's horn" of warning. We may revel in creating a thousand images and emblems by which to symbolise our thoughts, yet there is danger ahead.

"The danger arises from the fact that we may consider our duty done when we have instituted a beautiful comparison or found a striking emblem. Our religion may perish in sentimental expressions—you may die in words—you may say, 'A bundle of myrrh is my beloved unto me; my beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi.' Christ is the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley—as an apple-tree among the trees of the woods. We may see Him coming out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all the powders of merchantmen, and yet our love may pass off as an evaporation, and never embody itself in one act of sacrifice, or in one attempt at service." It is possible to get into high ecstasy of poetry, and to forget the courtesies of life. We may recite poetry, and revel in emblems, and live prose all our days. Compare your living Saviour to all things beautiful, make every flower of the field into a parable, the summer will grow too few flowers to set forth all His wondrous beauty. Then go forth and incarnate Him in actions more eloquent than the sweetest melody of music—than the beauty of the rarest flower that grows. Select your finest, most striking emblems from the wide field of Nature, then go and eclipse your most glowing emblems only by a life lived on the highest levels.

"Be good, and let who will be clever;
Do noble deeds,—not dream them all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast forever
One glad, sweet song."—

TOCKETT'S MILL.

The Garden of Yorkshire.

VI.

UISBRO', in the halcyon days of the Priory, was a dirty little place of huts; a natural and appropriate contrast to the mansion of the levites; such mansions, like modern kindred establishments, have the cream of life, while the real wealth-winners must be content with the honour of providing for their betters, and begging for the crumbs that fall from the table. Even so late as the last century Guisbro' appears to have needed some education on the virtues of cleanliness and courtesy. Wesley, preaching from a table in the market-place, at the Cross, remarks that, "It was in a bad neighbourhood; for there was so vehement a stench of stinking fish, as was ready to suffocate me, and the people roared like the waves of the sea." Twenty years later he writes of his Guisbro' congregation, "They despise all ornaments but good works, together with a meek and quiet spirit. I did not see a ruffle, no, nor a fashionable cap among them, though many of them are in easy circumstances." Manifestly they had improved in their manners, though the fashions of the Methodist ladies would not give much encouragement to the millinery business unless it was for straw for the enormous bonnets they wore. The lower end of the main street, Westgate, is called Stump's Cross, to commemorate the warrior who, after having his legs hewn off, continued to slash away on his bleeding stumps. This reminds us of the verse in that lively old ballad, Chevy Chase, about the brave Widdrington:—

"And Widdrington I needs must wail,
As one in doleful dumps;
For when his legs were smitten off,
He fought upon his stumps."

So history repeats itself. Belmangate, the name of another street, is said to be derived from Belle-monde-gate, i.e., the entrance to the fair country, which seems appropriate enough. It is, however, just as probable it meant the gate leading out to Belmont, towards which hill it does actually open.

Primitive Methodism is looking up a bit just now under the careful guidance and tact of the Rev. J. A. West. For the last two or three quarters the circuit steward has actually had balances in hand. Such a fact is most encouraging when it is considered how the circuit has had to struggle for years on account of the hard times,

Then, unprecedented sums are being raised at the sewing meeting teas towards a new chapel, for which a site in the best position in the town has been secured. Yesterday we were at one of them, held, al fresco, in Mr. C. Colling's (circuit steward), field, where we were plentifully supplied with strawberries and cream, and finished up the evening in a very natural, healthy, and happy manner with games; and the grandfathers and grandmothers enjoyed it as much as the youngsters. It was very, very pleasant to be once again among old friends, amid old scenes, for a few hours. Other people have garden-parties, and why shouldn't a P. M. parson give his people tea in a garden, or field, as well as they? No reason why he shouldn't if he has the means, and can get a garden; two important items. We thank you, Mr. West, for the happy thought so generously executed. Since then three devoted Primitives, all of whom were present at the above-mentioned tea-party, have been called home. First, Mrs. Flower, then Mrs. Colling, and last, Mr. Dodsworth. If anyone wishes to see how Primitive Methodism has fared in the chapel line, let him visit the old place up Ranter's Yard; it is the last building in a wretched cul de sac, and now, by-and-by, we are to appear in the best place in the town. God speed the work which alone can make such enterprises possible,—the work of conversion.

We have often wondered why such a charming place as Guisbro' has not developed into a visiting, or even residential, town. Its day may yet come. We should not be surprised to see it grow in this direction, for the mingling of the sea and moor airs must be very suitable to some constitutions. Old Speed, the antiquarian, describes it thus:—"The air is subtle and piercing, and not inclined naturally to contagious infections, which causeth the people to live long and healthfully, and are not so subject to agues, fluxes, and other imperfections, as are those countries that are more troubled with mists and foggy vapours." Those "subject to agues, fluxes, and other imperfections," will, no doubt, upon learning this, make haste to live at Guisbro', especially when we remind them that it has greatly improved since Speed's visit.

On such an evening as this it is delicious to rest in the heather on the edge of the hill and listen to the sounds as they float up from the ancient place. The bees are hurrying to get a final sip of nectar before sunset, and the air is full of happy ephemera, dancing out their short life in the tempered light and calm of the dying day. The rhythmical break of the waves can be heard nine miles away at Redcar, the result of the easterly breeze earlier in the day, with the deeper constant undertone, which you hear and yet can't hear if listened for, like a long sigh of disappointment.

MARKET CROSS, GUISBRO'.

WESTGATE, GUISBRO'.

"Two voices are here ; one is of the sea,
One of the mountains ; each a mighty voice :
They were thy chosen music, Liberty !"

The various cries and sounds come up here quite distinctly. The ring of the quoit, a whistle, the shouts of lads in the cricket field, a concertina, the footfalls of a fast-trotting nag down Westgate, and just now someone has wandered to the foot of the hill and is awaking the echoes of hill and vale by blowing fearful blasts upon a bugle,—if these be the only "concord of sweet sounds" he has in him, then is he "fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils." The old church bell rings at six a.m., twelve a.m., one p.m., and six p.m. I don't know why, unless it be a special institution for the binding and loosing of apprentices. The twelve a.m. and six p.m. bells were pleasant enough to us, but the six a.m. and one p.m. bells were as gall and wormwood to the sleepy, reluctant apprentices. Yes, the same bell rang out just now, and its gentle echoes travelled up to the moors and away, away into infinite space, but it was not rung by the same hand, neither did the same hearts hail its note of freedom as in the years gone by. Nine out of every ten of the youths of twenty-two years ago are either scattered or dead. The band near the hospital has played no less than three pieces while I have been here, all well known—"Rousseau," with its sad note ; the lively "March of the Men of Harlech," and an inspiring

Austrian March, the name of which I do not at the moment recollect. The slight movement in the air—it can't be called even a gentle breeze—which has just sprung up is favourable, and the great hill front has a pleasure in catching the human notes at its base and passing them up and on to the moors, as to a great audience chamber. The sun is setting behind the Eston and Barnaby Moors, and his last glow flashes on the scattered graves of the Nab, Roseberry and Highcliffe, and steals gently for a last kiss into the old priory grounds. The shale hills of the alum-workers change almost into gold under the horizontal light ; and the old, red tiles with which many of the houses in the town are roofed, never look so beautiful as just now, when flinging out their warm hues to the glory of the setting sun with a cheery "Good-night, I'll see you in the morning," so it seems. Stump's Cross and Warsfield, where savage Dane and Saxon, fiery Cavalier and dogged Roundhead hacked and cursed each other, are peaceful, very peaceful under the fading light. True, they tell the sad story of the past, but it is told in a gentle voice, as is fitting the story of man's hate and evil should be told in later times. Over the dark, motionless clump of trees the crown of the priory window and gable can be seen standing as it has stood for ages,—and as it will stand when the writer and his readers are as much forgotten as the small insects that are dying by hundreds to-night up here—with parts of its mutilated beauty scattered around—still standing as if to guard the little town that for centuries rose and fell with its fortunes.

"Lord, what is man that Thou art mindful of him?"

It had famous founders and supporters, scholarly priors of great religious and political influence, but being untrue to the eternal law of Righteousness and Progress, a night, dark and hopeless, has settled upon it as a religious institution. To-morrow God's "golden-tressed sun" will come again to the beautiful vale, but never again will the old Abbey become a living force. Here we have the remains of Britons, Romans, Saxons, Danes, Normans, noblemen, priests, miners, masons, and cunning workmen. Many of them have a story to tell of strife, ambition, cruelty, hardship, poorly rewarded labour, accident in the mine, starvation and cringing fear in the cottage,—in a word, of the loves, hates and works of the solemn past.

At last the sun has vanished, but great shafts of tremulous light shoot up into the sky, and the edges of the clouds are a flaming copper colour. Surely the most magnificent sunsets I have ever seen have been those seen beyond the Eston Moors from Belmont. In going down the lane I looked for the ash tree in the hedge where I first heard a bird sing,—I mean felt it sing in the inner mind. Passing quietly along the hedge, when under the tree, struck with its fearlessness, I stood quite still. Its throat was puffed out, it shook its feathers and seemed to tremble with an ecstasy. Tree and bird have both gone, but by that divine song of twenty years ago they are both living to me now. All judgments of the mind must have a standard of comparison; that is mine for the song of birds. I have heard the nightingale singly, and three and four at a time, in the Kentish woods, but none of them could equal my little friend in the ash tree. The mood we hear in is everything, I suppose. So many things are gone, which "signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken as of things that have been made, that those things which are not shaken may remain." The De Brus motto, "We have been," is sadly suggestive, it is the gloomy reminder of a great past. The last distinct ray has gone from the sky, reminding the Garden of Cleveland of rest, and the glory and work of the coming morrow. Let not that morrow be as to-day, but better, for are not all these monuments saying to us:—"What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

THOS. E. CURRAH.

The Place of Ritual in Worship.

GOD is a Spirit." This is a cardinal truth to be held firmly when considering the place ritual sustains to worship. Man is a spirit within a body, living in a world of sensible forms, which, with the growth of his religious feelings, more and more become media through which his soul feels the

Unseen. The spiritual nature of God, and the forms among which man moves, make ritual in worship a necessity. Hence rites there must be, either in forms elaborate or simple. No Church could long survive the absence of Sundays, ministers, churches, sermons, songs, and prayers. Milton, Puritan though he was, made the worship of angels take form even in heaven, and it was to "warbled hymns and forced hallelujahs" that Mammon professed to take objection. The Greek at Eleusis, the Israelite in Solomon's temple, the old Polynesian, all expressed their feeling towards the Unseen through ritual more or less elaborate. A proportion of ritual is necessary to the success of popular religion, and in itself may assist a company of worshippers to realise the presence of God. No doubt, the realisation of God's presence in instruction, pardon, peace, and adoration is the end of worship as understood by the many, but since that must take form and expression, ritual must prevail. A corpse has all the mechanism of a living body; it is life which creates an effective unity of body and soul. Rites and forms are dead unless the Spirit vitalise them, but when they become the media of grace they seem to fall away and give place to spiritual realities. There is no natural antagonism between ritual and worship. The highest worship vivifies every element of ritual it employs, making all minister to the growth and strengthening of the soul.

From such considerations there spring, by a slight digression, the inquiry as to the legitimacy of art in the service of ritual. It may be granted safely, that art can express worthily supernatural affections. The term Madonna may, to many, suggest the prostitution of art in the service of worship; still, the face of the Madonna, as expressed by the masters in art, does express some of the highest feelings of which human nature is capable. Sir Noel Paton's picture, "Light in Darkness," has awakened spiritual feeling in the hearts of many, and has encouraged in the most worldly that frame of mind from which all true worship must arise. Or, again, spiritual truths may be set to such "linked sweetness," and allied to such entrancing tunes, that the most fastidious in literary taste cannot refuse to admit the power of a hymn to minister to the soul. Hymnody does express submission, reverence, awe, trust, and hopefulness. But is the objection urged that such supernatural affections in the worshipper can be created only by the Holy Spirit, and that unless kindled by Him they are spurious? It is a sufficient answer to say that it is not wise to limit narrowly the agencies through which the Holy Spirit may operate upon a soul. By what reasoning can it be proved that the Highest prefers to work through services bald, plain, unrelieved, unbeautiful, and that He withdraws His influence from correctness, taste and beauty? Do doggerel verses and bad sermons support the spiritual life better than perfect poetry and eloquent speech? The Free Churches of this country employ the artistic more than at any previous period, and with good results. Uniformity in the measure of ritual employed will never be attained. Nor is it desirable. Different persons will desire ritual in different proportions. The progress of culture makes for the reduction of baldness in public worship. With the growth of culture in Protestant Churches there is a tendency to make services rather more elaborate. This is not a dangerous sign. The disparagement of all ritual as ritual, is not a cardinal principle of Protestantism. There would be danger if a certain expression and measure of ritual were regarded as the criteria wherewith to determine a true faith, church and ministry. True Protestantism does not make such tests. The Free Churches practise more rites than formerly, but with perfect safety. Primitive Methodism has been similarly affected, and so has Methodism generally. A service plain as that followed in many chapels demands a strong personality in the pulpit, or tediousness is not always avoided. Primitive Methodism will adapt its ritual to the intelligence, culture, and spirituality of its members, and absolute finality or rigid uniformity will not be sought.

But are spiritual dangers ever attendant upon excessive ritual? That depends largely upon the doctrines expressed by the rites. Considering the facts, we discover that the churches with the most elaborate ritual—the Greek and Roman—are in doctrine most untrue to the teaching of Jesus. The mischief wrought by Romanism is not simply on account of its multiplication of rites, but because of the injurious beliefs with which they are identified. Protestantism has varied considerably in the degree of ritual it has employed, but its rites have never been so damaging to morality and religion, because they have been associated with sound views on the sacraments, repentance, the rights of the intellect, and the position of the laity. Still, it never can be forgotten that, taking human nature as we find it, elaborate ritual easily becomes a refuge of the unspiritual. Men will substitute the form for the reality, and in slavish obedience to rites and ceremonies, will compound for moral delinquency. There are no more melancholy pages in Church history than those which record the disastrous results to the faith from the substitution of fasts, holy days, gifts, penances, and works for repentance, reparation, self-denial and obedience. In presence of ritual imposed on worshippers by a clergy, it is well to remember that men in the average do not easily maintain existence on high spiritual planes, and are only too facile in seeking to save the soul by forms, ceremonies, rites, and institutions. Herein lies the greatest danger. For the ritual we confront is not that which simply claims the right to express spiritual needs through its own forms—the right to do which we must concede—but a movement which makes the sacraments a superstition, emphasises the priestly power of the clergy, and unchristianises all who do not identify themselves with particular forms. Here is ritual elevated into a doctrine. This is ritualism. Make certain rites, offices, and institutions necessary to salvation, and the old error is repeated in teaching as doctrines, the commandments of men. This is not limiting the Almighty to a house made with hands, but it does limit Him to a rite formed by man's device. This is a deadly perversion of the use of ritual in worship, and is unworthy at once of God and human nature; for the first it belittles, and the second it degrades, limiting man's approach to God through the media of human inventions. Man is greater than any form of ritual, just as he is greater than any temple yet reared. If certain rites are found to produce evils inimical to the spirituality of worship, and to be destructive of direct access to God, then they must be condemned out of the larger interests of the human soul. The Christian life demands freedom:—"Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Rigid and enforced obedience to certain forms are as opposed to the Christian religion as an iron cage to an Alpine eagle. The Christian life in its full range will refuse to be bound for ever by ecclesiastical courts, officials, and conferences. The ritualists who assert that their rites are indispensably necessary to the Christian, cannot claim Jesus in support of their particular practices. Jesus laid no emphasis on rites and institutions, but upon pure practices and great beliefs.

ENOCH BOCKOCK.

THE OLD "ARMINIAN" METHODIST CHAPEL.

Wirksworth: A Glance at its History and Associations.

WIRKSWORTH, the metropolis of the lead-mining industry of Derbyshire, is a place of undoubted antiquity. It is situated in a valley thirteen miles N.N.E. from Derby, ten miles west from Alfreton, six miles north-west from Belper, and four miles south from Matlock. It is in railway communication with the Midland System by a branch line from Duffield. The scenery in the vicinity is picturesquely beautiful and even grand. The valleys hereabout are girded by high hills carpeted with woodlands, meadows, and studded with stupendous rocks curiously perforated over a large extent by old lead-mines.

The town was doubtless one of the mining settlements of the Romans, the lead-mines, on which for generations the prosperity of Wirksworth was dependent, being worked by them. "Pigs" of lead, bearing Roman inscriptions, have been found in the neighbourhood, and are now preserved in the British Museum. The town was an industrial centre under the Saxons, who also carried on extensive lead-mining works.

In 714, Eadburga, the Abbess of Repton, sent a leaden coffin from Wirksworth, to contain the remains of St. Guthlac, Prior of Croyland. In 835, Kenewara, Abbess of Repton, granted the Manor to Humbert the Alderman, on condition that he sent a yearly contribution of lead, to the value of 300 shillings, to be used at Christ Church, Canterbury.

Wirksworth was a place of importance when Liverpool was a marsh, when Manchester was in its infancy, and the great manufacturing cities of the North were unknown. It reached the full measure of its importance about 1850. In 1852, the vicar's tithe from a single mine amounted to £1,200. Owing, however, to the difficulty and expense of working, all the mines have now been discontinued, and, in consequence, for some years the town has been declining in prosperity. Limestone is quarried to a considerable extent. Beside this industry many of the inhabitants are employed in the Wirksworth and district tape, cotton and hosiery mills, and the "Cow Farms" of the neighbourhood forward daily supplies of milk to London and to nearly all the large cities of the kingdom.

The Moot Hall, Wirksworth, was built by the Duchy of Lancaster in 1814. The Barmote Courts, for settling all mineral disputes, are held here, and here also is kept the Miner's "Standard Dish," given by Henry VIII. It holds a little more than fourteen pints, and is used for testing all other dishes used for measuring lead ore. It is made of brass, and bears the following inscription:—"This dishe was made the iiij. Yere of the reign of Kyng Henry the VIII. before George, Erle of Shrowesbury, Steward of the Kyng's most honourable household, and also Steward of the honour of Tutbery, by the assent and consent as wele of all the Mynours as of all the Brenners, within and adjoyning the lordshyp of Wyrkysworth, percell of the said honour. This Dyshe to remayne at the Moot Hall at Wyrkysworth, hanging by a cheyne so as the Merchantes or Mynours may have resorte to the same at all tymes to make the tru mesure aft. the same."

The Wirksworth Grammar School was founded in 1576 by Anthony Gell, Esq. Its income from endowments amounts to about £230 per annum.

The British School, the first elementary school in the town, was established about fifty years ago, with accommodation for 320 scholars. We have also a large and prosperous State Church Day School, and no School Board as yet. A commodious Town Hall was erected in 1871, costing £7,000. The Wirksworth Temperance Society also has a useful Temperance Hall, with accommodation for 350 persons.

The various branches of Nonconformity are fairly well represented in the town and neighbourhood. Presbyterianism was established here soon after the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662. There is preserved a minute book of "The Wirksworth Presbyterian Classes" from 1561—1568, and amongst others, the name of the Rev. John Oldfield, an ejected minister from Carsington, about three miles distant, is mentioned. The members afterwards became "Independents," and are now known as Congregationalists. The chapel was rebuilt in 1873, at a cost of £1,500. During the progress of the work, a brick vault was discovered under the communion table, in which was a perfect male skeleton, supposed to be that of one of the early Puritan divines. The Baptists, who are the most prosperous of the Free Churches here, erected their first chapel in 1816. The present edifice, built in 1886, cost £3,000. There is a General and also a Baptist Cemetery, each under the control of their respective Boards.

It is said that when the late Dr. Doddridge's chapel at Northampton was being rebuilt in the year 1785, the late Rev. Jonathan Scott, the first minister of Glenorchy Chapel, at Matlock Bath, was then building a Congregational chapel for the colony of miners at Middleton-by-Wirksworth, about two miles from Matlock, and near the lovely and celebrated "Via Gellia." He begged, or bought, Dr. Doddridge's old Northampton pulpit, with its sounding-board and reading-desk, set it up at Middleton-by-Wirksworth, and there it still stands. The sounding-board and desk have vanished, though some of the old people remember them, but the identical old brass hat-peg remains, and also a receptacle for the preacher's watch.

The United Methodist Free Church was built in 1885, at a cost of £1,500. Under the chapel is a schoolroom capable of holding 300 children, in which may still be seen the identical pulpit, taken from a now disused "Arminian" Chapel still standing in St. John's Street, Wirksworth, from which the gentle but inspired "Methody" of "Adam Bede" used frequently to preach the old Gospel. It is still well known in the town as "Adam Bede's Chapel," and quite near the U.M.F.C. schoolroom. Several persons living in Wirksworth can "well remember" both Dinah and Adam. It was here the lead-miners, labourers, and stockinger mill-hands who gathered round her, listened as she, in her own sweet and tender style, pleaded with them "not to hate anything but sin, to be full of love to every creature, to be frightened at nothing, to be sure that all things will turn to good, not to mind pain, because it is our Divine Father's will, to know that nothing can part us from God, who loves us, and who fills our souls with peace and joy, because we are sure that whatever He wills is holy, just, and good." "Dinah and Adam Bede" passed the latter and greater portion of their lives in Wirksworth, and Adam died in an old-fashioned house, which, when you see it, must remind you of the "old curiosity shop" of Charles Dickens, and which is now occupied by one of our own old-fashioned members, a not distant relative of Adam's. It is reported that the saintly couple gave their Sabbath days to preaching and exhortation, often walking many miles to carry on the good work they had at heart. The cottage in which they lived, now called "Bede Cottage," is in Wirksworth, and also the "shop" in which for years Adam worked as a carpenter, and in which Primitive Methodist services have long been held, is on our circuit plan. Near the cottage, just across the road, also still standing, is the famous Haarlem Mill, now worked by the Messrs. Wheatcroft, good friends to all good causes. Through the mill flows "the brook" in which Adam's tippling father was found drowned. The hamlet is called "Miller's Green." Drinking and drunkenness, we regret to say, are still cursing many people in this beautiful neighbourhood. We opine that all readers of the most popular novel cannot but feel something more than a passing interest in these places hallowed by such footsteps.

Whether it be through the abiding name and influence of "Dinah Morris," I cannot say, but female preachers and female preaching continue to be a marked power at and around Wirksworth. The Rev. A. A. Birchenough informs us, that the

MRS. EVANS ('DINAH MORRIS.')

Rev. Hugh Bourne, one of the founders of our Connexion, "knew and conversed with 'Dinah Morris.'" It may have been that he encouraged and prayed for her in her preaching. Female preaching was not much encouraged at that time by the Wesleyan ministers and Conference, as the sequel will show. There are on the Wirksworth plan, though small, the names of no fewer than five or six devout women who take work in preaching Christ to the people, and several others in the other Free Churches in the town. From Carsington, in this circuit, in those days went out into the pioneer ministry of Primitive Methodism, that Christly, zealous, and eminently successful evangelist, Miss Sarah Kirkland, afterwards Mrs. Harrison, who, in Nottingham, Derby, Hull, and in the rural districts around these populous centres, led hundreds of souls to Christ, and joined them to the early societies of our Zion. The spiritual life and success of those Christ-filled women remind me of the wonderful salvation and service of "the woman of Samaria," who, after meeting with Christ, and seeing and being filled with His glory, "left her pitcher" and said to the people of the district, "Come, see a Man who told me all I ever did. Is not this the Christ?" And many of the Samaritans of Sychar believed on Him for the saying of the woman. May this Christ-kindled zeal and evangelistic power never die out, or even decline in the women of Methodism.

WIRKSWORTH ('SNOWFIELD') CHURCH.

I will conclude this paper with the following interesting account of the ancestry and Divine call of Adam and Dinah, taken chiefly from the Methodist Recorder.

Derby—the "Stoniton" of "Adam Bede"—is much more closely connected with George Eliot's heroine than appears from the novel, and in circumstances altogether different.

Derby Methodism is connected with "George Eliot," too, not in her relationship to the sweet Methodist saint whom she depicts only, but also in what she calls her "deliciously calm" friendship with Herbert Spencer, who was the son of Derby Methodists.

"An anecdote from the experience of George Eliot's Methodist aunt was the germ of 'Adam Bede,' and out of the novelist's recollections of that aunt grew the character of Dinah Morris. Quite recently (1896) the writer conversed with several persons who knew her well, and who heard her preach in and around Wirksworth."

Her maiden name was Elizabeth Tomlinson. Born at Newbold, in Leicestershire, when the Church she was afterwards to aid and adorn was producing prophetic evidences of permanence, in the erection of such buildings as City Road Chapel, she had the misfortune to lose her mother by death while still in infancy. The necessity for earning her own living brought her to Derby, to enter into service at the early age of fourteen. She appears to have lived for seven years with the same family. Methodist influences had probably operated upon her before leaving her village home, and in her new surroundings she marked the scarcity of heart-felt religion with the plenty of prayer book.

Removing to Nottingham, she exchanged domestic service for the more lucrative work of a lace-mender. It was a new life altogether, and to the young woman endowed with natural gifts of a certain order, it was a life which might have proved disastrous to her spiritual welfare. Worldly company, cards, dancing, the theatre, and other forms of amusement and pleasure, left her unhappy, and in this state of mind she went to a Methodist service. She fainted under the excitement; but she was enabled to date her conversion from that meeting. The change was complete, and her new life at once began to manifest itself in "deeds of week-day holiness." She visited the sick, and caught the infection of typhus while ministering to an afflicted family.

After her recovery, she visited Derby, and her Methodist friends constrained her to relate her religious and philanthropic experiences to the Society in St. Michael's Lane. Thus was she gradually brought into more public work.

At the Nottingham Assizes in 1801, a girl named "Mary Voce" was sentenced to death on a charge of child murder, and Miss Tomlinson, along with a sister Methodist, was permitted to visit her. Their solicitude and sympathy brought the condemned girl to conviction and penitence, and when she was conveyed to the place of public execution outside the town, her two friends accompanied her in the cart. This, stated briefly, was the story which "Mary Ann Evans" received from her aunt, and out of it, twenty years after, she shaped the character of "Hetty Sorrell," and what proved to be the most popular of her books.

The experience gained under such circumstances was not lost upon Elizabeth Tomlinson. Lace-mending being lucrative, she was enabled, by economy, and the late plying of her needle, to spend much time in ministering to the sick. She also spoke in public with such ability that her services were in request for distant places. She carried the glad evangel into Derbyshire and Staffordshire, and in so doing became acquainted with the young man who afterwards made her his wife.

Samuel Evans, (son of George Evans, and younger brother of Robert Evans), the "Adam" of his daughter's story, was born at Roston, near Ashbourne, in 1777. He (Samuel) joined the followers of Wesley as a young man, and soon became a class-leader and local preacher. He was invited by the members of his class to go with them to Ashbourne to hear a pious and devoted female from Nottingham preach. The preacher was Elizabeth Tomlinson, and upon the heart of Samuel Evans she unconsciously wrought an influence beyond that of her sermon. He found, however, upon becoming personally acquainted, that Miss Tomlinson was not disposed to entertain any thought of marriage. Nevertheless, he pressed his suit, and the young lady at length yielded. In reading "Adam Bede," most people feel that "Seth" and "Dinah" were intended for each other, and, undoubtedly, it was an ill suggestion of George Lewes which made it otherwise in the novel. The fact is finer than the fiction from any point of view.

In the Church of St. Mary, at Nottingham, Samuel Evans was married to Elizabeth Tomlinson on August 20, 1804. They first took up their residence at Roston, on the Derbyshire bank of the Dove, and their evangelistic labours in this and the neighbouring villages resulted in religious revival and the establishment of new societies. Entire sanctification had been enjoyed, at least by Mrs. Evans, from the early days of her discipleship; and it is not surprising to learn, from the diary of one who heard her preach at Chellaston, on January 3, 1808, that perfection without any bounds, was her theme.

About eight years after marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Evans moved with their family from Roston to Derby. Here they exercised afresh their religious zeal as members of the King Street Society, and the philanthropic work of the wife brought her under the stimulating notice of Elizabeth Fry. Seven years later they left Derby for Wirksworth, and in their cottage beside the Haarlem tape-mill, they were visited by George Eliot.

Their Christian activities were continued in many directions, and as local preachers their names appeared on the Cromford Circuit plan up to 1832, when an event occurred which caused their temporary secession.

In the preceding year the doctrinal division, originated by a schoolmaster and local preacher named Breedon, had caused a severance from the Derby Society of about three hundred members, who formed themselves into a new sect, called "Arminian Methodists." This "Derby Faith," as it was dubbed, was also carried as far as Wirksworth. The Conference of 1832, in discussing the case, came to an understanding that women preachers should not be encouraged, and the Rev. Thomas Fletcher, superintendent of the Cromford Circuit, suggested to Mrs. Evans, on Dr. Bunting's advice, that instead of her name appearing on the plan, her appointments should be designated by a mark, dropping the figure number. Mrs. Evans declined to comply, and with her husband, joined the "Armians," whose services were held in a room formed out of two cottages, now a coachbuilder's workshop, in St. John's Street, Wirksworth.

The separation, though of some years' duration, was not permanent, and Mr. and Mrs. Evans both died members of the Wesleyan Methodist Society. In 1849, "Evans—Wirksworth" stood as No. 23 among the local preachers on the Cromford plan. Ten years afterwards, the late Rev. Thomas Sheldon, who preached Mr. Evans' funeral sermon in the Wirksworth Wesleyan Chapel, placed this obituary notice on the printed plan:—

"Brother Evans departed this life, in the peace and faith of Christ, December 8th, 1858, aged eighty-one years, having been a preacher of the Gospel fifty years.

"He sleeps in Jesus and is blest;
How sweet his slumbers are!
From sufferings and from woes released,
And freed from every snare."

Thus, while George Eliot's story was being printed in Edinburgh, her uncle passed from pleasant "Snowfield," (Wirksworth), to the rest already enjoyed by his faithful partner. Their earthly parts are interred at Wirksworth, and in the Wesleyan Chapel there may be seen the mural tablet, a reproduction of which is here given:—

"Erected by numerous friends to the memory of Elizabeth Evans, known to the world as 'Dinah Bede,' who during many years proclaimed alike in the open-air, the sanctuary, and from house to house, the love of Christ. She died in the Lord, Nov. 9, 1849, aged seventy-four years. And of Samuel Evans, her husband, who was also a faithful local preacher and class-leader in the Methodist Society. He finished his earthly course December 11, 1858, aged eighty-one years."

The Grass.

BEAUTIES in profusion, for His children here,
Made our Heavenly Father in earth's first bright year;

Sun to rule the day-time, moon and stars the night,
Bird and bee and blossom, yielding us delight;
And—Creation's palace filling full of grace,— Caused He the soft grass to spring up in many a place.

And, though o'er that glory fell sin's dark'ning sway,
And no angel-footsteps hear we by the way;
But though Death's still river now parts heaven and earth,

And man's gifts are fewer than at that sweet birth;
Yet still—Love's own token—'neath our feet is laid,
This—the world's first carpet, by God's wisdom made.

On the mount it smileth, more than beautiful,
Nor the lowliest valley finds too dark or dull;
Rough and stony road-side smoothing for the feet,
And its friends, the dew-drops, telling secrets sweet, Meadow, wood, and orchard; field and lane grow gay,
For their soft green mantle, hiding dark decay.

Yea, a joy and beauty, and a wondrous thing,
Is the fair, frail grass-growth wheresoe'er it cling;
Wearing flowers as jewels, charming rich and poor,
Growing round the palace or the cottage door,—
And when—cleaving heaven—thanks to God shall pass
For His gifts, we'll think how one is the fresh, green grass.

The Shelf of Honour ;

OR, BOOKS THAT HAVE MOVED ME.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH RITSON, AUTHOR OF "LOST AND WON," ETC.

"CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY."

METHODIST novel, written with sympathy and insight by the daughter of an ex-Cabinet minister. A wonderful thing, surely! Methodism has not unfrequently been the subject of the novelist's art. It were strange, indeed, if one of the greatest social and religious forces of the century had escaped the notice of those who aim at the portrayal of our modern life. It has been described both from the inside and the outside, and with varying degrees of success. Each method may be said to have had the defects of its qualities. The outside student of the great movement has too often failed to apprehend its true inwardness, and the result has been mere caricature. Those on the other hand who have written from personal knowledge and experience, have lacked the sense of proportion necessary to commend their work to the great world outside the pale of Methodism.

But at last we have a novel largely dealing with Methodist life by one who blends the advantages of both points of view. Here is a writer who may be said to be both in Methodism and in society, and to possess, in consequence, something of the mental detachment necessary to a view of the subject at once sympathetic and just on the one hand, and in true perspective and proportion on the other. It were too much, perhaps, to claim that Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler has seen Methodism steadily, and seen it whole; but she has come nearer that desirable consummation than any writer of her class. Her book as a consequence, has not been read merely by Methodists, but by many who know nothing of Methodism save from the merest hearsay. Society has got a new idea of Methodism from the pages of this extremely clever writer, and one calculated to awaken a good deal of surprise.

The book came into my hands just before starting for my holiday last summer. It is not every work of fiction that is suited to a holiday. Even holiday conditions may inflict an injustice on an author, involving a verdict very much less favourable than would have been given under different circumstances. But "Isabel Carnaby" proved a delightful holiday book. It got full justice, and contributed distinctly to the enjoyment of the time. Not but what the holiday resort was of itself admirable. Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, it was eminently calculated to give rest and refreshment. More than once it has figured in the pages of our Connexional writers of fiction, under the name of Alwood; but, perhaps, it has been most felicitously described by "the youngest Miss Jones" in the extremely clever article she contributed to this Magazine, on "How I went in for Metaphysics." "It is the highest, and I believe the smallest market-town in England. Imagine a background of hills and pine-woods, a handful of grey stone houses flung haphazard against the side of a bleak fell, and one steep street paved with cobbles, ascending hurriedly from the railway station in the valley to the little church, then turning an abrupt corner, threading a queer old archway,—with houses, and even a little shop, built over it,—and climbing higher and higher,—a very Excelsior of a street,—until it leaves the last house behind, and runs out rejoicing upon the open moor! That was Felston, as we knew it. In spring and summer it was lovely; loveliest of all, perhaps, on still autumn afternoons, when the rowan-berries were ripe, and the first magical touch of frost had turned the beeches and elms along the little river to wonderful gold and crimson, against the blue-green and emerald of Scotch firs and larches."

Well, my holiday at Felston fell in the sweet summer time, and I can heartily endorse the description of the "Youngest Miss Jones." But charming as the place is, it is indebted to "Isabel Carnaby" for an added charm, so far as my memories of that holiday are concerned. Can a genuine lover of books be content to spend a holiday anywhere without a literary friend, old or new? He may leave behind him the solid tomes which grace his library shelves. They are friends indeed, to whom he resorts for comfort and inspiration in the stress and struggle of every-day life; but for that very reason he must bid them au revoir when he goes for his annual holiday. He will return to them with new zest by and by, and tell himself how good it is to look once more on their dear familiar faces. But for his holiday he must, in every sense, if possible, betake himself to fresh woods and pastures new.

Well, "Isabel Carnaby" was new in every sense. The book had not been long published, and I congratulated myself on having such a treat in store for my holiday. Had I not a vivid remembrance of some singularly fine poems from the pen of Miss Ellen Thomeycroft Fowler that had appeared in "The Speaker"; and some almost too brilliant articles in "The Young Man"? The weather was fine, and I found cycling down the tremendous hills at a break-neck speed decidedly exhilarating, except on one occasion, when I came to a rather sudden and inconvenient stop at a sharp turn at the bottom. Going up the hills is, well, another pair of shoes, as Mr. Hall Caine would say. But there is one splendid spin which would repay for almost any climb. When you reach the top you find yourself on an almost perfect road, nearly as smooth as a board, and descending for miles with a gradient just steep enough to enable you to put your feet up and let the machine go. As you spin down that magnificent road—surely the finest in all England—you presently find a beautiful valley opening out before you. I may be pardoned if I think it the most charming in the world.

"Déar lovely bowers of innocence and ease,
Scenes of my youth, when every sport could please;
How often have I paused on every charm:
The sheltered cot, the cultivated farm;
The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that topped the neighbouring hill."

Or, if you take an opposite direction, you have a long, steady pull of some five miles. The road was constructed by Macadam himself, and is a perfect marvel in its way. When you reach the top you look down on a magnificent stretch of richly cultivated country over which the eye travels till it catches the shimmer of the far-off waters of the Solway Firth. Then you turn your face home-wards, and enjoy the glorious spin of five miles down hill.

This was all delightful, but "Isabel Carnaby" gave delights of another kind. "That must be a rare book!" said my friends, as they heard me chuckling over some tit-bit, or indulging in a good hearty laugh. I was not unaware of the fact that there is something irritating in hearing a person thus enjoying jokes of which the rest of the company are in ignorance. But occasionally I felt constrained to read out aloud to the company some specially delightful bon mot. It is not always that such quotations commend themselves to the listener. Something of the reader's pleasure is due to the setting, and his knowledge of the characters; and it says not a little for the quality of my quotations that they were generally relished, and everybody was longing for a turn at the book. Perhaps the reader thinks it is quite time he had a turn at it too, and that in more senses than one.

The dedication of the volume runs thus:

"To Mine Own People: meaning those within
The magic ring of home—my kith and kin;

And those with whom my soul delights to dwell—
Who walk with me as friends, and wish me well;

And lastly those—a large, unnumbered band,
Unknown to me—who read and understand."

And the band is much larger than the authoress probably expected. Her publisher can tell her how many editions the book has run through—some fourteen by this time, we judge—but he cannot tell her the number of her readers, still less the proportion of those who "read and understand." But if every copy of the book has been read and appreciated like mine, then the number who "read and understand" will be somewhere about ten or twelve times the number of copies sold. A friend of mine, who is, by the way, an ex-Vice-President of the Conference, declares it is the cleverest book he ever read. Our most eminent Connexional evangelist was so entranced with the book that he must have got very little sleep for several nights; and a common subject of debate among those who have read "Isabel Carnaby," is whether the book is not after all far too clever and brilliant. Those who take the affirmative can always console themselves with the reflection that the affliction is not a common dispensation, and so may well make shift to endure it.

With the mere story of the book we need not here concern ourselves. There is little in the way of a plot. The author's forte is conversation, and she wisely makes the most of it. Were the conversations not so good readers would weary of page after page of that commodity. But they do not weary, but like Oliver Twist, ask for more. I shall best serve those who have not yet made the acquaintance of the book by confining myself to a few quotations. This would not be fair in many cases, but here you cannot do more than give samples, for however much you display there will always be plenty left. There are some brilliant pictures of society in the book, but it is with the clever and sympathetic portrayal of Methodism we are mainly concerned. Only a Methodist could have hit off so accurately the essential characteristics of the religious community founded by John Wesley. How true is the remark that "one of the most noteworthy characteristics of 'the people called Methodists' is the esprit de corps—the spirit of clannishness—which runs through the whole body." An excellent feature, and yet liable, as we know, to degenerate into a defect. We Primitive Methodists are not in danger of allowing that spirit to become too strong with us. I remember as a boy being struck with this difference between the Wesleys and ourselves in my native Dale—and in all essentials what Wesleyans were in that remote Dale I have found them to be all over the land; the type is everywhere repeated. If the Wesleyans got hold of a young convert, no matter under whom he had found the blessing, they employed all their arts to persuade him that nowhere would he be so likely to get on well religiously as with them. The Primitives on the other hand, even with those who were converted at their services, were in the habit of saying, "Now if you think you would find the most help in your religious life with us we shall be glad to welcome you into fellowship; but we want you to go where you will feel most at home." And this I know was done from no feeling of indifference, but from a fine sense of honour, and a hatred of anything savouring of proselytising, or as they would have called it, "sheep-stealing." A little bit more of the Wesleyan esprit de corps, providing it did not go too far, would add greatly to the strength of Primitive Methodism.

As has been indicated, the pictures of Methodist character in "Isabel Carnaby" are charming, and full of insight and sympathy. This is true even of Mrs. Martin and her husband, who "imagined they were a very godly couple because they attended chapel regularly, and had their library lined with calf-bound copies of the Methodist Magazine, dating from its Arminian days." It is true there is more insight than sympathy in the portrayal of this couple, but the sympathy is not wholly lacking. Then the Superannuated minister, Mr. Seaton and his wife, are delightfully sketched. Their simplicity and unworldliness, their self-sacrifice and devotion, their true refinement, and their high sense of honour render them altogether lovable. Then there is that dear old maid, Miss Drusilla Dallicot, who came so gallantly, and with such tact and delicacy, to the minister's rescue. Was ever such a rare combination of the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove? How some people would have hurt and offended the sensitive high-minded old gentleman by that loan or gift of five hundred pounds! But Miss Dallicot made him feel he was conferring a favour. Then Joanna, the minister's daughter, and the Fords, are all admirable in their way. But the gem of the book, Methodistically, is old Martha, the minister's servant. Her shrewdness and mother wit, her clever yet caustic tongue, her real kindness and devotion to her master and mistress, and her quaint religious philosophy make her a boon and a blessing to men—and women. Her sister had lost her hair in a serious illness, and this is how Martha reasoned about it:—

"I hope you said something comforting to your sister, Martha," said Joanna.

"Yes, Miss, I did, and something edifying too, I trust. 'Eliza Ann,' says I, 'if you have been ugly here, you will be handsome enough in heaven, never fear. Much beauty you never had; but, such as it is, you gave it to the Lord, and He will pay it back in His own good time.'"

"Then do you think that what we give up here will be made up to us hereafter?"

"Certainly so," replied Martha cheerfully: "the Lord tells us in His Holy Word to owe no man anything; so it isn't likely that He will remain in debt Himself. Trust Him, if we give Him our health, or wealth, or beauty, it will be repaid, some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred-fold."

"I wonder if we shall be beautiful in heaven?" said Joanna.

"Of course we shall, my dear, if we want to be," replied Martha; "if the Lord lets us wish for anything very much, He means to fulfil that wish, either in this world or the next, or else He would never let us go on wishing it."

"Then do you think every one will be made good-looking in heaven?"

"I do, Miss Joanna. It will be a big job with some of us, I admit; but the Lord will manage it, never fear."

"Still it seems wrong and selfish, somehow, to wish very much for beauty," persisted Joanna, who, being younger and less wise than her mother, was addicted to argument. "Mrs. Martin was talking about this the other day, and she said she considered the mere desire to be beautiful was a form of sinful vanity."

"Perhaps she is of a contented disposition, and has brought her mind to her circumstances, as the saying is," suggested Martha, who always scented battle at the mere mention of Mrs. Martin. This excellent lady had a wonderful knack of teaching people their place—a form of education which does not add to the popularity of the instructor.

"So Joanna and her old nurse, like the true Methodists that they were, talked familiarly together about holy things; and this familiarity arose not from any lightness or irreverence, but from the fact that to them such things were so near and real that they became as household words. The Methodists of the past generation lived always with their lamps lit and their loins girded, as those that wait for their Lord; and they sought so diligently for the true that they had no leisure to look for the beautiful, for it had not yet been revealed to them that the True and the Beautiful are one."

It has been a positive pain to cut that last quotation short; but there is no help for it. And yet there is another glimpse of old Martha I must give, even at the risk of incurring the editor's displeasure at such encroachments on his space.

"Martha," said Mrs. Seaton to her faithful handmaid, "it goes to my heart to say it, but I fear we cannot keep you with us any longer."

"Well, to be sure, ma'am!" exclaimed Martha, in unfeigned surprise. "And what may have put such a notion as that into your head? You'll be talking about giving the minister notice next."

"The fact is, Martha, that we can no longer afford so valuable a maid as yourself. Now that our circumstances are changed, we can only keep one servant for the very rough work, and Miss Joanna and I must do the rest ourselves."

"Well, I'm glad to hear that it is the money-question that has put you thus beside yourself, ma'am, and not any dissatisfaction with me. Not that I should have left, even if such had been the case; I should have stayed with you for your own good, even though you had given me notice twenty times a day. Bless you, ma'am, if I wasn't here to look after you all, the whole place would go to rack and ruin."

"You are right, Martha. Home would not be home without you."

"Then don't multiply words any more, ma'am, or talk nonsense about my going away. I have made up my mind to stay with you all, and not to take any wages whatsoever; and when Martha Prosser puts her foot down, all the king's horses and all the king's men can't pick it up again."

"But, dear Martha, we can't let you go on serving us without wages."

"And why not, I should like to know? What do I want with wages? My face is too plain for me to care to spend money on my back—which is no secret, being there for all the world to see. And I don't hold with saving, ma'am. Money is like manna, to my thinking; it is all very well to supply the needs of the passing day, but when you begin to save it up it does not improve with keeping."

"Yet we should all of us lay by what we can for our old age," suggested Mrs. Seaton.

"I don't hold with that neither. It is a poor compliment, to my mind, to say, 'The Lord will provide,' and then bolster Him up with a bank-book, as if He couldn't do His part of the business without our assistance. My conscience alive! If we'll only do our part properly, He'll do His, never fear!"

The minister's wife did not reply in words; but she threw her arms round Martha's neck, and sobbed out her griefs and her gratitude on that faithful breast.

I have not told all that Martha did on that occasion; but the reader will by this time be ready to order the book and see the rest for himself. Then he will learn all about the hero and heroine, both of whom are exceedingly interesting. Is not the book named after the heroine? And surely, if the mere accidents of the book are so interesting, the essentials must be much more so. And this remarkable picture of Methodism has been written by the daughter of a Cabinet minister whose name has even been mentioned as a future Liberal Prime Minister! A significant sign of the times without doubt! Truly the whirligig of time brings strange revenges!

How the Organist was Converted.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE.

HERE was no place like "Rosehill" to David Dale. In other churches he had been occasionally, but he had never seen nor heard anything which put him out of love with his own. For him, at least, there never had been, there never could be, a place for prayer like the chapel on the mount.

In this he was simply representative of the entire company of worshippers. Their pride and pleasure in "Rosehill" was the congregational characteristic. With them, there was no building to challenge comparison. The order of the services, and the efficiency of the procedures of worship were as nearly ideal as anything human could be. Partial they were to their own, and the prejudice was justifiable. It was understood that other churches proceeded on different lines. To them, it mattered not. Envy would have been ridiculous. They pitied those who lacked the wisdom to imitate and emulate the example set at "Rosehill."

But the music was the crowning glory. It always had been. Even in the old place, when David Dale had played the double-bass, and Bobby Turner had flourished the bow of the first fiddle with extemporised variations, the chapel had been reputed for the excellence of its praise. Things were different. The mighty organ, with its keyboards three, and its stops innumerable, had superseded the little harmonium which had done service in the earlier times. "The musicianers" as Bobby Turner designated the instrumentalists, had no place in the organ-gallery, but there was the organ, a band in itself, and the organist, who was as good as fifty.

What music there was, was in manuscript then. It was a sad day for Bobby when he received the information that the written music would be no longer needed. He went to Mr. Dale to inquire if he had knowledge of the revolution which was being enacted.

"These young folks won't have the scores any longer, Bobby!" the engineer explained. "The fact is," he whispered confidentially, "they cannot read them. The quavers give them the quivers. Pricked music is like Chinese to these youngsters. Unless it is all there before their eyes, on the music-stands, printed, printer's printing, on the lines and in the spaces, they're bamboozled completely." Finally it was agreed that the manuscripts should be equally divided between Bobby and Mr. Dale, Bobby to have his choice of the portion to be his.

The times had changed, but the musical glory had not departed. Enhanced it had been, and prouder than ever were the folks of "Rosehill" of the music of instrument, and the music of voice. The excellence was many-sided. Famous was the singing of the congregation. Clever were the performances of the choir; and as for solos, duets, trios, and quartettes, where could be found another group of choristers where every singer owned a voice fit to be heard alone?

The music was the crowning glory, and the crown was the glory of the organist. The equal of Frank Wraithe had never been seen. When the organ was formally opened, recitals were given by the masters of the king of instruments; from the Cathedrals they had come, but they departed, Frank's glory undimmed, his sovereignty unquestioned. Was there anything he could not make the organ do? That it was a magnificent mechanism was indisputable, but the perfection of the instrument did not explain the wonder. Other hands had touched the keys, and the organ had secreted its spell. It would do anything for Frank, and everything. When he was seated, it would sing for him, and shout and swell, and laugh, and whistle. It would yell with pain and scream with delight. You could hear it whispering sweetly, pleading gently, weeping softly. Then it would shout for joy, and peal aloud, and roar in triumph.

He could humour it to imitate every sound, in air, on land or sea. Accompanying the hymns, the organ produced illustrative harmony. The people were singing the words, the organ provided the descriptions. Singing the hymns of the harvest, you could hear the waving of the corn-stalks, the switch of the scythe, the songs of the reapers. In the Hymnal there were hymns of storms, and even 'mid the singing, the wind was whistling overhead, the sails were snapping and crashing, the lightning was blinding the eye, and the thunder-claps were shaking the earth.

It was wonderful what the organ was willing to do for Frank. Far up the hills was the trickling it might well have been through the strain he put upon it, but when he called, it answered; when he touched, it breathed; when he commanded, it obeyed.

There was music in the soul of the organist, in his fingers and in his feet. He was never known to have been baffled by any piece of music. Keys and pedals were in his mastery. The foreigners idolised him, and were credited in consequence with fine musical discrimination. When the German Baron was at Woodlea Hall, he was impatient to be in time at the chapel to hear the opening voluntary, and kept his seat till the last tone of the voluntary concluding the service.

In Bobby Turner's front room were the pictures of the preachers. All were of the self-same style, and framed in black and gold. They were the likenesses of the old itinerants, and had been cut out of the magazines. Bobby had known them all. The swiftest entry to the old man's heart was an appreciation of the likenesses, and an inquiry as to the life and labours of the old-time preachers. Then Bobby was at his best. He was on his feet on the instant, his face aglow, his heart aflame, and the names of the "mighty men," their gifts and graces, their sermons and prayers, their toils and sufferings, their gallantries and exploits, would be recited with enthusiastic ardour. He had been longer a member than Mr. Dale, and had been known to remind the master of the fact. In the feeble days he had been one of the faithful few. The offices had been held by him, and, in the room where the pictures were hanging, the very men had taken tea.

In the centre of the widest wall was a copy of the Connexion's first printed plan, and immediately beneath was a preacher's portrait. Old-fashioned was the likeness. A kindly face it was, clean-shaven, with the head slightly leaning to the side, a tuft of hair creeping to the forehead, the stock and front of peerless white. "Ay, that's his father!" Bobby would say, "John Wraithe. Many a time he's sat in the chair ye're sittin' in, an' talked of the Lord an' His ways. Well respected was John Wraithe! No, he wasn't what might be called a great preacher, but sound and solid, a feedin' preacher. He was up in the graces, an' adorned them hissel'. A quiet inoffensive body, he was; as gentle as a woman, an' as meek as a bairn. The places grew that got him, which couldn't always be said of the big preachers. Wherever he travelled, the societies thrived, the means were attended, the peace was kept, and the Gospel was glorified."

The organist was the son of the minister. John Wraithe had settled near "Rosehill" when he became a supernumerary. His rest on earth was brief. When he passed to the life beyond, his widow and son retained the dwelling.

"YOU COULD HEAR THE WAVING OF THE CORNSTALKS."

spring. The organ would take up the gurgle. The widow was praying. That organ could repeat every word, even the tone, the heart-breaks, and the hesitations of voice. A child was lost in the wood. The organ knew all about it, and would help the lost one to be found. It could shout like him, with pathos and keen desire, in the silence of the midnight's darkness. A lark was singing in the air, high up in the blueness of the sky. That organ was listening, and could sing the lark's song with bewitching precision.

For no one else would that organ exert itself. It was the slave of the man who loved it. Tired

Frank was a commercial, and "the swell" of the place. Even Bobby Turner was proud of him, week-days and Sundays, when he saw the lithesome figure, the firm and fearless tread, the eyes that danced with life, the clothes of perfect pattern, and the linen which glistened in the sunlight.

That he was keen for business was well understood. All the rumours of the envy of the business-houses to secure his services for the expansion of their interests were easily credited. Everybody liked him—the old as well as the young. His cheeriness and cleverness were captivating. And then, he was his mother's only son, and she was a widow. Never was a son like him—lavish with his money, solicitous with care, constant in affection. All this was known, and the knowledge was in the favour of the organist.

Bobby Turner had entered his protest, and never withdrawn it. The organ was the gift of David Dale, but the appointment of the organist was the prerogative of the trustees. Bobby was one of that august body. He was the time-keeper at the "Excelsior" Works, but in the vestry, where the trustees transacted business, he was on a par with his employer. Numerous applications had been received for the honour of the organist's position. The minister was in the chair, and broke the seals and read the letters of the candidates. Foregone was the conclusion. It was known that Frank would apply, and applying would be appointed. No other name was mentioned when the applications and the testimonials had been presented. Frank's letter was the briefest of them all. He had not troubled to seek commendations. His name was the only one before the meeting.

Bobby protested. "I knew an' loved his father," he said. His voice was trembling, and he was nervously fingering the leather boot-lace which served as a watch-chain on week-days. "John Wraith was one of the best of men, an' his memory is dear to me. An' as for Mister Frank, we're fond o' him. I like him as much as ye." Bobby was looking at the engineer. "He's a brave lad, is Mister Frank, an' good to his mother. He's fond o' music, in with the theory, an' up in the practical. But he's not religious." His eyes were on the minister's face. "I say he's not religious. He's never had a change of heart. He lacks the godly fear. It may be all right for the astres to have unconverted 'musicianers,' but in the Lord's House ye want the spirit as well as the understanding in the songs of Zion. In the old place, as Mr. Dale will remember, we had a rule that only converts could sit in the choir-box. If Mister Frank was a member, he'd hev my vote in his favour, both hands. He lacks the one thing needful; an' he'll never be there wi' my god will."

There was no other nomination before the meeting. The chairman appealed for a unanimous vote.

"Those in favour of the appointment of Mr. Frank Wraith, kindly show by holding up the right hand!"

"Are there any against the appointment?" the minister inquired, when he had counted the votes in agreement. "I'm against!" Bobby exclaimed, "and always will be!"

Then it was that the organist's reign began. The music became increasingly distinctive. Four hymns had been the order. A fifth was added. The organ was heard in the voluntary introducing, and the voluntary completing each service. In the anthem, the choir was in evidence. The repetition of the last two lines of every hymn had been the luxury of Bobby Turner, but the organist issued the fiat against it. Bobby would have defied the tyranny, but the despot made defiance impossible by playing the last line with variations for over a minute and a half.

Bobby made it his business to speak his mind to the man of the music. "Mister Frank," he said, "ye're very aggravatin' wi' yer new-fangled ways. What would yer sainted father hev said if he'd found the music shortenin' the sermon? He liked the old ways, he did, the last lines over again, an' plenty of time for the preachin'." The old man's reverential affection for his father would have checked the hasty speech, even if that had been possible to the organist's kindly heart. Patiently he listened to Bobby's complaints, but never pretended to engage in argument.

Bobby was horrified. His eyes were tightly closed. His hands were clasped in prayer. The minister had been leading the devotions of the congregation, and Bobby was expecting him to repeat the Lord's Prayer. The organist had touched a key; the choir was chanting the prayer the Lord had spoken. Bobby did what he had never done for long, long years. He opened one eye, and peeped between his fingers. It was no mistake. They were singing from music.

The same Sabbath he was affrighted anew. It was the evening service, and the benediction had been pronounced. Without a word of warning, the organ softly breathed a chord, and the choir was singing the Vesper Hymn:

"Lord, keep us safe this night,
Secure from all our fears;
May angels guard us while we sleep,
Till morning light appears."

It was the Sabbath succeeding, and the organist committed an outrage. The hymn before the sermon had been sung, and Bobby had seated himself at ease to listen to the discourse. Whatever could Mister Frank mean? He had performed the variations on the final line, and now he was playing another piece. Surely he must be absent-minded! He was keeping the congregation waiting. Why didn't the minister stand up and command him to cease? It was disgraceful. Not content with an innings at the start, and another at the finish, he rushed in at the middle as well. Bobby was distressed, and relieved his mind at the next convocation of the trustees. He was perfectly amazed that his brethren treated the matter so lightly; those indeed, who spoke had nothing but good to say of the organist's programme.

The old man demanded an explanation from Mister Frank of the voluntary in mid-service. "I thought the idea was a happy inspiration, Mr. Turner!" the luckless organist replied. "Mr. Kent was complaining of the coughing which always greeted him when he announced his text, so I offered to supply the soothing-syrup, and you see how quiet they all are after I have dosed them with the extra physic. The minister has repeatedly thanked me for gaining him such stillness and attention." Bobby had nothing to say, nevertheless his antagonism was pronounced.

Curious are the contradictions of the heart. Conscientious was Bobby Turner in his opposition to Frank Wraith's appointment, and sincere was he in his criticisms of the innovations. He spoke his mind, and spoke it to the culprit personally. Ominous were his prognostications concerning the organist's future, and nothing but evil could come to the church which had elected him to the organ's manipulation. But when outsiders ventured to refer to the minister's son in tones disparaging, presuming to find an eager auditor in Bobby Turner, Mister Frank had a valiant champion. The critics were covered with confusion by the old man's vigorous defence. "Show me his like!" he would passionately demand of them. "He's all your fathers in the music-line. The best of everything's at 'Rosehill.' We're proud of the organist, an' fond of him."

So simply it happened. The organist was led to prayer, and it was a prayer of Bobby's which taught him the need and the way. It was 7.30 of the Sabbath night, and the service was over. The great majority of the congregation had retired. In the centre pews of the body of the chapel were the few who remained to pray. At the rail of the communion stood the minister ready to announce a hymn when the organist had finished the selection from the oratorio. Frank Wraith was adjusting his music, and closing the organ. The chapel-keeper was putting out the up-stair lights. The prayer-meeting few were singing a hymn with a chorus. Frank remembered a blind man playing a street harmonium, and singing the plaintive theme. "For you I am praying; I'm praying for you," was the refrain. They were mostly aged people who had tarried with the preacher, and the singing was feeble and uneven. Bobby Turner was feeling free, and was singing lustily. There was a smile on the organist's face as he turned the key of the organ's lock. He was thinking of Bobby, not uncharitably, but with innocent amusement.

The organist had gone. The galleries were deserted. The voice of prayer was heard.

Frank Wraith was on the step of the home-door, when he remembered he had forgotten the sonata he had wished to practise privately. He had left it in the organ. Down the street he hastened, and though the stair to the organ-gallery was in total darkness, so well he knew the way that no false step impeded ascent. On tip-toe he crept to the familiar place, cautiously turned the key, and obtained the copy he desired.

Bobby Turner was praying. It was characteristic of the old man to address the Almighty as though He were sitting close at hand, and inviting his confidence.

Why did he hesitate? The music for which he had returned was in his hand. Frank Wraith was trembling. Bobby was telling the Lord about him.

"And now, my Father," the old man was saying, "there's that other matter I mentioned to Tha this mornin'. I was telling Tha about Mister Frank; an' beggin' Tha to get him saved. Thoo has his father up there beside Tha, an' he'll hev told Tha about the lad. I fear my friend John will not hev realised all that he hoped he would. Him an' me used to sing together—

'An' when I lose this stammerin' tongue
I'll sing as loud as they.'

He'll hev lost the stammerin' tongue, but he'll still be stammerin' when he thinks of Mister Frank. . . . He's a grand lad, is Mister Frank, my Father, an' a bonny good musicianer, an' a rare good lad to his mother. He just wants the needful, the one thing, the change of heart, the life that Jesus gives. I thowt Tha would hev done it before now, but Tha'll hev some good reason for bidin' awhile. My Father, hev a word wi' Mister Frank, an' get things settled, an' then the music here will be bad to beat, an' my friend John will be able to sing without a stammer."

Frank Wraith was on his knees in the dark and silent gallery. The simple prayer of his father's friend had opened the flood-gates of his memory. His father's face was near him; the voice of the dead was speaking; the prayers of the past were repeated. His spirit's deeps were troubled. He had known the holiest influences, and been the object of the dearest solicitude. The best within him was in the ascendant. Thronging his mind were the past's reminiscences. He was bathed in tears, and praying—praying that his sins might be forgiven, and for the sense of peace. The praying souls were singing the Doxology. Frank was on his feet, and though his lips refused to sing, there was praiseful gratitude in his soul.

Frank Wraith was at the class-meeting on the Tuesday night. Bobby Turner looked at him sharply when he entered. The old man knew not what to think. "What's tha want here, Mister Frank?" he asked, suspicion in every tone.

"Do you not want new members?" Frank replied.

"The Lord be praised! Signs and wonders! My friend John will know, an' what a time they'd hev in heaven. Now he'll be singin' in style! The Lord be praised!" And Bobby was gripping the organist's hand, and shaking it vigorously.

David Dale was in the doorway, his face the picture of surprise. Whatever could this mean? The tale was told with much diffidence, and yet with great thankfulness. The leader was beaming; Bobby was weeping; the meeting was an ecstasy.

There had been numerous conversions at the communion-rail, but none in the organ-gallery. The organist's was the first. It was not the last. Frank's membership was the beginning of the enrolment of the choir.

The son of the minister is as great a "swell" as ever, and as eager for business. There has been no change in the order of service at "Rosehill." No change is needed. Bobby Turner's satisfaction is complete. It was the organist for whom he feared, not the voluntaries. The music is right to him, now that the "musicianer" is right with the Lord. He is blissfully happy when the Nunc Dimittis is sung. The words express his feelings. "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace . . . for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation."

Dr. R. W. Dale as a Mystic.

HERE are few men who present so many interesting aspects of character and work as Dr. Dale. In each aspect of his character, as in each aspect of his work, there are men to equal him; but in the many-sidedness of his character and work he has very few equals. There were few great movements of his time in which he did not take part, giving to them his splendid powers without stint. He was a great force in the political world, as educationalist and liberationist. It may be doubted whether it was wise for a man in his position to devote so much time and energy to political movements. The same time and energy spent in other directions might have yielded richer fruit. Certain it is that he himself came to doubt the wisdom of it. As a preacher he won a reputation for eloquence and power second only to Mr. Spurgeon, and as a theologian he has enriched our literature with many books of permanent value. Moreover, his name stands for a union of evangelical fervour and ethical power that is all too rare. Among his books will be found one on The Ten Commandments, and another on The Epistle of James; but to speak of him simply as an ethical teacher, as that term is generally understood, would betray a lamentable ignorance of our subject. We often distinguish between the ethical and the spiritual teacher; but why, we cannot say. The true spiritual teacher is always the ethical teacher. The highest ethics will ever be found linked to the deepest spirituality. We at once cite Dr. Dale as a proof and illustration of this. In one aspect of his being he was a mystic; but mystic does not mean dreamer, a man whose abode is in the clouds. The mystical element in his life and teaching ever showed a strong ethical bent; and it is to this mystical element in Dale, wedded as it is to a fine ethical tendency, that we purpose to limit this paper.

To Dr. Dale ethics simply meant the Living Christ applied to the various questions of daily life. Christ was not only Christianity—He was applied Christianity. He always had a high and accurate conception of Christ. In his student days he preached a sermon the aim of which was to show that religion consists in the consecration of the whole soul and character to Christ. "Christ should work by our hands, think in our thoughts, and live again on earth in our work and endurance." Closely allied with this conception of Christ was his desire to give a higher and finer ethical tone to Christian life generally. "He had already been brought to recognise the necessity of an ethical revival," his biographer informs us. "The religious life of many Christians he knew to be impoverished by imperfect conceptions of moral duty, and enfeebled by disregard of duty they recognised. He could admit no divorce between creed and conduct. He regarded as one of the chief defects of the Evangelical Revival its failure to afford a lofty ideal of practical righteousness, and a healthy vigorous moral training. And such failures and shortcomings, while injurious to spiritual health and soundness, armed unbelief with the deadliest of weapons." He soon came to see that the secret of an ethical revival is the realisation of the Living Christ.

It is sometimes the case that a truth with which we have been mentally familiar for years may strike us with such fulness and force as to mark a crisis in our life. Professor Moule cites a very interesting example of this: "A beloved and honoured friend of my own, now doing a great work for God, has told me how, early in his course, those five words, 'Christ, who is our life,' were made a new world to him. As he walked back to his home over the dark fields from a mission service he had been conducting, these simple, these familiar words passed through his soul in one of those moments of insight which God alone can explain. 'Within ten paces, as I walked, life was transformed to me,' he said; so wonderful was the discovery that the Lord Christ is not merely Rescuer, Friend, King, but Life itself, Life central, inexhaustible, 'springing up within my heart, rising to eternity.'" Dr. Dale had a very similar experience. Always familiar with the thought of Christ as the Living Christ, its realisation came to him one day with such freshness and force as to mark a veritable crisis in his life, and become the source of new inspiration and abiding power. Rev. G. Barker, for some years his assistant at Carr's Lane, has given an interesting narrative of this crisis, and we beg to quote it: "He was writing an Easter sermon, and when half-way through the thought of the Risen Lord broke in upon him as it had never done before. 'Christ is alive,' I said to myself; 'alive!' and then I paused;—'Alive!' and then I paused again; 'Alive! Can that really be true? living as really as I myself am?' I got up and walked about, repeating, 'Christ is living! Christ is living!' At first it seemed strange and hardly true, but at last it came upon me as a burst of sudden glory; yes, Christ is living. It was to me a new discovery. I thought that all along I had believed it; but not until that moment did I feel sure about it. I then said, 'My people shall know it; I shall preach about it again and again until they believe it as I do now.' For months afterwards, and in every sermon, the Living Christ was his one great theme; and there and then began the custom of singing in Carr's Lane on every Sunday morning, an Easter hymn. When first I attended service there I was surprised to hear on a November morning the hymn given out, 'Christ is risen: Hallelujah!" I mentioned it to Dr. Dale afterwards, and he said: "I want my people to get hold of the glorious fact that Christ is alive, and to rejoice over it; and Sunday, you know, is the day on which He left the dead." Compare with such an experience, so radiant with the light of joy and certainty, the dismal words of the late Dr. Jowett: "Is it possible to feel a personal attachment to Christ such as is described by Thomas a Kempis? I think that it is impossible, and contrary to human nature that we should be able to concentrate our thoughts on a person scarcely known to us, who lived 1800 years ago." What, then, is Christ dead? What was Christ to Dr. Jowett? Would he have us sing the mournful dirge:—

"Now He is dead. Far hence He lies
In the lone Syrian Town,
And on His grave with shining eyes
The Syrian stars look down."

The late Master of Balliol would evidently reduce Christ to the level of other great teachers of the ancient world. His teaching abides, but He Himself has passed away. How sad a spectacle to see such a splendid type of cultured paganism presiding over a Christian University! But with Dr. Dale, how vastly different! Christ was alive—"death of death and hell's destruction." Fellowship with Christ was fellowship with a living Person. The truth was no discovery so far as his mental life was concerned. He had long been familiar with it; but now, as never before, it stood for a great reality, kindling in his soul a feeling of rapture and triumph. It came to him with the surprise of a fresh revelation. For weeks, as Mr. Barker informs us, he thought about nothing else, and preached about nothing else. The first fervour of the experience might abate, but to the end of his ministry the thought of the Living Christ remained dominant over him, giving form and colour to all he wrote and spoke.

Let us now look for a moment at the various directions in which it influenced his life. Its first effects were seen in his personal character. His biographer states that the course of his spiritual life was not perfectly smooth and steady. There were alternations of ebb and flow, and at times the whole sky seemed overcast. But the vision of the Living Christ was the cure of spiritual vacillation. Its first effect is to deepen our sense of the exceeding sinfulness of sin. It was so with Isaiah when he saw His glory, and spake of Him, and it was so with Dale. His sense of sin was deep and vivid. With him, however, it was sin, not merely as revealed in speech and conduct, but as that principle of evil within us by which the very springs of life are corrupted; sin, whether ours by inheritance, or through our own defect, or by our mysterious community in the moral life of the race—sin, in all its forms and degrees, he felt to be the most terrible of realities. And what filled his thought was sure to occupy his speech. Hence we are not surprised that “at times his denunciation of sin was overwhelming in its force. He never stormed, but his wrath, as it grew, glowed with passion at a white heat. It seemed to scorch, to shrivel, to consume.” But if the vision of the Living Christ is the vision of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, it is also, thank God, the vision of the beauty and power and victory of holiness. When the soul, smarting under its sense of sin, cries out, “Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts”—the divine answer, in symbol and in word, is ever ready—“Then flew one of the seraphim unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar; and he laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away and thy sin is purged.”

The effects of this new experience were equally apparent in his work. In 1869 he was elected to the chair of the Congregational Union, and he chose as the theme of his address, “Christ and the Controversies of Christendom.” It was a stirring, eloquent address, and in it he presented the Living Christ as the effectual answer to the many errors of the day, ritual, theological, or ecclesiastical. Take this as showing how the Living Christ is an answer to many of the ritualistic questions: “We must preach Christ—the living Christ—till men shall feel that He is so near to them that the intervention of the priest is an impertinence and an affront. We must preach Christ—the living Christ—till we shall feel that He is near to them always and everywhere, and that His alleged union with the consecrated elements is rather a hindrance than a help to faith.” The same principle applies with equal cogency and force to many of the great questions of ecclesiastical controversy: “Christ, the Living Christ, is the Ruler and Head of the Church. There is scarcely an argument which is urged in support of national ecclesiastical establishments which is not paralysed by that solitary truth. Nearly every plea for a State Church derives its force from the disposition of men to think of the Church as being nothing more than a great human organisation for maintaining Christian learning and propagating religious truth, or for civilising mankind and improving the morality of nations. Let Christ be revealed as the actual King of the Church, and nearly all the arguments for ecclesiastical establishments are answered. Try whether it is possible to state the case to Him.”

But, doubtless, the most fruitful application of this discovery was made to theology. We cannot endorse all his theology. With his doctrine of life in Christ we have no sympathy whatever. We regard it as presenting difficulties much more serious than those with which the orthodox view is supposed to be beset. It is only fair to say, however, that to him it was not simply a theory of the future destiny of the impenitent. It was a restatement of the relation of the human race to the Lord Jesus Christ. Mankind, he contended, was created in Christ and redeemed through Christ, and therefore could only live in Christ. That confounds natural with spiritual life, and when we recognise the natural immortality of man, such reasoning falls to the ground. But turn to his book on The Living Christ and the Four Gospels, and you see the finest fruit of this new experience. He himself believed that next to The Atonement it was one of the most helpful things he had ever written, and we have no reason to think that his judgment was at fault. Its welcome at home was both hearty and general. The late Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. R. W. Church, writing to him, said, “You have brought out, I think, with great force that what we have in the Gospel is not a philosophy, nor the result of criticism, but an absolute reality, of the same order, and as unique as the being of God—the Presence of our Lord with our spirit—Person to person, Life to life—which, as long as we obey conscience and do not trifle with our light, is as real as ourselves.” Nor was its influence confined to England. Dr. Amory Bradford, of New Jersey, has expressed the opinion that Dr. Dale through that one book did more for the people of America in making them realise that Christ was really alive than any other preacher or book he knew. The main principle of the book is simply this, that faith in Christ is trust in a Person, not belief in a book. That distinction seems quite elementary, and yet it marks all the difference between vital and formal religion. When our faith but brings us face to face with a ritual, however elaborate, with a system, however perfect, or with a creed, however orthodox, it is barren of spiritual result. It is only when it brings us face to face with a Living Person that it touches the very deeps of our being, begetting all the beauty of Christian character, and all the fruitfulness of Christian service. “It is little to see Christ in a book," said good Samuel Rutherford, "as men do the world in a chart; they talk of Christ by the book and tongue and no more; but to come nigh Christ, and have Him and embrace Him is another thing." Yes, it is quite another thing. Dr. Dale came nigh Christ and embraced Him, and confessed that it transfigured his life. At the centre and heart of our religion is a Living Person. We follow, we serve, we worship the Living Christ. All the infinite resources of the Living Christ are at our disposal for strength, for service, for victory. Let us but realise that, and it will fire our soul with all the enthusiasm of humanity and all the devotion of love.

R. G. GRAHAM.

Sight and Insight.

THE common lack of observation is one of the difficulties of all teachers, and a reason of their pessimism. People will not take pains to see what is around them. They do not "look into things." Their acquaintance with the things that are brought before them every day is but slight, because it is superficial. We "pity the poor blind." It is a bitter thing to be unable to see any face, to read any book, to distinguish between morning and evening; and yet we use our own power of vision only in a fractional and imperfect measure. We see in the springtime that the leaves are coming on the trees again, and we see in the autumn that they are dropping off, and lie curled and brown at our feet. But how many of us have ever carried our observation further? How many have observed with Richard Jefferies, that "the shadows of the trees in the wood are blue. . . . The fallen brown leaves wet with dew have a different brown from those that are dry, and the upper surface of the green, growing leaf is different from the under surface"? Perhaps the majority of those few who not only see but observe the features of nature owe their faculty of observation directly or indirectly to John Ruskin. He has taught us to look at the clouds so as to see them. He has trained our eyes to observe their shapes, colours, movements, and to find delight therein. The fact is, of course, that the eye is only the window. It is the soul that sees. "Sight is a faculty, seeing is an art." The art of seeing must be learned, and the learning will require time, effort, and almost infinite patience. What we see is the witness of what we are. We discover ourselves by our ability or our inability to see. Failure is our condemnation. Our report is the standard of judgment. We tell what is within us when we tell what we have seen. Three men view a landscape. The first starts his description with an account of the crops, and tells you there are signs that harvest will be early this year. He is an agriculturist.

The second points out what a cheap and easy task it would be to construct a line of railway, or of waterway, between two points named. He is an engineer. The third delights you with a description of the different and ever-varying effects of the sunlight on the hills in the distance, and on the woods and streams in the valley. He has the artist soul. The difference is in the men. They have looked at the same objects with different eyes. They have seen what they wished to see, or, perchance, what they had the ability to see.

Untrained vision is liable to be deceived. It may be played upon by artifice, become the prey of illusions. The wreckers lured unsuspecting mariners to their destruction by showing false lights as if they were true ones. The false appearance led the poor sailor astray. We need to be on our guard, and ought to train our eyes to distinguish between the false and the true. Mature men, full-grown, trained, disciplined, "by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil," (Heb. v. 14). Others do not recognise the best when it is presented to them. "Though I write for him My law in ten thousand precepts, they are counted as a strange thing," (Hos. viii. 12). Some men are colour-blind. They do not recognise truth when they see it. They content themselves with the mere appearance, and perhaps do not see that aright. They admire nature, go into raptures about the sunset, or the springtime, but they do not see that nature is the revelation of Deity. They are filled with wonder when they remark the changes, and developments, and combinations of history, and yet they know nothing of Providence. So in religious matters. Two men shall sit in the same church. The Bible is read. Prayer is offered. Hymns are sung. One of the two will feel a spiritual excitation the other will know nothing of. Thomas Hardy, in his "Wessex Poems," puts it— from the standpoint of the man who does not see—thus:

"That faith by which my comrades stand
Seem fantasies to me,
And mirage mists, their Shining Land
Is a dreamy destiny.

Why thus my soul should be consigned
 To infelicity,
 Why always I must feel as blind
 To sights my brethren see,
 Why joys they've found I cannot find,
 Abides a mystery."

"Now, the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged," (1 Cor. ii. 14). "Science cannot give a Revelation. . . You cannot by searching find out the Almighty to perfection, nor a single one of the blessed Truths He has to communicate."—(Robertson).

We need, and ought, to cultivate the faculty of insight. Emerson has said in his extreme way: "Our age is retrospective. It builds the sepulchres of the fathers. It writes biographies, histories, and criticism. The foregoing generations beheld God and nature face to face; we, through their eyes. Why should we not also enjoy an original relation to the universe? Why should we not have a poetry and philosophy of insight, and not of tradition, and a religion by revelation to us, and not the history of theirs?" The Hebrew prophets were "seers." They were endowed with the faculty of insight, as well as with that of foresight. I would not rob them of their Divine inspiration. They were verily taught of God, else they had never taught the truths they did. They "spoke from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit." But it is the plain truth, (and no less honour is due to them because the fact is recognised), that many of their prophecies were shaped by what they saw around them. Only they saw deeper and more truly than other men were able to see. They "read men through and through." They estimated rightly the tendency of the times, and saw how God would deal with men, because they saw what men deserved. It was owing to their clear and penetrating vision that their forecast of events so frequently and so widely differed from the popular expectation. In the midst of growing prosperity they foretold the sure and speedy manifestation of Divine anger; and in the hour of the nation's keenest suffering, and darkest prospect, their messages were of deliverance and hope. Perhaps we might have more of the prophetic enthusiasm if we had more of the prophetic insight.

It has been ingeniously suggested* that there may be Scriptural warrant in such passages as 2 Kings iv. 8-17, and Luke xxiv. 13-35, for believing in a latent power of perception, of which we may expect the aggrandisement when the veil is lifted, and our eyes are opened on the eternal world. The sight of Elisha had been "touched to finer issues." He saw what ordinary men did not, could not see. His servant also acquired the faculty of recognising the presence, if not the character of supernatural beings, but only when his eyes had been "opened." Then "to his ordinary faculty of ordinary seeing, or vision, was superadded the extraordinary faculty of seeing the otherwise unseen." And so with the disciples in the Emmaus supper-room. "Their eyes were opened, and they knew Him." If our eyes were opened we might see all around us beings, existences, angels, friends, of whose existence or of whose nearness we had scarcely dreamed while our eyes were "holden."

At any rate, when the eyes of the heart, (Eph. i. 18), are enlightened, we see what we could not see before. May our spiritual vision be clarified and intensified! For the pure in heart see God.

GRIMSBY, FROM THE HUMBER.

Our Conference Town.

GREAT GRIMSBY: THE LINCOLNSHIRE FISHING-PORT.

BY FENTON ALLEN.

LUFF King Hal had a strong dislike to the county of Lincoln, and he contemptuously described it as being, "the most brute and beastly of all the Shires." This "degraded" county, however, has its redeeming features and beauty-spots. It has given birth to many distinguished men, who have gained more than local celebrity. The long list of Lincolnshire worthies includes sturdy Stephen Langton; William of Waynfleet; Lord Burleigh, of the days of good Queen Bess; Dr. Busby; Archbishop Whitgift; Sir Isaac Newton, the scientist; Sir John Franklin, the explorer; Lord Tennyson, and John Wesley, whose followers are to be found in many lands.

Although Lincolnshire may be regarded as a stronghold of Methodism, and was the honoured birthplace of the Wesleys and Alexander Kilham, it has no Wesleyan Conference town located within its boundary. As yet, our annual Conference has only paid three visits to the county of "fen, marsh, and wold." The first Lincolnshire Conference was held during the childhood of Primitive Methodism, when the annual assembly was not much larger than a good-sized Circuit Quarterly Meeting. In the year 1829, the tenth Conference of our Church was held in the out-of-the-world, agricultural village of Scotter. Small as the Conference Assembly was, it taxed the resources of the hospitable villagers in providing homes. Most of the delegates travelled by coach or boat to the river-port of Gainsborough, and then proceeded on foot, or by vehicle to "the Conference town." No record has been preserved of the names of the Conference officers, and the membership of the infant community was reported as being 33,720. Thirty years ago, Grimsby had developed into a Conference town; and in 1869 the Jubilee Conference was held under the presidency of the late Rev. Philip Pugh, and the Rev. Charles Smallman, who is still spending the eventide of life in the "Master's vineyard," was elected secretary. By a strange coincidence both of these Conference officers were "proud Salopians," and prominent ministers of the Tunstall District. The president, however, some two years previously had been called from the "mother" district to the Editorial chair. The second Grimsby Conference was held in 1880, the literary-gifted Colin Campbell M'Kechnie, Connexional Editor, being elected to the chair of the Conference, and the Rev. John Barfoot, of saintly memory, was appointed to the secretariat. In mid-June, after a long interval of nineteen years, the members of the eightieth Conference will hold their sessions in this important and thriving Lincolnshire coast town.

The history of Great Grimsby, as it is called to distinguish it from the hamlet of Little Grimsby, which is located near to Louth, goes back through many centuries. According to tradition, the town was founded by the Danes in the ninth century. Dr. Oliver, however, is strongly of opinion that its origin dates from two centuries earlier. It appears that a famous Norse viking of the name of Gryme, having committed a national crime, was compelled to leave the Danish coast. He took possession of Spurn Point, and sailed his warships in the waters of the Humber. He himself, for greater safety, found a refuge in a creek on the opposite side of the river, which became known as Grymesbury—or the “home of Gryme.”

Legendary historians give another account, and they relate that in bygone times there lived a poor merchant named Gryme, who one day found a lost child, which he adopted as his son. The boy was employed as a scullion in the Danish palace kitchen. Subsequently it was discovered that he was a Royal Prince, and in his early manhood he married the king's daughter. The kindly merchant was rewarded; he became rich, and founded the town of Grymesby. The boy's name was Haveloc, and it is somewhat significant that the boundary mark between Grimsby and Wellow is still called “the Haveloc stone.” In the seventeenth century there was a rich merchant of the name of Havelock, who was Mayor of Grimsby. He, along with General Sir Henry Havelock, of Indian Mutiny fame, are reputed to be the descendants of the foundling prince. On the ancient seal of the borough, dating from the days of Norman William, is represented “the gigantic figure of a man holding a drawn sword in his right hand, and bearing a circular shield on his left arm. The word ‘Gryem’ near him indicates him to be the reputed founder of the town. On his right hand is a youth, with a crown over his head, and near him the word ‘Habloc;’ and on his left is represented a female, over whose head is a regal diadem, and around whom is the word ‘Goldeburgh,’ the name of the princess who is said to have become the wife of Havelocke." The inscription of the seal is "Sigillum Communitatis Grimebye." This singular legend was scouted by Camden, the antiquarian of the sixteenth century, as being unworthy of belief. The ancient seal is no longer used by the Corporation; and a more modern one, bearing the arms of the borough, has been adopted.

Grimsby boasts of being one of the oldest corporate towns in the kingdom, and it received its first charter from King John. In the town records is a bye-law dating from the reign of Queen Elizabeth to the effect that the Mayor of Grimsby, "along with his eleven brethren," and the twenty-four members of the Corporation, shall sit on Sundays decently apparelled, in the chancel of the parish church. They were also instructed to bring their wives with them, who, like their husbands, were to be well-clad. The penalty for each case of Sabbath non-attendance was the legal sum of three shillings and fourpence. In the reign of King Charles I., this church-going bye-law was reaffirmed, and the financial penalties were reduced to one shilling for an alderman, and sixpence for a councillor.

From the reign of Edward III. until the passing of the Reform Act in 1832, the Borough sent two members to Parliament, when the representation was reduced to one. Chatty Pepys, in his diary, gives an account of one of the elections of his day. Probably his description is tinged with the colour of prejudice, for on unquestionable evidence, Admiral Holles was a man of good character and distinguished as a gentleman. Pepys says: "After dinner comes Sir Freschville Holles to me about business, and I with him by coach to the Temple, and there I alight, all the way telling me romantic lies of himself and his family, how they had been Parliament men for Grimsby, he and his forefathers, this forty years; and his father is now—and himself at this day stands for, to be with his father, by the death of his fellow-burgesses; and that he believed it will cost him as much as it did his predecessor, which was £300 in raw ale, and £52 in buttered ale, which I believe is one of his lies."

A century back, one of the notorious Grimsby elections lasted for nine months. The publicans reaped a large harvest, for their houses were thrown open to the parliamentary burgesses, who drank to their heart's content. The election costs amounted to £80,000. It is stated that the drinking excesses killed one-fourth of the electorate, which probably is an exaggeration.

In former years bull-baiting was one of the favourite sports of the Grimsby people. The Great Forest, which stretched for many miles down the sea-board marshes, in a southerly direction, afforded the inhabitants much amusement for boar-hunting. The ancient seal of the mayor is embellished with a representation of a savage boar being chased by a dog, behind which is a huntsman winding his horn. This device indicates the privileges of the mayor and burgesses of the town of hunting in the neighbouring woods of Bradley. By his tenure, the Lord of the Manor was compelled to provide annually a wild boar for the diversion of the Grimsby towns-people.

The town was favoured with a visit from Henry VIII., who was accompanied by his queen, Catharine Howard. For three days and nights he was entertained at the mansion of Mr. Kingston, who was a relative of Sir William Kingston, Lieutenant of the Tower of London, who was entrusted with the custody of Cardinal Wolsey. The Royal party were met on the outskirts of the town, and were accompanied by a large procession that was witnessed by some thousands of people who had flocked into the borough from the adjacent villages. The king, having found the town in a distressed condition, signalled his visit by including it in the Act of Parliament which had been recently passed "for repairing sundry towns and cities in England now fallen into decay." At the accession of Queen Elizabeth, the Corporation was released from the payment of Fee Farm rent, on condition that they devoted the same to the promotion of public works in the Borough.

As far back as the year 827, Grimsby was a port, and was regularly visited by vessels and merchants

"from the other side," as the Continental sea-ports are locally termed. After the Conquest, wove-buyers came from Cologne; Flemish merchants brought their cloths from Ghent and Ypres; and "Osterling" traders paid their periodic visits. In the year 1346, the port was so flourishing that it strengthened the naval armament of the king by providing eleven ships and one hundred and seventy men for the siege of Calais.

During the last century, owing to the encroachments of the sea, the silting up of the harbour, and other causes, the commercial prosperity of the port gradually declined, and the population was reduced to nearly a thousand inhabitants. John Wesley, who visited the town in the year 1766, says: "Grimsby is one of the largest towns in the county. It is no bigger than a middling village, containing a small number of half-starved inhabitants, without any trade, either foreign or domestic." At the end of the eighteenth century several local gentlemen manifested a spirit of enterprise, and formed themselves into "The Grimsby Haven Company." They opened a new dock in December, 1800, which cost £70,000 in construction.

The present flourishing condition of the town is largely due to the energy of the chairman and directors of the Great Central Railway, who bought out the old Dock Company and commenced their extensive operations in 1845. The late Prince Consort laid the foundation-stone—a huge block weighing eleven tons—of the grand new dock in 1849. Five years later it was named by the Queen, "the Royal Dock." Since the opening of the Royal Dock, which cost £700,000, and is twenty-five acres in extent, the town has gone forward by leaps and bounds. The Grimsby of to-day is principally the growth of the last half century; and it is the boast of the inhabitants that their town is built on "fish and timber," which is a proverbial reference to their imports. From the "middling village" of the last century, it has developed into a town of over sixty thousand inhabitants, and has the largest fish-market in the world.

Grimsby is the premier fishing-port. It is unrivalled for its tonnage and the weight of fish that is sold daily in its market. On an average, two hundred tons of fish are despatched every week-day from Grimsby for consumption in the towns and cities of Great Britain. The fishing fleet consists of over twelve hundred vessels, each ranging from sixty to eighty tons burthen. Over thirty thousand of the population of the town are dependent upon the fishing industry, and some eight thousand men and lads are directly engaged in catching fish.

The daily fish-market is held on the Pontoon which skirts the fish-dock. It is a covered wharf nearly half-a-mile in extent, and from forty to fifty feet wide. To the visitor from one of the inland towns, the Pontoon in the earlier hours of the morning, when it is completely covered with fish, is one of the sights of Grimsby. One writer humorously says: "The discharging of the smacks begins with daylight, and the fish are disposed on the wharf according to their size, in heaps, boxes, rows, etc., for the auctioneer. Large fish are laid in rows, and chiefly sold by the score; and meaner fish are thrown together and sold by the heap; whilst flat-fish, such as sole, halibut, turbot, etc., are disposed of by the box. Two methods of auction are in vogue on the pontoon: that which is common throughout the country, and that which is known as Dutch auction, in which the salesman begins at a high figure and comes down until a buyer is found. The market begins at eight o'clock in the morning, and lasts on the average till about one, but on some occasions it is not over until late in the afternoon. Whilst it is in full swing the pontoon presents a scene of animation such as is rarely witnessed; buyers, sellers, and labourers are all rushing to and fro as if the loss of a single moment were fraught with the direst consequences. Hand-bells are ringing at various points, and there are stentorian cries of 'Cod buyers, cod buyers, here you are!' 'Now, you please buyers, come along!' 'Sole buyers, sole buyers, come this way!' Sales are effected with remarkable celerity, and an expert salesman will often dispose of a smack's cargo in about a quarter of an hour. Buyers cluster round as soon as the salesman approaches; the latter runs up to the higher bidder as fast as he can utter the necessary words, or, if he sells by Dutch auction, down he comes with the same facility until someone cries, 'Het,' whereupon the clerk instantly completes his entry of the transaction, and the buyer appends his signature, whilst the salesman moves off, and almost before you can say 'Jack Robinson,' the process is being repeated with another lot."

Towering skyward above the masts, is the conspicuous Hydraulic Tower, which may be seen from a long range of distance. It is three hundred feet high, has a storage capacity for holding thirty thousand gallons of water, and a million bricks were used in its construction. It provides the power for working all the hydraulic machinery in connection with the docks. On a clear day from its lantern an extensive panoramic view of the surrounding land and sea may be obtained. On the north may be seen the city of Hull, and the distant Minster of York; whilst the Humber and Ouse like a silver thread may be traced in their fantastic windings. On the south are the Marshes with their populous villages and substantial church towers. On the west are the Lincolnshire Wolds, and the stately cathedral of the county city. On the east is the wide-stretching German Ocean, studded with a variety of craft going and returning from many lands.

On the southern side of the town is the new Park, which was opened in 1883 by the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. The site, which covers some twenty-seven acres, was one of the gifts of Lord Heneage. The entrance gates and lodge are of imposing design. The park, which is somewhat limited in extent, is laid out to the best advantage. It is ornamented with grass lawns, variously-tinted flower-beds, shady shrubs, tall-growing trees, and a miniature lake.

As Grimsby is comparatively a new town it cannot boast of much antiquarian lore save the old parish church restored in 1859. There is nothing special about its architecture. The principal buildings are the Town Hall, opened in 1863, the Hospital, the Corn Exchange, and the imposing churches and chapels. The Free Grammar School, dating from 1547, provides accommodation for seventy boys. A Higher Grade School has just been completed. The town possesses a Temperance Hall, a Mechanics' Institute, and a Hall of Science.

Probably no town in England, according to population, is better supplied with Free Churches than Grimsby. The properties belonging to the varied branches of Nonconformity are numerous and stately. The Baptist Tabernacle was opened in the seventies by Dr. James Spurgeon. The Congregationalists and the Methodist Free Churches are well represented. The Wesleyans have two powerful circuits, manned with six ministers, and having a total membership of 2,182. The town was frequently visited by John Wesley. It was to a Grimsby Methodist that he sent the following suggestive letter:

"London,

"February 6, 1753.

"MY DEAR BROTHER,

"It is a constant rule with us that no preacher should preach above twice a day, unless on Sunday, or on some extraordinary time, and then he may preach three times. We know nature cannot long bear the preaching oftener than this, and therefore, to do it is a degree of self-murder. Those of our preachers who would not follow this advice have all repented when it was too late. I likewise advise all our preachers not to preach above an hour at a time, prayer and all; and not to speak louder either in preaching or prayer than the number of hearers require. You will show this to all our preachers, and any that desires it may take a copy of it." "J. WESLEY."

The fashionable watering-place of Cleethorpes is connected with Grimsby by train and tram. Within a generation it has developed from a fishing village to a popular sea-side resort; with its pier, promenade, miniature park, beach amusements, churches, chapels, hotels, and boarding-houses. There is a quaint simplicity and rural quietness about the old village with its windmill, antiquated shops, and one-storied dwellings. Grimsby and Cleethorpes are rapidly becoming one town, Grimsby being noted for its business, and Cleethorpes for its recreation.

Lincolnshire is noted for its hearty sanctuary services, and its genuine hospitality. The members of the third Grimsby Conference will be sincerely welcomed to the historic fishing-port of the Humber.

IV.

IT is a shame, a cruel shame, and I hope that those men will lose all their money. I am thoroughly disgusted with them. Don't bring me any more of their wretched papers or magazines."

And Delia gave an angry stamp with her little foot on the book-room floor. I looked up in surprise from Boswell's "Life of Johnson," which I happened to be reading. Delia is the very cream of the milk of human kindness, and would not hurt a fly. Now, however, there is a pretty flush on her face, and it is evident she is much put out about something. A religious weekly lies in her lap.

"Doe'st thou well to be angry?" I inquired, with mock solemnity,

"Angry, indeed!" replied the dear creature. "And who wouldn't be angry? To think of these men—horrid things!—making the newsagents open their shops on Sundays, and send their boys shouting about the streets, to sell their miserable Sunday papers! As if we didn't get more papers than we can read on the six week-days. I am sure I waste ever so much more time than I ought to trying to look at those you bring home. But there! there won't be so many in future, for I will never look at any of these men's papers and magazines again!"

"Now I understand, and it is like Delia to be on the side of the people who want their Sunday rest. If all the Delias will do the same, we shall soon hear the last of the seven-day papers. As we enjoy the blessed rest-day ourselves, and as we are cheered and uplifted by our Sabbath communion with the Unseen, let us do all that we can to save the same privileges for others! Sunday should be for everybody, what saintly old George Herbert called it, the 'day most calm, most bright,' the 'earnest of supreme delight.' If once the Sunday be secularised, it will mean, not only the loss of the rest-day for hundreds of thousands of weary people, but it will be the materialisation of the whole life by the removal of the regular intercourse with God in prayer, praise, and preaching."

"Capital," cried Delia, clapping her hands. And she ran to the drawer of my secretary.

"But what do you want?" I asked.

"Here," she said, bringing out paper and envelopes, "I want you to write that all down this minute, and send it to the paper in a letter." And I had to do it, while my task-mistress, with her chin in her hand, and her elbow resting on the table, sat watching, with a stamp in the other hand. Well, such service for such a mistress is sweet. Delia rang the bell, and our Abigail was instructed to post the letter at once.

"That reminds me," I said, "that Dr. Johnson, whose life I have just been looking through again, was as firm a believer in the Sabbath rest and devotion as Mr. Gladstone was. The Doctor lived in a godless age—the age before, and the first years of the Evangelical Revival—when ladies and gentlemen passed the time away on Sundays at card-parties. He was a friend of John Wesley, but said, 'John Wesley's conversation is good, but he is never at leisure. He is always obliged to go at a certain hour. This is very disagreeable to a man who loves to fold his legs and have out his talk as I do.' Wesley, of course, good talker as he was, took such a serious view of life that he begrudged all time not given to the saving of souls. Johnson was a good man, but of a very different type. You remember how he stood bare-headed in the marketplace of Lichfield, his native city, in penance for some fancied slight to his dead father."

"Yes," said Delia, "but what does Dr. Johnson say about Sunday?"

"Boswell says that: 'On the 13th of the same month he wrote in his Journal the following scheme of life for Sunday:—"Having lived," as he with tenderness of conscience expresses himself, "not without an habitual reverence for the Sabbath, yet without that attention to its religious duties which Christianity requires:

"1. To rise early, and in order to it, to go to sleep early on Saturday.

"2. To use some extraordinary devotion in the morning.

"3. To examine the tenor of my life, and particularly the last week; and to mark my advances in religion, or recession from it.

"4. To read the Scripture methodically with such helps as are at hand.

"5. To go to church twice.

"6. To read books of Divinity, either speculative or practical.

"7. To instruct my family.

"8. To wear off, by meditation, any worldly soil contracted in the week."'"

"And a very good plan too," said Delia. "He was a wise old man, and we might do worse than borrow his scheme."

"Johnson," I added, "was often subject to fits of depression, and the Sabbath worship was one of the most effective remedies to remove them. Writing of one of these fits, Boswell says: 'While he was at church the agreeable impressions upon his mind are thus commemorated: "I was for some time distressed, but at last obtained, I hope from the God of Peace, more quiet than I have enjoyed for a long time. I had my hopes revived, and my courage increased; and I wrote with my pencil in my Common Prayer Book,

"Vita ordinanda.

"Biblia legenda.

"Theologiæ opera danda.

"Servedum et lætandum."'"

Delia put her lips into an affected pout at the sonorous syllables of the Latin, and then asked me to interpret it, which I did:

"To order my life.

"To read the Bible.

"To give attention to theology.

"To serve, and to rejoice."

And Delia agreed that it was a very fair summary of Christian practice—for a man who lived before there were Primitive Methodists, and was such a strong Churchman that, though he regarded Dr. Watts as the best of men, he looked on the great little doctor's Dissent as a terrible blot on his memory. Ah, well! let us all cultivate more charity, and look rather to our own defects than those of others.

I have been reading Izaak Walton's "Lives," which are not nearly so familiar as that gentle spirit's "Compleat Angler,"—that charming medley of talk about fishing, the delights of country life, poetry, and devotion. Izaak was a prosperous London draper in the early part of the seventeenth century, when the times were disturbed by political and theological wranglings, but he was one of those quietly-disposed men who in the worst of times "follow peace and ensue it," as the Prayer Book says. He sought out the saintliest characters he could find, and found their society the most congenial. It is to this that we owe the quaintly beautiful lives of Dr. Donne, the Dean of St. Paul's, who had quitted a wild youth for a manhood of sincere devotion; of Richard Hooker, the "judicious Hooker," one of the greatest thinkers and controversialists of the Church of England, and at the same time, one of the simplest-hearted of men; and of George Herbert, the sweetest of the religious poets, whose lovely verses will melt the hearts of spiritual-minded English men and women while our language lasts.

Delia takes a woman's interest in the love affairs of great men, though she says she wonders why any woman should want to marry a great man, for she finds that the small men are quite merry enough. I am temporarily deaf when such remarks are made. I take down Walton's "Lives," however, and tell her about Hooker's courtship and marriage. It came about in curious fashion. Hooker was invited to preach from the open-air pulpit of Paul's Cross,—by the side of the Cathedral. He was taken unwell, and lodged at a widow's, whose daughter Joan nursed him. Joan had neither beauty, dowry, nor good temper, and was in a fair way of being left to wither upon the stalk of old maidenhood——

"That's a man's way of putting it," said Delia, "but go on!"

"The widow told poor Richard that he evidently needed a wife's care, and that Joan was just the wife he wanted. He meekly agreed, and married her, with the result that she proved a terrible shrew. Walton tells how two old pupils found him at his country vicarage:

"In this condition he continued about a year; in which time his two pupils, Edwin Sandys and George Cranmer, took a journey to see their tutor, where they found him with a book in his hand, (it was the Odes of Horace), he being then, like humble and innocent Abel, tending his small allotment of sheep in a common field, which he told his pupils he was forced to do then, for that his servant was gone home to dine, and assist his wife to do some necessary household business. But when his servant returned and released him, then his two pupils attended him unto his house, where their best entertainment was his quiet company, which was presently denied them, for Richard was called to rock the cradle; and the rest of their welcome was so like this, that they stayed but till next morning, which was time enough to discover and pity their tutor's condition; and they, having in that time rejoiced in the remembrance, and then paraphrased on many of the innocent recreations of their younger days, and other like diversions, and thereby given him as much present comfort as they were able, they were forced to leave him to the company of his wife Joan, and seek themselves a quieter lodging for next night. But at their parting from him, Mr. Cranmer said, 'Good tutor, I am sorry your lot is fallen in no better ground, as to your parsonage; and more sorry that, your wife proves not a more comfortable companion, after you have wearied yourself in your restless studies.' To whom the good man replied, 'My dear George, if saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to repine at what my wise Creator hath appointed for me; but labour (as indeed I do daily) to submit mine to His will, and possess my soul in patience and peace.'

"Poor man," said tender-hearted Delia, "he deserved a better wife, and she a worse husband."

By way of relief I read to her Walton's story of a marriage that was made in heaven, though, according to worldly wisdom, the way in which it was rushed into seems rashest of the rash. This is the marriage of George Herbert. "'These,' says Walton, 'and his other visible virtues begot him much love from a gentleman of noble fortune, and a near kinsman to his friend, the Earl of Danby, namely, from Charles Danvers, of Bainton, in the county of Wilts, Esq. This Mr. Danvers, having known him long and familiarly, did so much affect him, that he often and publicly declared a desire that Mr. Herbert would marry any of his nine daughters, (for he had so many), but rather his daughter Jane than any other, because Jane was his beloved daughter. And he had often said the same to Mr. Herbert himself; and that if he could like her for a wife, and she him for a husband, Jane should have a double blessing: and Mr. Danvers had so often said the like to Jane, and so much commended Mr. Herbert to her, that Jane became so much a platonic as to fall in love with Mr. Herbert unseen. This was a fair preparation for a marriage; but, alas! her father died before Mr. Herbert's retirement to Dantsey; yet some friends to both parties procured their meeting, at which time a mutual affection entered into both their hearts, as a conqueror enters into a surprised city; and love, having got such possession, governed, and made there such laws and resolutions as neither party was able to resist; inso-much that she changed her name into Herbert the third day after this first interview."

"And they did not repent at leisure?" asked Delia.

"No, they lived the most blissful life, she and he giving themselves with their whole hearts to the worship of God, and the service of the people of his parish of Bemerton. But here, Delia, is something for you." And I read from Whittier's charming "Demon of the Study."

Oh, sweet as the lapse of water at noon,
O'er the mossy roots of some forest tree,

The sigh of the wind in the woods of June,
Or sound of flutes o'er a midnight sea,
Or the low soft music, perchance, which seems
To float through the slumbering singer's dreams.

So sweet, so dear, is the silvery tone
Of her in whose features I sometimes look,
As I sit at eve by her side alone,
And we read by turns, from the self-same book,
Some tale perhaps of the olden time,
Some lover's romance or quaint old rhyme.

Then when the story is one of woe,—
Some prisoner's plaint through his dungeon-bar,
Her blue eye glistens with tears, and low
Her voice sinks down like a moan afar;
And I seem to hear that prisoner's wail,
And his face looks on me worn and pale.

And when she reads some merrier song,
Her voice is glad as an April bird's,
And when the tale is of war and wrong,
A trumpet's summons is in her words,
And the rush of the hosts I seem to hear,
And see the tossing of plume and spear!

"And you mean to say, sir," says Delia, "that I am the 'demon of your study.'"

But her eyes were smiling, if her words sounded minatory, and I knew, as she passed out on household duties intent, that there was pleasure in her heart.

A little later I saw her in the garden, smiling at the children who were showing her the flowers that were growing in their own little private patches, and I knew that all the sunshine is not in the sky, and all the flowers are not of earthly growth.

LIBRARIUS.

Short Sermons from the Sage of Grasmere.

VI.—ON BEING EVER YOUNG.

HERE is a poetic pre-science, which in the light of later developments, is really touching in the lines which Wordsworth addressed to the fairy-like boyhood of Hartley Coleridge. The piece is in his happiest vein. I cannot quote it entire; indeed, I wish to make only three lines of it my text to-day,—but the pathos of this forecast is almost painful.

"O blessed vision! happy child!
Thou art so exquisitely wild,
I think of thee with many fears

For what may be thy lot in future years

Nature will either end thee quite;
Or, lengthening out thy season of delight,
Preserve for thee, by individual right,
A young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks.
What hast thou to do with sorrow,
Or the injuries of to-morrow?
Thou art a dew-drop, which the morn brings forth,
Ill-fitted to sustain unkindly shocks,
Or to be trailed along the soiling earth,
A gem that glitters while it lives
And no forewarning gives;
But, at the touch of wrong, without a strife
Slips in a moment out of life."

The tricky, sprite-like temper of the boy is well illustrated in the story told of him to this effect: He was asked one day some question as to why he was called Hartley. "Which Hartley?" rejoined the boy. "Why, is there more than one Hartley?" "Oh, yes! there is a deal of Hartleys," he replied. "There is Picture Hartley, (referring to Hazlitt's drawing of him), and there's Shadow Hartley, and there's Echo Hartley, and there's Catch-me-fast Hartley," and he clutched his arm eagerly, so that he might be sure of his own flesh-and-blood existence, rendered so doubtful to him by the other manifestations. A tragic tale, too, too common, is his life-story, of genius married to a feeble and faltering will. The promise of his boyhood was soon o'erclouded. Discipline had never been his; the seductions of Oxford proved too many for him. His genius gained him an Oriel fellowship, but he lived so ill during his year of probation as to forfeit it, receiving only a free gift from the governors of £300. On this, and precarious pay for poems in the London Magazine, he lived for two years in the metropolis, and then started an ill-starred school venture at Ambleside. After five years of struggle he failed in this also, and the remainder of his life was spent at Grasmere, in constant dependence on his friends until his death in 1849. What he himself calls "the woeful impotence of weak resolve" pursued him to the end. But that, in spite of his frailty, he had won the hearts of the honest Westmoreland dalesmen there is proof in plenty. In a most interesting paper, which the Rev. Canon Rawnsley contributed to the Transactions of the Wordsworth Society, he gives many instances of this, at once amusing and pathetic. When he tried to get information about Wordsworth, "li'le Hartley's ghost was always coming to the front," and the poet-laureate had to suffer eclipse. "Naay, naay," one would say, "I caunt say a deal to that, but ye kna li'le Hartley would do so-and-so. Li'le Hartley was the man for them. If it had been Hartley now, I could ha' told you a deal." The poetic credit of Wordsworth passed, in their minds, to Hartley. "He lent Hartley a deal of his books it's certain, but Hartley helped him a deal, I understand, did best part of his poems for him, so the sayin' is. He would come often in the afternoon and have a talk at the Nab, and would go out with Hartley, takin' him by t' arm for long enOUGH. And when Hartley was laid by for the last, Muster Wordsworth com' down every day to see him, and took communion wi' him at the last." "Then Mr.

Wordsworth and Hartley Coleridge were great friends?" I asked. "Na, na, I doan't think li'l Hartley ever set much by him, never was very friendly, I doubt. Ye see, he (Mr. Wordsworth) was so hard upon him, so very hard upon him, giv' him so much hard preaaching about his waays." And in relation to Hartley, the dales-people thought even Mrs. Wordsworth unkindly. "A close-fisted woman, that's what she was. I remember onest I went up to the Mount to ask for sattlement of account, for Mrs. Wordsworth paid for Hartley's keep, t'ime he lodged at the Nab, and I had fifteen shillings i' the book against Coleridge for moneys I'd lent him different times. And she was very awkward and on-pleasant, and wouldn't sattle, ye kna', for she thowt that Hartley had been drinkin' wi' it. But," he added, "howiver, I wrote to his mother in London, and she wrote to me and telt me I was to lend a shilling or two as Hartley wanted it, and arter that she sattled wi' me for his lodgment hersel', but Mrs. Wordsworth was very on-pleasant." And, no doubt, good woman, she had her reasons.

But to our text, which is from the poem on the boy, rather than from the calamitous life of the grown man. "A young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks"—the secret of being ever young, a secret which, in spite of all the poet's wishes and care for him, poor Hartley never really reached. For it does not mean remaining a child, but being man and child both, at one and the same time. Juvenility in the man is not mere childishness. Some men carry the littleness of their childhood into their manhood. They have got very much childishness, without any child-likeness. They have carried the toys of the nursery into their adult life. Their thinking is narrow, their will is weak, wayward, hasty, they are vain and peevish. They are only great overgrown children, in the worst sense; children, that is, in whom the bad qualities have survived and become exaggerated, while the good qualities have been dwarfed or extinguished altogether. "Be not children in understanding; howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be ye men."

This "young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks," this "lengthening out of the season of delight," is really the blessing put poetically into the mouth of Moses, and pronounced on the tribe of Asher—Asher, "the happy or lucky one"—before its decadence. "Thy bolts shall be iron and brass, and as thy days so shall thy strength be." The latter sentence is commonly interpreted to mean that every special exigency or trying phase of experience is accompanied by grace to meet it; that there is daily strength for daily need; that the burden is proportioned to the back, or the back prepared for the burden. But that is an accommodation, though a pardonable one. The sense truly is that vigour shall grow with life: that the measure of the days shall be the measure of force; that life shall not know failure or decay. "Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day." The blessed life goes on advancing in strength and fulness as the days go by.

But how? that is the question. There is only one way—by constantly developing new correspondences. If life—not certainly in its essence, but in its phenomenal actuality—is, as I believe it is, well-defined as correspondence with environment: if that is the secret of persistence, then it is also the secret of being ever young. There is a clear law that longevity is, in the main, in proportion to complexity of nature, that is to the number of sides the organism presents to the outer facts of existence. When the first snap of winter cold comes the earliest to succumb are the flies; then, as boreal rigours advance the birds perish: animals that have learnt to store and burrow have the greater chance of survival, and above them all stands man, with his power of scheming brain and facile adaptment. When, through stress of competition, manufactories close their gates, the common labourers, with only hands as equipment, thrown on an already glutted labour market, go first to the wall; while through all gradations up to the top, it is the man of more intricately convoluted brain, and therefore, power to come into speedier correspondence with a new environment who comes off with least loss. It was because the unrighteous steward of the Saviour's story was wise and wily that, though he could not dig, and would not beg, he was received after his dismissal into new and hospitable habitations. He knew more "ropes" and "wrinkles" than the average man. And the law holds in the highest things. The man who realises continual adjustment to the changing conditions, and the enlarging demands of life: who keeps ever in touch with something higher and better—with God in the last instance—who finds God everywhere and appropriates Him—that man is subject to no soul-decay. He possesses the patent of perpetual youth.

And a man must recognise this law. He conquers by submitting to it. There is many a melancholy spectacle of arrested development to be seen—premature superannuation—because a man refuses to part with the old skins, shells, and husks which by all but himself are seen to be outworn and worse than useless. They cramp a life that would otherwise burgeon afresh in beauty and fruitfulness. Shed these and live: hug them and die—is the law. Our dead selves are only in place as stepping-stones to higher things; and the rotting leaves of the autumn will yield the substance out of which next year's leaves are woven. Simeon, Paul, Beecher, Gladstone—these are the sort of men who preserve the young lamb's heart. How instinct with juvenility is what I have sometimes called Paul's "ethical will"—as made out in favour of Timothy! "I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus—preach the word, suffer hard—ship, do the work of an evangelist, fulfil thy ministry." He stands on his Pisgah looking back, looking about him, and looking onward, and his face is aglow with thankfulness and hope. "The time of my departure is come. . . . I have fought the good fight. . . . Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness." It is a noble ending—nay, it is but a beginning. I like to think of that last scene in Beecher's public life, when, as he was just about to leave his church after what proved his final sermon, two street boys strayed in to listen to the lingering strains of the organ. The ever-young heart of the great preacher was profoundly touched, and they tell still—nay, his statue tells the story in stone—how he passed from the building in which his trumpet voice was to be heard no more, with his arms thrown round those boy-waifs, in fatherly pity and tenderness. A child to the end he was—ever-green in his great human-heartedness. It is an easy passage from him to another great American, who has sung the same lesson in terms whose sweetness matches their truth to science. The Autocrat of the Breakfast-table asks his auditors if they have ever noticed the widening spiral of the nautilus shell—"a series of ever-enlarging compartments successively dwelt in by the little sea-denzens."

"Year after year behold the silent toil
That spread its lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last found home, and knew the old no more.

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

It is a far cry, in one way, from the tribe of Asher to Hartley Coleridge, but they agree in this, that both illustrate—the one in spite of "Moses," and the other in spite of Wordsworth—the refusing of the higher demands, compliance with which is the secret of continued juvenility. Both declined the more arduous correspondences, and both disappeared early, after a more or less inglorious life. For Hartley lived to beyond fifty—but he was little better than a belated guest at the banquet of life, and had outstayed his welcome, while no one could regret to see him go—only to think how little he had made of life's opportunity. He grew old while yet young; not ever-young while growing old. And as to the tribe of Asher, what are the facts? Was the "blessing" realised? It was not realised, but the reverse. Born, so to speak, with a silver spoon in his mouth, Asher, the spoilt child of fortune, inhabiting a country about which the Talmud said long afterward: "It is easier to raise a legion of olives in Galilee than to bring up a child in Palestine,"—surrendered himself to too complete correspondence with his material environment. When other claims came he gave them the go-by. The fat bread and the royal dainties (see Genesis xlix. 20), the oil in which he dipped his foot, the metals with which he shod himself, or made protecting bolts for his heritage, ensnared him. He gave himself up to the carnal enjoyment of these things. He lived a fat, luxurious, pleasure-loving life, and so falsified the promise. This is the history: "Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of the land, but the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites," and became corrupted by them. While Zebulun and Naphtali jeopardised their lives unto the death in the high places of the field, Asher continued craven and cowardly on his rich maritime plains, abode in his creeks, and implicated himself in the curse of Meroz. Though, if tradition tell true, and as the "blessing" plainly hints, one of the most numerous and "fortunate" of the tribes, it had become so small and insignificant in the days of David that it furnishes no name to the list of chief rulers. There is no noble action recorded of this tribe in all the history. It became demoralised, and supplied no hero or judge to the nation. Because it maintained correspondence only with its fat soil, that soil became its ruin. "To be carnally-minded is death, but to be spiritually-minded is life and peace."

Cultivate, then, a complex and ever-enlarging life. A sweet Rabbinic saying is that, "in heaven the oldest angels are the youngest." That is because they are ever multiplying their correspondences. When depression overtakes the industries of a country, those centres that have most trade outlets for the activity of their people escape with least scathing. So let us have resources in reserve. Do not put all your eggs in one basket, or invest only in one sort of stock. Send forth your ships upon many waters; divide your life's merchandise into many portions—so that if one adventure prove abortive, another may come to your rescue. Above all, buy the truth and sell it not. With all thy gettings get understanding. "For whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord. But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me love death."

Connexional Biography.

REV. GEORGE WATTS.

THE Rev. George Watts was born at Leckford in the county of Hampshire, England, on January 2, 1815, and passed into the joy and service of the higher life on the evening of the 15th of August, 1898. His parents belonged to the labouring class, were in fairly well-to-do circumstances, and religiously inclined. In principle they were Congregationalists, but, owing in part to the tyranny of "the powers that be," and in part to other causes, their membership was little more than nominal, and with their family occasionally attended the parish church. Soul-saving religion was at a discount in the village; the people, as a whole, were in gross spiritual darkness, and the most degrading practices prevailed. But while such were the outward, or outside surroundings of the earliest years of his life, there was in him, and over him, under the parental roof, the restraint of a strong moral influence and religious bias; and springing, as I think he did, from an old Puritan stock, he inherited somewhat of its spirit and sturdiness of character; and does not this, after all, count for much?

It was not, however, until he was eighteen years of age, and on being brought into contact with Primitive Methodism, that he experienced the new birth unto righteousness. At that time the Revs. J. Ride, T. Russell, S. West, E. Bishop, and others, were proclaiming, with apostolic fervour and power, the Gospel of Christ in the towns and villages of Hampshire. Early in 1833 Leckford was visited. The Holy Spirit was abundantly poured out from on high, and a marvellous change was wrought in the village. Scores of souls, including some of the worst, were converted, and made new creatures in Christ Jesus. The subject of this memoir came under the influence of this great awakening. For a time he fought against it, refusing to submit, and going about to establish his own righteousness. At length the hour of his self-surrender and deliverance came. It was under a sermon preached by the Rev. E. Bishop, from the text, "The righteous hath hope in his death." From that moment the whole current of his being and purpose of life were changed. He at once cast in his lot with the maligned and persecuted, but God-honoured, Primitive Methodists, and forthwith began publicly to exercise his gifts, both in prayer and exhortation. Very soon his name, as a local preacher, appeared on the plan of the station; a position that meant not only great labour, but frequently much suffering. Many of the journeys were long, and most of the services were held out of doors, and in the face of much opposition. With his soul aflame for the glory of God, and the salvation of the perishing, he joyfully undertook the labour, and endured the suffering. "The joy of the Lord was his strength," and souls converted and homes made happy his reward.

CALL TO THE MINISTRY.

Not only was he endowed with a vigorous and well-balanced mind, and blest with a strong and healthy body, splendid voice, and indomitable courage, but he was thoroughly earnest and deeply pious; he could not only preach but pray; and these, with his success in soul-winning as a local preacher, were his recommendations for the wider sphere of service in the regular ministry to which, in 1836, he was called by both God and the Church, and pledged at the Conference of the same year. His first circuit was Micheldever, where he remained two years, and in which his physical strength, mental power, and moral courage were severely tried. He met with much rough treatment, but was cheered and encouraged by the Master's manifested presence and power to save. He also in England and Wales laboured on the following stations:—Aylesbury (two years), Wallingford (one year), Witney (twice—four years), Tredegar (two years), Pillawell (three years), and Chippenham (one year). It was while on the Witney Station, and in the year 1842, that he was married to her who survives him, and who proved to be then, and in all the changeful years that followed, and in every sense a helpmeet indeed, joyfully taking part with him in all his discouragements, labours, and conflicts.

Not only did he preach on nearly every night in the week—after walking many miles each day, and visiting and praying from house to house; but on Sundays walked, not unfrequently, fifteen or twenty miles, and preached three or four times, mostly in the open-air, and under unfavourable circumstances. To these labours were added many others. The work was essentially missionary—aggressive and enlarging—and into many places, wrapped in deepest and densest moral gloom, was carried the light of the glorious Gospel, kindling in the hearts and homes of the people the transforming and elevating flame of vital religion. Constrained by the love of Christ, he, and many others of that time, equally heroic, waited not for doors to open, but in God's name, though opposed by the strongest forces of earth and hell, went and opened them. Fearless, determined, and zealous, no sound was more welcome to him than the battle-cry of the Cross, and no music more sweet to his soul than the joyful acclamations of the spiritually emancipated.

But if abundant in labours, the persecutions which he also had to endure in those early years were not only numerous, but at times of a most vile and brutal character. It was with difficulty that he sometimes escaped with his life from the attacks of infuriated mobs, maddened with drink, and set on and encouraged by those who ought to have known better. But none of these things either intimidated or damped the ardour of his soul. He gloried in the Cross, and rejoiced that he was counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake. With unflinching faith, and a Christ-given power, he persevered in proclaiming—in streets, and lanes, and fields—the Gospel of a present, free, and full salvation. Drunkards, and blasphemers, and many of the ringleaders and more violent of the persecutors were converted and became "valiant for the truth;" new societies were formed, and chapels built. The memory of those times, marked by many striking interpositions of Divine Providence, and wonderful manifestations of Christ's saving power and glory, not only gladdened his heart in his latter days, but called forth the profoundest gratitude of his soul: saying, "Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but unto Thee be the praise." GOES TO AUSTRALIA.

Some time in 1850, believing it to be God's will and call, he offered himself to the General Missionary Committee for the Australian Missions. His offer and name were recorded, but he received no further reply, until the Conference of 1851. The Chippenham Circuit Quarterly Meeting had requested his re-station, but when the stations came out he found that he was appointed to Melbourne, Australia, as successor to the Rev. John Ride, who was appointed to open the Geelong Mission; he was also notified to be in readiness to sail in the course of a few weeks for his far-off field of labour. Preparations were hastily made, and in August, 1851, with his wife and three infant children, he bade farewell to the land of his birth and early labours, and safely reached Melbourne on the 27th of November following. He was welcomed by his old comrade, and a few others who had known him in England. The recent discovery of the Victorian gold-fields had caused intense and wide-spread excitement. The whole aspect of affairs was changed, and the circumstances altered; from these and other causes the arrangements of the Missionary Committee and the Conference could not be carried out. He was also, by a severe affliction, confined to his bed for fifteen weeks, and Mr. Ride could not leave Melbourne. At the following September Quarterly Meeting it was mutually arranged for Mr. Watts, who was now fully restored to physical health and vigour, to open in the following month, October, 1852, the Geelong Mission. On the first Sunday morning after arrival, he, accompanied by Mrs. Watts, took his stand on a heap of stones in what is now Market Square, and proclaimed the Gospel of grace and life to those that gathered around. Mrs. Watts preached in the same place in the afternoon, and he again in the evening. One soul was converted at the afternoon service. Thus did God cheer them with the manifestation of His presence and the seal of His approval. That for a considerable time became their regular place of meeting. He remained six years in Geelong, and aided by God's grace and a band of noble local helpers—most of whom preceded him to the rest and reward in glory—the cause was established. Weller Street Church was built, and left almost free of debt. Several other places were also missioned and societies formed. The long journeys which he made on foot, laid the foundation of that which necessitated his comparatively early superannuation. His zeal for the honour of Christ, the salvation of the perishing, and the extension of Primitive Methodism outweighed all personal considerations, and the success with which God crowned his efforts, and the roll of membership which he was enabled to leave were his joy and reward. He also laboured with acceptance and success on the following stations in this Colony:—Bendigo, Campbellfield, Castle-maine, Kilmore, and Melbourne. On all these he formed enduring friendships, and left memorials of his influence, energy, and zeal. For five years he was the District Secretary, Superintendent of Missions, and General Book Steward, discharging the onerous duties of his position with characteristic energy, intelligence, and faithfulness. As a pioneer missionary he possessed in no stinted measure traits of character and qualifications essential to success, and largely shared in the honour of being one of the chief instruments in the planting, spread, and building up of Primitive Methodism in this colony. In all this he claimed no personal merit. It was Christ's grace in him, and his faith in, and whole-hearted consecration to Christ, that made him what he was, and that enabled him to do what he did. He had an unblemished record and unbroken membership in the Primitive Methodist Church of sixty-five years. He was in the ministry sixty-two years, thirty-eight of which were in active service. Successful as a soul-winner, the aggregate net increase in the membership roll of his stations was counted by hundreds. In 1874 he was superannuated, and settling at Geelong, gave full proof of his unabated zeal for Christ's glory, and deep interest in the spiritual prosperity of our Zion. While health permitted, and after the loss of his sight, he laboured in word and deed. Not soon will be forgotten his presence in the House of God, nor his earnest addresses, thrilling prayers, and godly walk and conversation. The labourer rests, but the work goes on.

PROMINENT TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

As a man, he was every way manly. There was nothing in him, or in his dealings with others, pettish and little. He was firm in principle, shrewd in judgment, and true to his convictions; fearless in what he believed to be the right, somewhat brusque in manner, but honest and straightforward in conduct, and unwavering in his friendships. The remotest approach to what was finical, to affectation, slipperiness, or sham, was an abomination to his soul. As a Christian, he was faithful, deep-rooted, and zealous. He was not blind to his imperfections and shortcomings, and while deploring them, constantly and earnestly sought by prayer and meditation the attainment of a more Christly spirit and life. He was much in communion with God, and precious to his soul was the word of the Lord. As a minister, he was faithful, diligent, and energetic. "A workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Christ, and Him crucified, was the great theme of his preaching. He "warned every man, and taught every man in all wisdom, that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." He had somewhat of the fearless and uncompromising spirit of Paul, and the rugged rock-like firmness and fire of Peter. To pastoral visitation, which was no small factor in his success as a soul-winner, he gave attention, and was in every sense and in every way loyal to the Connexion. In all church affairs, while in active work, he took a leading and influential part, and was frequently president of our Annual Assembly.

As he lived, so he died, strong in faith and with "Christ in him the hope of glory." Death to him had no terrors. Its sting had long been extracted; and dying to him was not death, but the realisation of a grander and more perfect life. It was thus, full of years, rich in grace, and ripe in soul, that he peacefully passed "beyond the shadows," to be forever with the Lord. He leaves behind him his aged partner, who is calmly waiting the Master's call "to come up higher," and a son and daughter who are both walking in the fear of the Lord. His eldest daughter (Mrs. John Elvins), preceded him only a few weeks to the rest in glory. May He who has promised to be a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless, sustain and comfort the bereaved until the meeting time shall come.

The funeral took place on August 17th, and was very largely attended, not only by immediate friends and sympathisers, but by many who held his name and memory in esteem. The following ministers, in addition to the writer, were also present:—Revs. J. Wilson, T. Copeland, W. Hunt, H. Heathershaw, C. Anthony, and H. W. Frederick. The body was taken first to the Pakington Street Church, where a brief and impressive service was held, conducted by the Rev. J. Wilson, and in which the Revs. W. Hunt, C. Anthony, and H. Heathershaw (who gave an address) took part. Thence the long procession proceeded slowly to the Western Cemetery, where amidst a scene memorable and affecting, the writer, in compliance with the previously expressed wish of the deceased, committed his mortal remains to their last resting place. The Rev. T. Copeland offered the closing prayer. "The fathers, where are they?"

"He's gone to wear the conqueror's crown,
And bright that golden crown will be ;

For sparkling gems will stud it round—
The trophies of his ministry."

GEORGE GREY.

MR. THOMAS HOUGH.

THOMAS HOUGH, of Leyland, in the Preston Second Circuit, departed this life on March 22, 1897, aged eighty years. His removal takes from us one who shared actively in the laborious pioneer work which marked the early days of the Connexion. Of the men who had the honour of helping to build up Primitive Methodism during the first three decades of its history, not many remain alive to-day. The churches they planted remain as monuments of their self-denying zeal for God and humanity. If they have ceased from their labours, the fruit of their toil abides in ever-increasing power. Their memory will be cherished by all who have a proper appreciation of their work, and of the self-sacrificing spirit in which it was done. Their diligence and devotion were the expression of their love for Christ and the souls of men. This was the one all-mastering passion which sustained them in every trial, and from which they gathered their inspiration and strength. "For His sake" they were ready either to labour or suffer, content in either case, so long as it was His will.

More than sixty years ago Thomas Hough had what our Welsh friends call "the great turn." He was converted, and threw in his lot with the small band of Primitives at Hoole, in the Preston Circuit. This was the crisis of his being, and fixed his course for ever. The turning was complete and final for both time and eternity. What our fathers in the early days never wearied urging the people to do, he did—Turned to the Lord and sought salvation. What he sought he found, and from that time to the end of his long life he went on his way rejoicing. Conversion in his case was not merely turning over a new leaf, it was beginning a new book. The old account was closed, his debts forgiven, his sins pardoned, the burden of guilt removed. He began his better and higher life a new man, and free. Just as the Prodigal, from the time he came first to himself and then to his father, never wandered more, never desired to visit the far country again; so our late friend, having tasted the heavenly gift, and felt the power of saving grace, held on his way, thankful for past blessing and trusting God for needed help from day to day. His life bore witness to the reality of his conversion, and the readiness with which he saw that blessings received meant responsibility incurred, bore witness to the intelligence with which he grasped the import of the change which had taken place in his relation to both God and man. New life brought new ideas, new feelings, affections, and ambitions, and opened before him the prospect of a life of useful service in the Master's cause. His eyes were opened, and his heart filled with an infinite love for God, and a boundless pity for sinful men. From that time to the end of his earthly life, Jesus Christ was to him both Saviour and Lord—the Saviour of his soul, and the only Lord he acknowledged as having rightful control over his life. The church was not only a place for spiritual refreshment and comfort, but for work. Its mission and manifold services presented a sphere for labour, and for the exercise of gifts and talents of every degree in the effort to spread the kingdom of God on the earth by making known to men the way of salvation through the mediation of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Our brother became an active and zealous worker in the Master's vineyard. He had been a local preacher fifty-seven years at the time of his death. For many years past his name has appeared on the plan in the highest place next to the travelling preacher's. That was the name by which the minister was known in the early times, and among the older Primitives of the present time is still often used. It reminds us of the time when circuits were wide, places often far apart, and journeys long and exhausting, on which the weary wayfarer, tired and spent, was thankful for any quiet resting-place, and for any help by the way. That was the condition of things when our late brother became a preacher. In those days physical strength as well as mental and moral fitness, was needed as a qualification for the work. When God has work to be done He raises up suitable men to do it.

The first race of preachers in Primitive Methodism, both travelling and local, were men, to whom work was no strange thing, and the idea never entered into their massive heads, that a man was less worthy of respect, because he knew how to do some kind of useful work. Of all the vanities and follies that have found a home in the minds of men, none have been more absurd than the notion that a man is less respectable because he has earned his living by honest labour instead of living on the labour of others. The men who made Methodism were for the most part hard workers all the week round, and Sunday was often the hardest day of the seven. If tired in the work they were not tired of it. In their long and lonely walks they were not alone, for the Master's presence, if not seen, was felt; and their hearts often burned within them with a sweet satisfaction as He communed with them by the way. They thought more of the pleasure of meeting the people they loved than of the long miles that must be travelled to reach them. It was a joy to meet, and a pain to part, and the last song in the prayer meeting which closed the services was often one reminding them of the happy times coming when they would meet to part no more. The long journey between the preacher and his home seemed to grow shorter as they sang,

"Refreshed again we start,
Though for awhile we part,
We still are one in heart—
We'll meet in glory."

As a preacher our late brother was well received in his own and neighbouring circuits. And in this local sphere, without wishing for a wider field, he was content, and found plenty of work to do. The harvest was great and labourers comparatively few, and those willing to work were in no danger of being left unemployed. Where he was planned to preach the people looked forward with pleasure to his coming.

His transparent goodness made room for him. He was respected for his sincerity, and the people were all the more ready to believe the message of mercy he delivered, because they believed in him. He spoke of what he knew, what he had seen and felt of the power of saving grace, and the word of the Lord had free course, and was glorified. Sunday with him was pre-eminently the Lord's day, and on that day he gave himself fully to the Lord's work. If not preaching he was to be found in the Sunday School and in the class meeting at his own place. So long as he had strength he was a pattern worker, constant, devoted, never afraid of overdoing, but ready and willing to spend and be spent in the Master's cause. His religion was not confined to the sanctuary, and all crowded into the Sunday. He was as religious in his business as in his prayers. Though in the world, he was not of the world. His motto was not gain by any means, but only by such honest ways as a good conscience could look back on without offence. He honoured God, and God honoured him, according to His promise. If he was not given great riches, he had all that was needed for comfort and happiness, for himself and family, enough and to spare. From the day of his conversion to the day of his death, the hand of the Lord was on him for good, and blessed him both spiritually and temporally, beyond all he even ventured to ask. He had his times of sorrow and trial, but these were outweighed by favours, which, like flowers in spring, shone in his path from day to day. He knew the pain of bereavement in his own domestic circle, and in the passing away of friends and companions in the good work, until he was almost left alone, his company having gone on before. The hope of re-union was his consolation.

He was happy in his home-life, and to him there was no place like home. Whatever in the way of fret and worry he might have in business outside, he had a harbour of refuge at home. Here he was certain to have a cup as full of comfort as loving hands could provide; a full tide of sympathy from wife and daughters never failed him at home. Here the atmosphere was full of love and peace. The love dwelling under his roof was more in deed than in word. There was no blowing of trumpets, no loud profession, but a strong under-current of affection that in a modest, quiet way, made itself manifest. In prosperity he did not become sordid. Religion opened both his heart and hand. Hospitality was the rule at his house. From his door the distressed were not sent empty away. The Lord's servants were ever welcome to the best they had,—offered, not in a formal, patronising way, but with such kindness from each member of the family as left no room for doubt as to the real pleasure the visit gave to them. It was kindness shown to the servant for the Master's sake. For some years past failing strength laid him aside from active work, but his interest in the good cause, and desire for its prosperity, remained as strong as ever.

When, through age, his weakness became such as to leave no doubt about the near approach of the end, he was undismayed. Faith did not fail when strength was gone. To him Christ was precious, all in all, and his end was full of hope and peace.

His body was laid in the cemetery adjoining the old chapel at Hoole (which he had helped to build) in the presence of many friends, by whom much sympathy was shown for the family.

Mrs. Hough, who was sick at the time of her husband's death, has since followed him to the spirit land. May we all meet there when the storms of life are past.

J. G.

MRS. EDIS.

MARY ANN, the beloved wife of Mr. Isaac Edis, of Dogsthorpe, in the Peterborough First Circuit, and affectionate mother of Dr. J. B. Edis, of Liverpool, was born February 8, 1825, and passed to her reward in heaven on Tuesday, March 30, 1897, in the seventy-third year of her age.

The subject of our sketch was the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lee, who espoused the cause of Primitive Methodism in the city of Peterborough in its earlier and more unpromising days; and how much the present prosperity of the two Peterborough Circuits owes to them would be very difficult to say.

Miss Lee was the happy subject of a divine change when in her teens, and at once united herself with the Church of her honoured father and mother, in which she continued a most devoted member between fifty and sixty years. In 1846 she was united in marriage with Mr. Isaac Edis, who was then an earnest local preacher, and has been circuit steward for nearly fifty years, and who found in her a true helpmeet and hearty sympathiser in all his plans of benevolence and circuit labours.

The piety of our departed sister, although not what some would call demonstrative, yet was very substantial in its character, and manifested itself in various ways of Christian activity, liberality, and usefulness. For years, in connection with her sainted mother, she undertook the management of tea meetings and bazaar enterprises. In her home the servants of God always found a hearty welcome; her attendance at the means of grace was regular and devout, and her class meeting experiences were marked with humility and trust in a crucified and risen Saviour. In the erection of over twenty chapels in the two Peterborough Circuits she took the most lively and practical interest, and her countenance often lighted up with sacred joy on hearing of, or witnessing any special instances of success. The writer has had the opportunity of observing her deportment for nearly forty years, during which time he has shared the hospitality of herself and her now bereaved husband, and can bear his testimony that her character was meekly adorned with the three Christian graces: faith, hope, charity.

In July, 1896, Mr. and Mrs. Edis happily celebrated their golden wedding, when the friends very joyfully presented them with a portrait of each other, and an illuminated address at a very interesting gathering in the New Road Chapel.
